REPORT

OF THE

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION,

AT THE

FIRST SESSION THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON:
GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.
1866.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 5, 1865.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk:

The House of Representatives has passed the following resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of fifteen members shall be appointed, nine of whom shall be members of the House and six members of the Senate, who shall inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they, or any of them, are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress, with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise; and until such report shall have been made, and finally acted on by Congress, no member shall be received into either house from any of the said so-called Confederate States; and all papers relating to the representation of said States shall be referred to the said committee without debate.

DECEMBER 12, 1865.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee of the two houses, to consist of fifteen members, to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America; and

The resolution was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That a joint committee of fifteen members shall be appointed, nine of whom shall be members of the House and six members of the Senate, who shall inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they, or any of them, are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress; with leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

DECEMBER 13, 1865.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk:

The House of Representatives has agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the resolution of the House for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 12, 1866.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States be authorized to send for persons and papers.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

By W. J. McDONALD, Chief Clerk.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 16, 1866.

Resolved, That the House concur in the foregoing resolution of the Senate.

Attest:

EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 14, 1865.

On motion of Mr. Wilson,

Resolved, That all papers which may be offered relative to the representation of the late so-called Confederate States of America, or either of them, shall be referred to the joint committee of fifteen without debate, and no members shall be admitted from either of said so-called States until Congress shall believe such States, or either of them, entitled to representation.

Attest:

EDWARD McPHERSON, Clerk.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 22, 1866.

Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, all papers presented to the Senate relating to the condition and title to representation of the so-called Confederate States shall be referred to the joint committee upon that subject.

Attest:

J. W. FORNEY, Secretary.

The following joint resolution and bills were reported to the Senate and House of Representatives April 30, 1866, viz:

JOINT RESOLUTION proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

SECTION 3. Until the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

SECTION 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

A BILL to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

Whereas it is expedient that the States lately in insurrection should, at the earliest day consistent with the future peace and safety of the Union, be restored to full participation in all political rights; and whereas the Congress did, by joint resolution, propose for ratification to the legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, an article in the following words, to wit:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor to deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever, in any State, the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such States shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.

"SECTION 3. Until the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

"SECTION 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in aid of insurrection or of war against the United States, or any claim for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.

"SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article:"

Now, therefore—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the senators and representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August five, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act.

A BILL declaring certain persons ineligible to office under the government of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no person shall be eligible to any office under the government of the United States who is included in any of the following classes, namely:

First. The President and Vice-President of the Confederate States of America, so called, and the heads of department thereof.

Second. Those who in other countries acted as agents of the Confederate States of America, so called.

Third. Heads of departments of the United States, officers of the army and navy of the United States, and all persons educated at the Military or Naval Academy of the United States, judges of the courts of the United States, and members of either house of the thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, who gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.

Fourth. Those who acted as officers of the Confederate States of America, so called, above the grade of colonel in the army or master in the navy; and any one who, as governor of either of the so-called Confederate States, gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.

Fifth. Those who have treated officers or soldiers or sailors of the army or navy of the United States, captured during the late war, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war.

The following is the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as passed finally June 13, 1866 :

JOINT RESOLUTION proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely :

ARTICLE 14.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

REPORT

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

The Joint Committee of the two houses of Congress appointed under the concurrent resolution of December 13, 1865, with direction 'to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress, with leave to report by bill or otherwise,' ask leave to report:

That they have attended to the duty assigned them as assiduously as other duties would permit, and now submit to Congress, as the result of their deliberations, a resolution proposing amendments to the Constitution, and two bills, of which they recommend the adoption.

Before proceeding to set forth in detail their reasons for the conclusion to which, after great deliberation, your committee have arrived, they beg leave to advert, briefly, to the course of proceedings they found it necessary to adopt, and to explain the reasons therefor.

The resolution under which your committee was appointed directed them to inquire into the condition of the Confederate States, and report whether they were entitled to representation in Congress. It is obvious that such an investigation, covering so large an extent of territory and involving so many important considerations, must necessarily require no trifling labor, and consume a very considerable amount of time. It must embrace the condition in which those States were left at the close of the war; the measures which have been taken towards the reorganization of civil government, and the disposition of the people towards the United States; in a word, their fitness to take an active part in the administration of national affairs.

As to their condition at the close of the rebellion, the evidence is open to all and admits of no dispute. They were in a state of utter exhaustion. Having protracted their struggle against federal authority until all hope of successful resistance had ceased, and laid down their arms only because there was no longer any power to use them, the people of those States were left bankrupt in their public finances, and shorn of the private wealth which had before given them power and influence. They were also necessarily in a state of complete anarchy, without governments and without the power to frame governments except by the permission of those who had been successful in the war. The President of the United States, in the proclamations under which he appointed provisional governors, and in his various communications to them, has, in exact terms, recognized the fact that the people of those States were, when the rebellion was crushed, "deprived of all civil government," and must proceed to organize anew. In his conversation with Mr. Stearns, of Mas-such as Massachusetts, certified by himself, President Johnson said, "the State institutions are prostrated, laid out on the ground, and they must be taken up and adapted to the progress of events." Finding the southern States in this condition, and Congress having failed to provide for the contingency, his duty was obvious. As President of the United States, he had no power, except to execute the laws of the land as Chief Magistrate. These laws gave him no authority over the subject of reorganization, but by the Constitution he was commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. The Confederate States embraced a portion of the people of the Union who had been in a state of revolt, but had been reduced to obedience by force of arms. They were in an abnormal condition, without civil government, without commercial connexions, without national or international relations, and subject only to martial law. By withdrawing their representatives in Congress, by renouncing the privilege of representation, by organizing a separate government, and by levying war against the United States, they destroyed their State constitutions in respect to the vital principle which connected their respective States with the Union and secured their federal relations; and nothing of those constitutions was left of which the United States were bound to take notice. For four years they had a de facto government, but it was usurped and illegal. They chose the tribunal of arms wherein to decide whether or not it should be legalized, and they were defeated. At the close of the rebellion, therefore, the people of the rebellious States were found, as the President expresses it, "deprived of all civil government."

Under this state of affairs it was plainly the duty of the President to enforce existing national laws, and to establish, as far as he could, such a system of government as might be provided for by existing national statutes. As commander-in-chief of a victorious army, it was his duty, under the law of nations and the army regulations, to restore order, to preserve property, and to protect the people against violence from any quarter until provision should be made by law for their government. He might, as President, assemble Congress and submit the whole matter to the law-making power; or he might continue military supervision and control until Congress should assemble on its regular appointed day. Selecting the latter alternative, he proceeded, by virtue of his power as commander-in-chief, to appoint provisional governors over the revolted States. These were regularly commissioned, and their compensation was paid, as the Secretary of War states, "from the appropriation for army contingencies, because the duties performed by the parties were regarded as of a temporary character, ancillary to the withdrawal of military force, the disbandment of armies, and the reduction of military expenditure, by provisional organizations for the protection of civil rights, the preservation of peace, and to take the place of armed force in the respective States." It cannot, we think, be contended that these governors possessed, or could exercise, any but military authority. They had no power to organize civil governments, nor to exercise any authority except that which inhered in their own persons under their commissions. Neither had the President, as commander-in-chief, any other than military power. But he was in exclusive possession of the military authority. It was for him to decide how far he would exercise it, how far he would relax it, when and on what terms he would withdraw it. He might properly permit the people to assemble, and to initiate local governments, and to execute such local laws as they might choose to frame not inconsistent with, nor in opposition to, the laws of the United States. And, if satisfied that they might safely be left to themselves, he might withdraw the military forces altogether, and leave the people of any or all of these States to govern themselves without his interference. In the language of the Secretary of State, in his telegram to the provisional governor of Georgia, dated October 28, 1865, he might "recognize the people of any State as having resumed the relations of loyalty to the Union," and act in his military capacity on this hypothesis. All this was within his own discretion, as military commander. But it was not for him to decide upon the nature or effect of any system of government which the people of these States might see fit to adopt. This power is lodged by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, that branch of the government in which is vested the authority to fix the political relations of the States to the Union, whose duty it is to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, and to protect each and all of them against foreign or domestic violence, and against each other. We cannot, therefore, regard the various acts of the President in relation to the formation of local governments in the insurrectionary States, and the conditions imposed by him upon their action, in any other light than as intimations to the people that, as commander-in-chief of the army, he would consent to withdraw military rule just in proportion as they should, by their acts, manifest a disposition to preserve order among themselves, establish governments denoting loyalty to the Union, and exhibit a settled determination to return to their allegiance, leaving with the law-making power to fix the terms of their final restoration to all their rights and privileges as States of the Union. That this was the view of his power taken by the President is evident from expressions to that effect in the communications of the Secretary of State to the various provisional governors, and the repeated declarations of the President himself. Any other supposition inconsistent with this would impute to the President designs of encroachment upon a co-ordinate branch of the government, which should not be lightly attributed to the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

When Congress assembled in December last the people of most of the States lately in rebellion had, under the advice of the President, organized local governments, and some of them had acceded to the terms proposed by him. In his annual message he stated, in general terms, what had been done, but he did not see fit to communicate the details for the information of Congress. While in this and in a subsequent message the President urged the speedy restoration of these States, and expressed the opinion that their condition was such as to justify their restoration, yet it is quite obvious that Congress must either have acted blindly on that opinion of the President, or proceeded to obtain the information requisite for intelligent action on the subject. The impropriety of proceeding wholly on the judgment of any one man, however exalted his station, in a matter involving the welfare of the republic in all future time, or of adopting any plan, coming from any source, without fully understanding all its bearings and comprehending its full effect, was apparent. The first step, therefore, was to obtain the required information. A call was accordingly made on the President for the information in his possession as to what had been done, in order that Congress might judge for itself as to the grounds of the belief expressed by him in the fitness of States recently in rebellion to participate fully in the conduct of national affairs. This information was not immediately communicated. When the response was finally made, some six weeks after your committee had been in actual session, it was found that the evidence upon which the President seemed to have based his suggestions was incomplete and unsatisfactory. Authenticated copies of the new constitutions and ordinances adopted by the conventions in three of the States had been submitted, extracts from newspapers furnished scanty information as to the action of one other State, and nothing appears to have been communicated as to the remainder. There was no evidence of the loyalty of those who had participated in these conventions, and in one State alone was any proposition made to submit the action of the conventions to the final judgment of the people.

Failing to obtain the desired information, and left to grope for light wherever it might be found, your committee did not deem it either advisable or safe to adopt, without further examination, the suggestions of the President, more especially as he had not deemed it expedient to remove the military force, to suspend martial law, or to restore the writ of habeas corpus, but still thought it necessary to exercise over the people of the rebellious States his military power and jurisdiction. This conclusion derived still greater force from the fact, undisputed, that in all these States, except Tennessee and perhaps Arkansas, the elections which were held for State officers and members of Congress had resulted, almost universally, in the defeat of candidates who had been true to the Union, and in the election of notorious and unpardoned rebels, men who could not take the prescribed oath of office, and who made no secret of their hostility to the government and the people of the United States. Under these circumstances, anything like hasty action would have been as dangerous as it was obviously unwise. It appeared to your committee that but one course remained, viz: to investigate carefully and thoroughly the state of feeling and opinion existing among the people of these States; to ascertain how far their pretended loyalty could be relied upon, and thence to infer whether it would be safe to admit them at once to a full participation in the government they had fought for four years to destroy. It was an equally important inquiry whether their restoration to their former relations with the United States should only be granted upon certain conditions and guarantees which would effectually secure the nation against a recurrence of evils so disastrous as those from which it had escaped at so enormous a sacrifice.

To obtain the necessary information recourse could only be had to the examination of witnesses whose position had given them the best means of forming an accurate judgment, who could state facts from their own observation, and whose character and standing afforded the best evidence of their truthfulness and impartiality. A work like this, covering so large an extent of territory, and embracing such complicated and extensive inquiries, necessarily required much time and labor. To shorten the time as much as possible, the work was divided and placed in the hands of four sub-committees, who have been diligently employed in its accomplishment. The results of their labors have been heretofore submitted, and the country will judge how far they sustain the President's views, and how far they justify the conclusions to which your committee have finally arrived.

A claim for the immediate admission of senators and representatives from the so-called Confederate States has been urged, which seems to your committee not to be founded either in reason or in law, and which cannot be passed without comment. Stated in a few words, it amounts to this: That inasmuch as the lately insurgent States had no legal right to separate themselves from the Union, they still retain their positions as States, and consequently the people thereof have a right to immediate representation in Congress without the imposition of any conditions whatever; and further, that until such admission Congress has no right to tax them for the support of the government. It has even been contended that until such admission all legislation affecting their interests is, if not unconstitutional, at least unjustifiable and oppressive.

It is believed by your committee that all these propositions are not only wholly untenable, but, if admitted, would tend to the destruction of the government.

It must not be forgotten that the people of these States, without justification or excuse, rose in insurrection against the United States. They deliberately abolished their State governments so far as the same connected them politically with the Union as members thereof under the Constitution. They deliberately renounced their allegiance to the federal government, and proceeded to establish an independent government for themselves. In the prosecution of this enterprise they seized the national forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and other public property within their borders, drove out from among them those who remained true to the Union, and heaped every imaginable insult and injury upon the United States and its citizens. Finally, they opened hostilities, and levied war against the government. They continued this war for four years with the most determined and malignant spirit, killing in battle, and otherwise, large numbers of loyal people, destroying the property of loyal citizens on the sea and on the land, and entailing on the government an enormous debt, incurred to sustain its rightful authority. Whether legally and constitutionally or not, they did, in fact, withdraw from the Union and made themselves subjects of another government of their own creation. And they only yielded when, after a long, bloody, and wasting war, they were compelled by utter exhaustion to lay down their arms; and this they did, not willingly, but declaring that they yielded because they could no longer resist, affording no evidence whatever of repentance for their crime, and expressing no regret, except that they had no longer the power to continue the desperate struggle.

It cannot, we think, be denied by any one, having a tolerable acquaintance with public law, that the war thus waged was a civil war of the greatest magnitude. The people waging it were necessarily subject to all the rules which, by the law of nations, control a contest of that character, and to all the legitimate consequences following it. One of those consequences was that, within the limits prescribed by humanity, the conquered rebels were at the mercy of the conquerors. That a government thus outraged had a most perfect right to exact indemnity for the injuries done, and security against the recurrence of such outrages in the future, would seem too clear for dispute. What the nature of that security should be, what proof should be required of a return to allegiance, what time should elapse before a people thus demoralized should be restored in full to the enjoyment of political rights and privileges, are questions for the law-making power to decide, and that decision must depend on grave considerations of the public safety and the general welfare.

It is moreover contended, and with apparent gravity, that, from the peculiar nature and character of our government, no such right on the part of the conqueror can exist; that from the moment when rebellion lays down its arms and actual hostilities cease, all political rights of rebellious communities are at once restored; that, because the people of a State of the Union were once an organized community within the Union, they necessarily so remain, and their right to be represented in Congress at any and all times, and to participate in the government of the country under all circumstances, admits of neither question nor dispute. If this is indeed true, then is the government of the United States powerless for its own protection, and flagrant rebellion, carried to the extreme of civil war, is a pastime which any State may play at, not only certain that it can lose nothing in any event, but may even be the gainer by defeat. If rebellion succeeds, it accomplishes its purpose and destroys the government. If it fails, the war has been barren of results, and the battle may be still fought out in the legislative halls of the country. Treason, defeated in the field, has only to take possession of Congress and the cabinet.

Your committee do not deem it either necessary or proper to discuss the question whether the late Confederate States are still States of this Union, or can ever be otherwise. Granting this profitless abstraction about which so many words have been wasted, it by no means follows that the people of those States may not place themselves in a condition to abrogate the powers and privileges incident to a State of the Union, and deprive themselves of all pretence of right to exercise those powers and enjoy those privileges. A State within the Union has obligations to discharge as a member of the Union. It must submit to federal laws and uphold federal authority. It must have a government republican in form, under and by which it is connected with the general government, and through which it can discharge its obligations. It is more than idle, it is a mockery, to contend that a people who have thrown off their allegiance, destroyed the local government which bound their States to the Union as members thereof, defied its authority, refused to execute its laws, and abrogated every provision which gave them political rights within the Union, still retain, through all, the perfect and entire right to resume, at their own will and pleasure, all their privileges within the Union, and especially to participate in its government, and to control the conduct of its affairs. To admit such a principle for one moment would be to declare that treason is always master and loyalty a blunder. Such a principle is void by its very nature and essence, because inconsistent with the theory of government, and fatal to its very existence.

On the contrary, we assert that no portion of the people of this country, whether in State or Territory, have the right, while remaining on its soil, to withdraw from or reject the authority of the United States. They must obey its laws as paramount, and acknowledge its jurisdiction. They have no right to secede; and while they can destroy their State governments, and place themselves beyond the pale of the Union, so far as the exercise of State privileges is concerned, they cannot escape the obligations imposed upon them by the Constitution and the laws, nor impair the exercise of national authority. The Constitution, it will be observed, does not act upon States, as such, but upon the people; while, therefore, the people cannot escape its authority, the States may, through the act of their people, cease to exist in an organized form, and thus dissolve their political relations with the United States.

That taxation should be only with the consent of the taxed, through their own representatives, is a cardinal principle of all free governments; but it is not true that taxation and representation must go together under all circumstances, and at every moment of time. The people of the District of Columbia and of the Territories are taxed, although not represented in Congress. If it is true that the people of the so-called Confederate States had no right to throw off the authority of the United States, it is equally true that they are bound at all times to share the burdens of government. They cannot, either legally or equitably, refuse to bear their just proportion of these burdens by voluntarily abdicating their rights and privileges as States of the Union, and refusing to be represented in the councils of the nation, much less by rebellion against national authority and levying war. To hold that by so doing they could escape taxation would be to offer a premium for insurrection—to reward instead of punishing treason. To hold that as soon as government is restored to its full authority it can be allowed no time to secure itself against similar wrongs in the future, or else omit the ordinary exercise of its constitutional power to compel equal contribution from all, towards the expenses of government, would be unreasonable in itself, and unjust to the nation. It is sufficient to reply that the loss of representation by the people of the insurrectionary States was their own voluntary choice. They might abandon their privileges, but they could not escape their obligations; and surely they have no right to complain if, before resuming those privileges, and while the people of the United States are devising measures for the public safety, rendered necessary by the act of those who thus disfranchised themselves, they are compelled to contribute their just proportion of the general burden of taxation incurred by their wickedness and folly.

Equally absurd is the pretence that the legislative authority of the nation must be inoperative so far as they are concerned; while they, by their own act, have lost the right to take part in it. Such a proposition carries its own refutation on its face.

While thus exposing fallacies which, as your committee believe, are resorted to for the purpose of misleading the people and distracting their attention from the questions at issue, we freely admit that such a condition of things should be brought, if possible, to a speedy termination. It is most desirable that the Union of all the States should become perfect at the earliest moment consistent with the peace and welfare of the nation; that all these States should become fully represented in the national councils, and take their share in the legislation of the country. The possession and exercise of more than its just share of power by any section is injurious, as well to that section as to all others. Its tendency is distracting and demoralizing, and such a state of affairs is only to be tolerated on the ground of a necessary regard to the public safety. As soon as that safety is secured it should terminate.

Your committee came to the consideration of the subject referred to them with the most anxious desire to ascertain what was the condition of the people of the States recently in insurrection, and what, if anything, was necessary to be done before restoring them to the full enjoyment of all their original privileges. It was undeniable that the war into which they had plunged the country had materially changed their relations to the people of the loyal States. Slavery had been abolished by constitutional amendment. A large proportion of the population had become, instead of mere chattels, free men and citizens. Through all the past struggle these had remained true and loyal, and had, in large numbers, fought on the side of the Union. It was impossible to abandon them, without securing them their rights as free men and citizens. The whole civilized world would have cried out against such base ingratitude, and the bare idea is offensive to all right-thinking men. Hence it became important to inquire what could be done to secure their rights, civil and political. It was evident to your committee that adequate security could only be found in appropriate constitutional provisions. By an original provision of the Constitution, representation is based on the whole number of free persons in each State, and three-fifths of all other persons. When all become free, representation for all necessarily follows. As a consequence the inevitable effect of the rebellion would be to increase the political power of the insurrectionary States, whenever they should be allowed to resume their positions as States of the Union. As representation is by the Constitution based upon population, your committee did not think it advisable to recommend a change of that basis. The increase of representation necessarily resulting from the abolition of slavery was considered the most important element in the questions arising out of the changed condition of affairs, and the necessity for some fundamental action in this regard seemed imperative. It appeared to your committee that the rights of these persons by whom the basis of representation had been thus increased should be recognized by the general government. While slaves they were not considered as having any rights, civil or political. It did not seem just or proper that all the political advantages derived from their becoming free should be confined to their former masters, who had fought against the Union, and withheld from themselves, who had always been loyal. Slavery, by building up a ruling and dominant class, had produced a spirit of oligarchy adverse to republican institutions, which finally inaugurated civil war. The tendency of continuing the domination of such a class, by leaving it in the exclusive possession of political power, would be to encourage the same spirit, and lead to a similar result. Doubts were entertained whether Congress had power, even under the amended Constitution, to prescribe the qualifications of voters in a State, or could act directly on the subject. It was doubtful, in the opinion of your committee, whether the States would consent to surrender a power they had always exercised, and to which they were attached. As the best if not the only method of surmounting the difficulty, and as eminently just and proper in itself, your committee came to the conclusion that political power should be possessed in all the States exactly in proportion as the right of suffrage should be granted, without distinction of color or race. This it was thought would leave the whole question with the people of each State, holding out to all the advantage of increased political power as an inducement to allow all to participate in its exercise. Such a provision would be in its nature gentle and persuasive, and would lead, it was hoped, at no distant day, to an equal participation of all, without distinction, in all the rights and privileges of citizenship, thus affording a full and adequate protection to all classes of citizens, since all would have, through the ballot-box, the power of self-protection.

Holding these views, your committee prepared an amendment to the Constitution to carry out this idea, and submitted the same to Congress. Unfortunately, as we think, it did not receive the necessary constitutional support in the Senate, and therefore could not be proposed for adoption by the States. The principle involved in that amendment is, however, believed to be sound, and your committee have again proposed it in another form, hoping that it may receive the approbation of Congress.

Your committee have been unable to find, in the evidence submitted to Congress by the President, under date of March 6, 1866, in compliance with the resolutions of January 5 and February 27, 1866, any satisfactory proof that either of the insurrectionary States, except, perhaps, the State of Tennessee, has placed itself in a condition to resume its political relations to the Union. The first step towards that end would necessarily be the establishment of a republican form of government by the people. It has been before remarked that the provisional governors, appointed by the President in the exercise of his military authority, could do nothing by virtue of the power thus conferred towards the establishment of a State government. They were acting under the War Department and paid out of its funds. They were simply bridging over the chasm between rebellion and restoration. And yet we find them calling conventions and convening legislatures. Not only this, but we find the conventions and legislatures thus convened acting under executive direction as to the provisions required to be adopted in their constitutions and ordinances as conditions precedent to their recognition by the President. The inducement held out by the President for compliance with the conditions imposed was, directly in one instance, and presumably, therefore, in others, the immediate admission of senators and representatives to Congress. The character of the conventions and legislatures thus assembled was not such as to inspire confidence in the good faith of their members. Governor Perry, of South Carolina, dissolved the convention assembled in that State before the suggestion had reached Columbia from Washington that the rebel war debt should be repudiated, and gave as his reason that it was a "revolutionary body." There is no evidence of the loyalty or disloyalty of the members of those conventions and legislatures except the fact of pardons being asked for on their account. Some of these States now claiming representation refused to adopt the conditions imposed. No reliable information is found in these papers as to the constitutional provisions of several of these States, while in not one of them is there the slightest evidence to show that these "amended constitutions," as they are called, have ever been submitted to the people for their adoption. In North Carolina alone an ordinance was passed to that effect, but it does not appear to have been acted on. Not one of them, therefore, has been ratified. Whether, with President Johnson, we adopt the theory that the old constitutions were abrogated and destroyed, and the people "deprived of all civil government," or whether we adopt the alternative doctrine that they were only suspended and were revived by the suppression of the rebellion, the new provisions must be considered as equally destitute of validity before adoption by the people. If the conventions were called for the sole purpose of putting the State government into operation, they had no power either to adopt a new constitution or to amend an old one without the consent of the people. Nor could either a convention or a legislature change the fundamental law without power previously conferred. In the view of your committee, it follows, therefore, that the people of a State where the constitution has been thus amended might feel themselves justified in repudiating altogether all such unauthorized assumptions of power, and might be expected to do so at pleasure.

So far as the disposition of the people of the insurrectionary States, and the probability of their adopting measures conforming to the changed condition of affairs, can be inferred from the papers submitted by the President as the basis of his action, the prospects are far from encouraging. It appears quite clear that the anti-slavery amendments, both to the State and federal constitutions, were adopted with reluctance by the bodies which did adopt them, while in some States they have been either passed by in silence or rejected. The language of all the provisions and ordinances of these States on the subject amounts to nothing more than an unwilling admission of an unwelcome truth. As to the ordinance of secession, it is, in some cases, declared "null and void," and in others simply "repealed;" and in no instance is a refutation of this deadly heresy considered worthy of a place in the new constitution.

If, as the President assumes, these insurrectionary States were, at the close of the war, wholly without State governments, it would seem that, before being admitted to participation in the direction of public affairs, such governments should be regularly organized. Long usage has established, and numerous statutes have pointed out, the mode in which this should be done. A convention to frame a form of government should be assembled under competent authority. Ordinarily, this authority emanates from Congress; but, under the peculiar circumstances, your committee is not disposed to criticise the President's action in assuming the power exercised by him in this regard. The convention, when assembled, should frame a constitution of government, which should be submitted to the people for adoption. If adopted, a legislature should be convened to pass the laws necessary to carry it into effect. When a State, thus organized, claims representation in Congress, the election of representatives should be provided for by law, in accordance with the laws of Congress regulating representation, and the proof that the action taken has been in conformity to law should be submitted to Congress.

In no case have these essential preliminary steps been taken. The conventions assembled seem to have assumed that the constitutions which had been repudiated and overthrown were still in existence, and operative to constitute the States members of the Union, and to have contented themselves with such amendments as they were informed were requisite in order to insure their return to an immediate participation in the government of the United States. Not waiting to ascertain whether the people they represented would adopt even the proposed amendments, they at once ordered elections of representatives to Congress, in nearly all instances before an executive had been chosen to issue writs of election under the State laws, and such elections as were held were ordered by the conventions. In one instance at least the writs of election were signed by the provisional governor. Glaring irregularities, and unwarranted assumptions of power, are manifest in several cases, particularly in South Carolina, where the convention, although disbanded by the provisional governor on the ground that it was a revolutionary body, assumed to redistrict the State.

It is quite evident from all these facts, and indeed from the whole mass of testimony submitted by the President to the Senate, that in no instance was regard paid to any other consideration than obtaining immediate admission to Congress, under the barren form of an election in which no precautions were taken to secure regularity of proceedings, or the assent of the people. No constitution has been legally adopted except, perhaps, in the State of Tennessee, and such elections as have been held were without authority of law. Your committee are accordingly forced to the conclusion that the States referred to have not placed themselves in a condition to claim representation in Congress, unless all the rules which have, since the foundation of the government, been deemed essential in such cases, should be disregarded.

It would undoubtedly be competent for Congress to waive all formalities and to admit these Confederate States to representation at once, trusting that time and experience would set all things right. Whether it would be advisable to do so, however, must depend upon other considerations of which it remains to treat. But it may well be observed, that the inducements to such a step should be of the very highest character. It seems to your committee not unreasonable to require satisfactory evidence that the ordinances and constitutional provisions which the President deemed essential in the first instance will be permanently adhered to by the people of the States seeking restoration, after being admitted to full participation in the government, and will not be repudiated when that object shall have been accomplished. And here the burden of proof rests upon the late insurgents who are seeking restoration to the rights and privileges which they willingly abandoned, and not upon the people of the United States who have never undertaken, directly or indirectly, to deprive them thereof. It should appear affirmatively that they are prepared and disposed in good faith to accept the results of the war, to abandon their hostility to the government, and to live in peace and amity with the people of the loyal States, extending to all classes of citizens equal rights and privileges, and conforming to the republican idea of liberty and equality. They should exhibit in their acts something more than an unwilling submission to an unavoidable necessity—a feeling, if not cheerful, certainly not offensive and defiant. And they should evince an entire repudiation of all hostility to the general government, by an acceptance of such just and reasonable conditions as that government should think the public safety demands. Has this been done? Let us look at the facts shown by the evidence taken by the committee.

Hardly is the war closed before the people of these insurrectionary States come forward and haughtily claim, as a right, the privilege of participating at once in that government which they had for four years been fighting to overthrow. Allowed and encouraged by the Executive to organize State governments, they at once place in power leading rebels, unrepentant and unpardoned, excluding with contempt those who had manifested an attachment to the Union, and preferring, in many instances, those who had rendered themselves the most obnoxious. In the face of the law requiring an oath which would necessarily exclude all such men from federal offices, they elect, with very few exceptions, as senators and representatives in Congress, men who had actively participated in the rebellion, insultingly denouncing the law as unconstitutional. It is only necessary to instance the election to the Senate of the late vice-president of the confederacy, a man who, against his own declared convictions, had lent all the weight of his acknowledged ability and of his influence as a most prominent public man to the cause of the rebellion, and who, unpardoned rebel as he is, with that oath staring him in the face, had the assurance to lay his credentials on the table of the Senate. Other rebels of scarcely less note or notoriety were selected from other quarters. Professing no repentance, glorying apparently in the crime they had committed, avowing still, as the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Stephens and many others proves, an adherence to the pernicious doctrine of secession; and declaring that they yielded only to necessity, they insist, with unanimous voice, upon their rights as States, and proclaim that they will submit to no conditions whatever as preliminary to their resumption of power under that Constitution which they still claim the right to repudiate.

Examining the evidence taken by your committee still further, in connexion with facts too notorious to be disputed, it appears that the southern press, with few exceptions, and those mostly of newspapers recently established by northern men, abounds with weekly and daily abuse of the institutions and people of the loyal States; defends the men who led, and the principles which incited, the rebellion; denounces and reviles southern men who adhered to the Union; and strives, constantly and unscrupulously, by every means in its power, to keep alive the fire of hate and discord between the sections; calling upon the President to violate his oath of office, overturn the government by force of arms, and drive the representatives of the people from their seats in Congress. The national banner is openly insulted, and the national airs scoffed at, not only by the ignorant populace, but at public meetings, and once, among other notable instances, at a dinner given in honor of a notorious rebel who had violated his oath and abandoned his flag. The same individual is elected to an important office in the leading city of his State, although an unpardoned rebel, and so offensive that the President refuses to allow him to enter upon his official duties. In another State the leading general of the rebel armies is openly nominated for governor by the speaker of the house of delegates, and the nomination is hailed by the people with shouts of satisfaction, and openly indorsed by the press.

Looking still further at the evidence taken by your committee, it is found to be clearly shown by witnesses of the highest character and having the best means of observation, that the Freedmen's Bureau, instituted for the relief and protection of freedmen and refugees, is almost universally opposed by the mass of the population; and exists in an efficient condition only under military protection, while the Union men of the south are earnest in its defence, declaring with one voice that without its protection the colored people would not be permitted to labor at fair prices, and could hardly live in safety. They also testify that without the protection of United States troops, Union men, whether of northern or southern origin, would be obliged to abandon their homes. The feeling in many portions of the country towards emancipated slaves, especially among the uneducated and ignorant, is one of vindictive and malicious hatred. This deep-seated prejudice against color is assiduously cultivated by the public journals, and leads to acts of cruelty, oppression, and murder, which the local authorities are at no pains to prevent or punish. There is no general disposition to place the colored race, constituting at least two-fifths of the population, upon terms even of civil equality. While many instances may be found where large planters and men of the better class accept the situation, and honestly strive to bring about a better order of things, by employing the freedmen at fair wages and treating them kindly, the general feeling and disposition among all classes are yet totally averse to the toleration of any class of people friendly to the Union, be they white or black; and this aversion is not unfrequently manifested in an insulting and offensive manner.

The witnesses examined as to the willingness of the people of the south to contribute, under existing laws, to the payment of the national debt, prove that the taxes levied by the United States will be paid only on compulsion and with great reluctance, while there prevails, to a considerable extent, an expectation that compensation will be made for slaves emancipated and property destroyed during the war. The testimony on this point comes from officers of the Union army, officers of the late rebel army, Union men of the southern States, and avowed secessionists, almost all of whom state that, in their opinion, the people of the rebellious States would, if they should see a prospect of success, repudiate the national debt.

While there is scarcely any hope or desire among leading men to renew the attempt at secession at any future time, there is still, according to a large number of witnesses, including A. H. Stephens, who may be regarded as good authority on that point, a generally prevailing opinion which defends the legal right of secession, and upholds the doctrine that the first allegiance of the people is due to the States, and not to the United States. This belief evidently prevails among leading and prominent men as well as among the masses everywhere, except in some of the northern counties of Alabama and the eastern counties of Tennessee.

The evidence of an intense hostility to the federal Union, and an equally intense love of the late confederacy, nurtured by the war, is decisive. While it appears that nearly all are willing to submit, at least for the time being, to the federal authority, it is equally clear that the ruling motive is a desire to obtain the advantages which will be derived from a representation in Congress. Officers of the Union army on duty, and northern men who go south to engage in business, are generally detested and proscribed. Southern men who adhered to the Union are bitterly hated and relentlessly persecuted. In some localities prosecutions have been instituted in State courts against Union officers for acts done in the line of official duty, and similar prosecutions are threatened elsewhere as soon as the United States troops are removed. All such demonstrations show a state of feeling against which it is unmistakably necessary to guard.

The testimony is conclusive that after the collapse of the confederacy the feeling of the people of the rebellious States was that of abject submission. Having appealed to the tribunal of arms, they had no hope except that by the magnanimity of their conquerors their lives, and possibly their property, might be preserved. Unfortunately, the general issue of pardons to persons who had been prominent in the rebellion, and the feeling of kindness and conciliation manifested by the Executive, and very generally indicated through the northern press, had the effect to render whole communities forgetful of the crime they had committed, defiant towards the federal government, and regardless of their duties as citizens. The conciliatory measures of the government do not seem to have been met even half way. The bitterness and defiance exhibited toward the United States under such circumstances is without a parallel in the history of the world. In return for our leniency we receive only an insulting denial of our authority. In return for our kind desire for the resumption of fraternal relations we receive only an insolent assumption of rights and privileges long since forfeited. The crime we have punished is paraded as a virtue, and the principles of republican government which we have vindicated at so terrible a cost are denounced as unjust and oppressive.

If we add to this evidence the fact that, although peace has been declared by the President, he has not, to this day, deemed it safe to restore the writ of habeas corpus, to relieve the insurrectionary States of martial law, nor to withdraw the troops from many localities, and that the commanding general deems an increase of the army indispensable to the preservation of order and the protection of loyal and well-disposed people in the south, the proof of a condition of feeling hostile to the Union and dangerous to the government throughout the insurrectionary States would seem to be overwhelming.

With such evidence before them, it is the opinion of your committee—

I. That the States lately in rebellion were, at the close of the war, disorganized communities, without civil government, and without constitutions or other forms, by virtue of which political relations could legally exist between them and the federal government.

II. That Congress cannot be expected to recognize as valid the election of representatives from disorganized communities, which, from the very nature of the case, were unable to present their claim to representation under those established and recognized rules, the observance of which has been hitherto required.

III. That Congress would not be justified in admitting such communities to a participation in the government of the country without first providing such constitutional or other guarantees as will tend to secure the civil rights of all citizens of the republic; a just equality of representation; protection against claims founded in rebellion and crime; a temporary restoration of the right of suffrage to those who have not actively participated in the efforts to destroy the Union and overthrow the government, and the exclusion from positions of public trust of, at least, a portion of those whose crimes have proved them to be enemies to the Union, and unworthy of public confidence.

Your committee will, perhaps, hardly be deemed excusable for extending this report further; but inasmuch as immediate and unconditional representation of the States lately in rebellion is demanded as a matter of right, and delay and even hesitation is denounced as grossly oppressive and unjust, as well as unwise and impolitic, it may not be amiss again to call attention to a few undisputed and notorious facts, and the principles of public law applicable thereto; in order that the propriety of that claim may be fully considered and well understood.

The State of Tennessee occupies a position distinct from all the other insurrectionary States, and has been the subject of a separate report which your committee have not thought it expedient to disturb. Whether Congress shall see fit to make that State the subject of separate action, or to include it in the same category with all others, so far as concerns the imposition of preliminary conditions, it is not within the province of this committee either to determine or advise.

To ascertain whether any of the so-called Confederate States "are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress," the essential inquiry is, whether there is, in any one of them, a constituency qualified to be represented in Congress. The question how far persons claiming seats in either house possess the credentials necessary to enable them to represent a duly qualified constituency is one for the consideration of each house separately, after the preliminary question shall have been finally determined.

We now propose to re-state, as briefly as possible, the general facts and principles applicable to all the States recently in rebellion :

First. The seats of the senators and representatives from the so-called Confederate States became vacant in the year 1861, during the second session of the thirty-sixth Congress, by the voluntary withdrawal of their incumbents, with the sanction and by direction of the legislatures or conventions of their respective States. This was done as a hostile act against the Constitution and government of the United States, with a declared intent to overthrow the same by forming a southern confederation. This act of declared hostility was speedily followed by an organization of the same States into a confederacy, which levied and waged war, by sea and land, against the United States. This war continued more than four years, within which period the rebel armies besieged the national capital, invaded the loyal States, burned their towns and cities, robbed their citizens, destroyed more than 250,000 loyal soldiers, and imposed an increased national burden of not less than $3,500,000,000, of which seven or eight hundred millions have already been met and paid. From the time these confederated States thus withdrew their representation in Congress and levied war against the United States, the great mass of their people became and were insurgents, rebels, traitors, and all of them assumed and occupied the political, legal, and practical relation of enemies of the United States. This position is established by acts of Congress and judicial decisions, and is recognized repeatedly by the President in public proclamations, documents, and speeches.

Second. The States thus confederated prosecuted their war against the United States to final arbitrament, and did not cease until all their armies were captured, their military power destroyed, their civil officers, State and confederate, taken prisoners or put to flight, every vestige of State and confederate government obliterated, their territory overrun and occupied by the federal armies, and their people reduced to the condition of enemies conquered in war, entitled only by public law to such rights, privileges, and conditions as might be vouchsafed by the conqueror. This position is also established by judicial decisions, and is recognized by the President in public proclamations, documents, and speeches.

Third. Having voluntarily deprived themselves of representation in Congress for the criminal purpose of destroying the federal Union, and having reduced themselves, by the act of levying war, to the condition of public enemies, they have no right to complain of temporary exclusion from Congress; but, on the contrary, having voluntarily renounced the right to representation, and disqualified themselves by crime from participating in the government, the burden now rests upon them, before claiming to be reinstated in their former condition, to show that they are qualified to resume federal relations. In order to do this, they must prove that they have established, with the consent of the people, republican forms of government in harmony with the Constitution and laws of the United States, that all hostile purposes have ceased, and should give adequate guarantees against future treason and rebellion—guarantees which shall prove satisfactory to the government against which they rebelled, and by whose arms they were subdued.

Fourth. Having, by this treasonable withdrawal from Congress, and by flagrant rebellion and war, forfeited all civil and political rights and privileges under the federal Constitution, they can only be restored thereto by the permission and authority of that constitutional power against which they rebelled and by which they were subdued.

Fifth. These rebellious enemies were conquered by the people of the United States, acting through all the co-ordinate branches of the government, and not by the executive department alone. The powers of conqueror are not so vested in the President that he can fix and regulate the terms of settlement and confer congressional representation on conquered rebels and traitors. Nor can he, in any way, qualify enemies of the government to exercise its law-making power. The authority to restore rebels to political power in the federal government can be exercised only with the concurrence of all the departments in which political power is vested; and hence the several proclamations of the President to the people of the Confederate States cannot be considered as extending beyond the purposes declared, and can only be regarded as provisional permission by the commander-in-chief of the army to do certain acts, the effect and validity whereof is to be determined by the constitutional government, and not solely by the executive power.

Sixth. The question before Congress is, then, whether conquered enemies have the right, and shall be permitted at their own pleasure and on their own terms, to participate in making laws for their conquerors; whether conquered rebels may change their theatre of operations from the battle-field, where they were defeated and overthrown, to the halls of Congress, and, through their representatives, seize upon the government which they fought to destroy; whether the national treasury, the army of the nation, its navy, its forts and arsenals, its whole civil administration, its credit, its pensioners, the widows and orphans of those who perished in the war, the public honor, peace and safety, shall all be turned over to the keeping of its recent enemies without delay, and without imposing such conditions as, in the opinion of Congress, the security of the country and its institutions may demand.

Seventh. The history of mankind exhibits no example of such madness and folly. The instinct of self-preservation protests against it. The surrender by Grant to Lee, and by Sherman to Johnston, would have been disasters of less magnitude, for new armies could have been raised, new battles fought, and the government saved. The anti-coercive policy, which, under pretext of avoiding bloodshed, allowed the rebellion to take form and gather force, would be surpassed in infamy by the matchless wickedness that would now surrender the halls of Congress to those so recently in rebellion until proper precautions shall have been taken to secure the national faith and the national safety.

Eighth. As has been shown in this report, and in the evidence submitted, no proof has been afforded to Congress of a constituency in any one of the so-called Confederate States, unless we except the State of Tennessee, qualified to elect senators and representatives in Congress. No State constitution, or amendment to a State constitution, has had the sanction of the people. All the so-called legislation of State conventions and legislatures has been had under military dictation. If the President may, at his will, and under his own authority, whether as military commander or chief executive, qualify persons to appoint senators and elect representatives, and empower others to appoint and elect them, he thereby practically controls the organization of the legislative department. The constitutional form of government is thereby practically destroyed, and its powers absorbed in the Executive. And while your committee do not for a moment impute to the President any such design, but cheerfully concede to him the most patriotic motives, they cannot but look with alarm upon a precedent so fraught with danger to the republic.

Ninth. The necessity of providing adequate safeguards for the future, before restoring the insurrectionary States to a participation in the direction of public affairs, is apparent from the bitter hostility to the government and people of the United States yet existing throughout the conquered territory, as proved incontestably by the testimony of many witnesses and by undisputed facts.

Tenth. The conclusion of your committee therefore is, that the so-called Confederate States are not, at present, entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States; that, before allowing such representation, adequate security for future peace and safety should be required; that this can only be found in such changes of the organic law as shall determine the civil rights and privileges of all citizens in all parts of the republic, shall place representation on an equitable basis, shall fix a stigma upon treason, and protect the loyal people against future claims for the expenses incurred in support of rebellion and for manumitted slaves, together with an express grant of power in Congress to enforce those provisions. To this end they offer a joint resolution for amending the Constitution of the United States, and the two several bills designed to carry the same into effect, before referred to.

Before closing this report, your committee beg leave to state that the specific recommendations submitted by them are the result of mutual concession, after a long and careful comparison of conflicting opinions. Upon a question of such magnitude, infinitely important as it is to the future of the republic, it was not to be expected that all should think alike. Sensible of the imperfections of the scheme, your committee submit it to Congress as the best they could agree upon, in the hope that its imperfections may be cured, and its deficiencies supplied, by legislative wisdom; and that, when finally adopted, it may tend to restore peace and harmony to the whole country, and to place our republican institutions on a more stable foundation.

JOINT RESOLUTION proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely :

ARTICLE 14.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

RECONSTRUCTION.

JUNE 20, 1866.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Select Committee on Reconstruction, submitted the following as the VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a minority of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, constituted under the concurrent resolution of the 13th of December, 1865, making it their duty to "inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called Confederate States of America, and to report whether they or any of them are entitled to be represented in either house of Congress, with leave to report by bill or otherwise," not being able to concur in the measures recommended by the majority, or in the grounds upon which they base them, beg leave to report:

In order to obtain a correct apprehension of the subject, and as having a direct bearing upon it, the undersigned think it all important clearly to ascertain what was the effect of the late insurrection upon the relations of the States where it prevailed, to the general government, and of the people collectively and individually of such States. To this inquiry they therefore first address themselves.

First, as to the States. Did the insurrection at its commencement, or at any subsequent time, legally dissolve the connexion between those States and the general government? In our judgment, so far from this being a "profitless abstraction," it is a vital inquiry. For if that connexion was not disturbed, such States during the entire rebellion were as completely component States of the United States as they were before the rebellion, and were bound by all the obligations which the Constitution imposes, and entitled to all its privileges. Was not this their condition?

○ The opposite view alone can justify the denial of such rights and privileges. That a State of the Union can exist without possessing them is inconsistent with the very nature of the government and terms of the Constitution. In its nature the government is formed of and by States possessing equal rights and powers. States unequal are not known to the Constitution. In its original formation perfect equality was secured. They were granted the same representation in the Senate, and the same right to be represented in the House of Representatives; the difference in the latter being regulated only by a difference in population. But every State, however small its population, was secured one representative in that branch. Each State was given the right, and the same right, to participate in the election of President and Vice-President, and all alike were secured the benefit of the judicial department. The Constitution, too, was submitted to the people of each State separately, and adopted by them in that capacity. The convention which framed it considered, as they were bound to do, each as a separate sovereignty that could not be subjected to the Constitution except by its own consent. That consent was consequently asked and given. The equality, therefore, of rights was the condition of the original thirteen States before the government was formed, and such equality was not only not interfered with, but guaranteed to them as well in regard to the powers conferred upon the general government, as to those reserved to the States or to the people of the States.

The same equality is secured to the States which have been admitted into the Union since the constitution was adopted. In each instance the State admitted has been "declared to be one of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

The Constitution, too, so far as most of the powers it contains are concerned, operates directly upon the people in their individual and aggregate capacity, and on all alike. Each citizen, therefore, of every State owes the same allegiance to the general government, and is entitled to the same protection. The obligation of this allegiance it is not within the legal power of his State or of himself to annul or evade. It is made paramount and perpetual, and for that very reason it is equally the paramount duty of the general government to allow to the citizens of each State, and to the State, the rights secured to both, and the protection necessary to their full enjoyment. A citizen may, no doubt, forfeit such rights by committing a crime against the United States upon conviction of the same, where such forfeiture by law antecedently passed is made a part of the punishment. But a State cannot in its corporate capacity be made liable to such a forfeiture, for a State, as such, under the Constitution, cannot commit or be indicted for a crime. No legal proceeding, criminal or civil, can be instituted to deprive a State of the benefits of the Constitution, by forfeiting as against her any of the rights it secures. Her citizens, be they few or many, may be proceeded against under the law and convicted, but the State remains a State of the Union. To concede that, by the illegal conduct of her own citizens, she can be withdrawn from the Union, is virtually to concede the right of secession. For what difference does it make as regards the result whether a State can rightfully secede, (a doctrine, by-the-by, heretofore maintained by statesmen north as well as south,) or whether by the illegal conduct of her citizens she ceases to be a State of the Union? In either case the end is the same. The only difference is that by the one theory she ceases by law to be such a State, and by the other by crime, without and against law. But the doctrine is wholly erroneous. A State once in the Union must abide in it forever. She can never withdraw from or be expelled from it. A different principle would subject the Union to dissolution at any moment. It is, therefore, alike perilous and unsound.

Nor do we see that it has any support in the measures recommended by the majority of the committee. The insurrectionary States are by these measures conceded to be States of the Union. The proposed constitutional amendment is to be submitted to them as well as to the other States. In this respect each is placed on the same ground. To consult a State not in the Union on the propriety of adopting a constitutional amendment to the government of the Union, and which is necessarily to affect those States only composing the Union, would be an absurdity; and to allow an amendment which States in the Union might desire, to be defeated by the votes of States not in the Union, would be alike nonsensical and unjust. The very measure, therefore, of submitting to all the States forming the Union before the insurrection a constitutional amendment, makes the inquiry, whether all at this time are in or out of the Union, a vital one. If they are not, all should not be consulted; if they are, they should be, and should be only because they are. The very fact, therefore, of such a submission concedes that the southern States are, and never ceased to be, States of the Union.

Tested, therefore, either by the nature of our government or by the terms of the Constitution, the insurrection now happily and utterly suppressed has in no respect changed the relations of the States, where it prevailed, to the general government. On the contrary, they are to all intents and purposes as completely States of the Union as they ever were. In further support of this proposition, if it needed any, we may confidently appeal to the fact just stated, that the very measure recommended, a constitutional amendment to be submitted to such States, furnishes such support; for, looking to and regarding the rights of the other States, such a submission has no warrant or foundation except upon the hypothesis that they are as absolutely States of the Union as any of the other States. It can never be under any circumstances a "profitless abstraction" whether under the Constitution a State is or is not a State of the Union. It can never be such an abstraction whether the people of a State once in the Union can voluntarily or by compulsion escape or be freed from the obligations it enjoins, or be deprived of the rights it confers or the protection it affords.

A different doctrine necessarily leads to a dissolution of the Union. The Constitution supposes that insurrections may exist in a State, and provides for their suppression by giving Congress the power to "call forth the militia" for the purpose. The power is not to subjugate the State within whose limits the insurrection may prevail, and to extinguish it as a State, but to preserve it as such by subduing the rebellion, by acting on the individual persons engaged in it, and not on the State at all. The power is altogether conservative; it is to protect a State, not to destroy it; to prevent her being taken out of the Union by individual crime, not in any contingency to put her out or keep her out.

The continuance of the Union of all the States is necessary to the intended existence of the government. The government is formed by a constitutional association of States, and its integrity depends on the continuance of the entire association. If one State is withdrawn from it by any cause, to that extent is the Union dissolved. Those that remain may exist as a government, but it is not the very government the Constitution designs. That consists of all, and its character is changed and its power is diminished by the absence of any one.

A different principle leads to a disintegration that must sooner or later result in the separation of all, and the consequent destruction of the government. To suppose that a power to preserve may, at the option of the body to which it is given, be used to destroy, is a proposition repugnant to common sense; and yet, as the late insurrection was put down by means of that power, that being the only one conferred upon Congress to that end, that proposition is the one on which alone it can be pretended that the southern States are not in the Union now as well as at first.

The idea that the war power, as such, has been used, or could have been used, to extinguish the rebellion is, in the judgment of the undersigned, utterly without foundation. That power was given for a different contingency—for the contingency of a conflict with other governments, an international conflict. If it had been thought that that power was to be resorted to to suppress a domestic strife, the words "appropriate to that object" would have been used. But so far from this having been done, in the same section that confers it an express provision is inserted to meet the exigency of a domestic strife, or insurrection. To subdue that, authority is given to call out the militia. Whether, in the progress of the effort to suppress an insurrection, the rights incident to war as between the United States and foreign nations may not arise, is a question which in no way changes the character of the contest as between the government and the insurrectionists. The exercise of such rights may be found convenient, or become necessary for the suppression of the rebellion, but the character of the conflict is in no way changed by a resort to them. That remains, as at first, and must from its very nature during its continuance remain, a mere contest in which the government seeks, and can only seek, to put an end to the rebellion. That achieved, the original condition of things is at once restored. Two judicial decisions have been made, by judges of eminent and unquestioned ability, which fully sustain our view. In one, that of the Amey Warbick, before the United States district court of Massachusetts, Judge Sprague, referring to the supposed effect of the belligerent rights which it was conceded belonged to the government during the rebellion, by giving it, when suppressed, the rights of conquest, declared :

" It has been supposed that if the government have the right of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest ; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political advantages, and treated as foreign territory conquered by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute, unlimited sovereign rights, but no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within, takes and holds possession and dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation, by force of arms, expel or overthrow the enemy, and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title, and merely regains the possession of that of which it has been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights.

" When the United States take possession of a rebel district, they merely vindicate their pre-existing title. Under despotic governments confiscation may be unlimited, but under our government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before."

In the other, an application for habeas corpus to Mr. Justice Nelson, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, by James Egan, to be discharged from an imprisonment to which he had been sentenced by a military commission in South Carolina, for the offence of murder alleged to have been committed in that State, and the discharge was ordered, and in an opinion evidently carefully prepared, among other things, said :

" For all that appears, the civil local courts of the State of South Carolina were in the full exercise of their judicial functions at the time of this trial, as restored by the suppression of the rebellion, some seven months previously, and by the revival of the laws and the reorganization of the State in obedience to, and in conformity with, its constitutional duties to the Union. Indeed, long previous to this the provisional government had been appointed by the President, who is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, (and whose will under martial law constituted the only rule of action,) for the special purpose of changing the existing state of things, and restoring the civil government over the people. In operation of this appointment, a new constitution had been formed, a governor and legislature elected under it, and the State placed in the full enjoyment, or entitled to the full enjoyment, of all her constitutional rights and privileges. The constitutional laws of the Union were thereby enjoyed and obeyed, and were as authoritative and binding over the people of the State as in any other portion of the country. Indeed, the moment the rebellion was suppressed, and the government growing out of it subverted, the ancient laws resumed their accustomed sway, subject only to the new reorganization by the appointment of the proper officer to give them operation and effect. This organization and appointment of the public functionaries, which was under the superintendence and direction of the President, the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the country, and who, as such, had previously governed the State, from imperative necessity, by the force of martial law, had already taken place, and the necessity no longer existed."

This opinion is the more authoritative than it might possibly be esteemed otherwise, from its being the first elaborate statement of the reasons which governed the majority of the Supreme Court at the last term, in their judgment in the case of Milligan and others, that military commissions for the trial of civilians are not constitutional. Mr. Justice Nelson was one of that majority, and of course was advised of the grounds of their decision. We submit that nothing could be more conclusive in favor of the doctrine for which they are cited, than these judgments. In the one the proposition of conquest of a State as a right under the war to suppress the insurrection is not only repudiated by Judge Sprague, but, because of the nature of our government, is considered to be legally impossible. "The right of sovereignty over any portion of a State will," he tells us, "only be the same after the war as it was before. In the other we are told "that the suppression of the rebellion restores the courts of the State, and that when her government is reorganized she at once is "in the full enjoyment, or entitled to the full enjoyment, of all her constitutional rights and privileges."

Again, a contrary doctrine is inconsistent with the obligation which the government is under to each citizen of a State. Protection to each is a part of that obligation—protection not only as against a foreign, but a domestic foe. To hold that it is in the power of any part of the people of a State, whether they constitute a majority or minority, by engaging in insurrection and adopting any measure in its prosecution to make citizens who are not engaged in it, but opposed to it, enemies of the United States, having no right to the protection which the Constitution affords to citizens who are true to their allegiance, is as illegal as it would be flagrantly unjust. During the conflict the exigency of the strife may justify a denial of such protection, and subject the unoffending citizen to inconvenience or loss; but the conflict over the exigency ceases, and the obligation to afford him all the immunities and advantages of the Constitution, one of which is the right to be represented in Congress, becomes absolute and imperative. A different rule would enable the government to escape a clear duty, and to commit a gross violation of the Constitution. It has been said that the Supreme Court have entertained a different doctrine in the prize cases. This, in the judgment of the undersigned, is a clear misapprehension. One of the questions in those cases was, whether in such a contest as was being waged for the extinguishment of the insurrection, belligerent rights, as between the United States and other nations, belonged to the former. The court properly held that they did; but the parties engaged in the rebellion were designated as traitors, and liable to be tried as traitors when the rebellion should terminate. If the Confederate States, by force of insurrection, became foreign States and lost their character as States of the Union, then the contest was an international one, and treason was no more committed by citizens of the former against the latter than by those of the latter against the former. Treason necessarily assumes allegiance to the government, and allegiance necessarily assumes a continuing obligation to the government. Neither predicament was true, except upon the hypothesis that the old state of things continued. In other words, that the States, notwithstanding the insurrection, were continuously, and are now, States of the United States, and their citizens responsible to the Constitution and the laws. Second, what is there, then, in the present political condition of such States that justifies their exclusion from representation in Congress? Is it because they are without organized governments, or without governments republican in point of form? In fact, we know that they have governments completely organized with legislative, executive and judicial functions. We know that they are now in successful operation; no one within their limits questions their legality, or is denied their protection. How they were formed, under what auspices they were formed, are inquiries with which Congress has no concern. The right of the people of a State to form a government for themselves has never been questioned. In the absence of any restriction that right would be absolute, any form could be adopted that they might determine upon. The Constitution imposes but a single restriction—that the government adopted shall be "of a republican form," and this is done in the obligation to guarantee every State such a form. It gives no power to frame a constitution for a State. It operates alone upon one already formed by the State. In the words of the Federalist, (No. 44,) "it supposes a pre-existing government of the form which is to be guaranteed." It is not pretended that the existing governments of the States in question are not of the required form. The objection is that they were not legally established. But it is confidently submitted that that is a matter with which Congress has nothing to do. The power to establish or modify a State government belongs exclusively to the people of the State. When they shall exercise it, how they shall exercise it, what provisions it shall contain, it is their exclusive right to decide, and when decided, their decision is obligatory upon everybody, and independent of all congressional control if such government be republican. To convert an obligation of guarantee into an authority to interfere in any way in the formation of the government to be guaranteed is to do violence to language. If it be said that the President did illegally interfere in the organization of such governments, the answers are obvious. First. If it was true, if the people of such States not only have not but do not complain of it, but, on the contrary, have pursued his advice, and are satisfied with and are living under the governments they have adopted, and those governments are republican in form, what right has Congress to interfere or deny their legal existence? Second. Conceding, for argument's sake, that the President's alleged interference was unauthorized, does it not, and for the same reason, follow that any like interference by Congress would be equally unauthorized? A different view is not to be maintained because of the difference in the nature of the powers conferred upon Congress and the President, the one being legislative and the other executive; for it is equally, and upon the same ground, beyond the scope of either to form a government for the people of a State once in the Union, or to expel such a State from the Union, or to deny, temporarily or permanently, the rights which belong to a State and her people under the Constitution.

Congress may admit new States, but a State once admitted ceases to be within its control, and can never again be brought within it. What changes her people may at any time think proper to make in her constitution is a matter with which neither Congress nor any department of the general government can interfere, unless such changes make the State government anti-republican, and then it can only be done under the obligation to guarantee that it be republican. Whatever may be the extent of the power conferred upon Congress in the 3d section, article 4, of the Constitution, to admit new States—in what manner and to what extent they can, under that power, interfere in the formation and character of the Constitution of such States preliminary to admission into the Union, no one has ever pretended that when that is had, the State can again be brought within its influence. The power is exhausted when once executed, the subject forthwith passing out of its reach. The State admitted, like the original thirteen States, becomes at once and forever independent of congressional control. A different view would change the entire character of the government as its framers and their contemporaries designed and understood it to be. They never intended to make the State governments subordinate to the general government. Each was to move supreme within its own orbit; but as each would not alone have met the exigencies of a government adequate to all the wants of the people, the two, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, constituted "co-ordinate departments of one single and integral whole;" the one having the power of legislation and administration "in affairs which concerned their own citizens only;" the other, "whatever concerned foreigners, or citizens of other States." Within their respective limits each is paramount. The States, as to all powers not delegated to the general government, are as independent of that government as the latter, in regard to all powers that are delegated to it, is independent of the governments of the States. The proposition, then, that Congress can, by force or otherwise, under the war or insurrectionary or any other power, expel a State from the Union, or reduce it to a territorial condition and govern it as such, is utterly without foundation. The undersigned deem it unnecessary to examine the question further. They leave it upon the observations submitted, considering it perfectly clear that States, notwithstanding occurring insurrections, continue to be States of the Union.

Thirdly. If this is so, it necessarily follows that the rights of States under the Constitution, as originally possessed and enjoyed by them, are still theirs; and those they are now enjoying, as far as they depend upon the executive and judicial departments of the government. By each of these departments they are recognized as States. By the one, all officers of the government required by law to be appointed in such States have been appointed, and are discharging, without question, their respective functions. By the other they are, as States, enjoying the benefit, and subjected to the powers of that department; a fact conclusive to show that, in the estimation of the judiciary, they are, as they were at first, States of the Union, bound by the laws of the Union, and entitled to all the rights incident to that relation. And yet, so far they are denied that right which the Constitution properly esteems as the security of all the others—that right, without which government is anything but a republic—is indeed but a tyranny—the right of having a voice in the legislative department, whose laws bind them in person and in property—this, it is submitted, is a state of things without example in a representative republican government; and Congress, as long as it denies this right, is a mere despotism. Citizens may be made to submit to it by force, or dread of force, but a fraternal spirit and good feeling toward those who impose it, so important to the peace and prosperity of the country, are not to be hoped for, but rather unhappiness, dissatisfaction, and enmity. There is but one ground on which such conduct can find any excuse—a supposed public necessity; the peril of destruction to which the government would be subjected, if the right was allowed. But for such a supposition there is not, in the opinion of the undersigned, even a shadow of foundation.

The representatives of the States in which there was no insurrection, if the others were represented, would in the House, under the present apportionment, exceed the latter by a majority of seventy-two votes, and have a decided preponderance in the Senate. What danger to the government, then, can possibly arise from southern representation? Are the present senators and representatives fearful of themselves? Are they apprehensive that they might be led to the destruction of our institutions by the persuasion or any other influence of southern members? How disparaging to themselves is such an apprehension. Are they apprehensive that those who may succeed them from their respective States may be so fatally led astray? How disparaging is that supposition to the patriotism and wisdom of their constituents. Whatever effect on mere party success in the future such a representation may have we shall not stop to inquire. The idea that the country is to be kept in turmoil, States to be reduced to bondage, and their rights under the Constitution denied, and their citizens degraded, with a view to the continuance in power of a mere political party, cannot for a moment be entertained without imputing gross dishonesty of purpose and gross dereliction of duty to those who may entertain it. Nor do we deem it necessary to refer particularly to the evidence taken by the committee to show that there is nothing in the present condition of the people of the southern States that even excuses on that ground a denial of representation to them. We content ourselves with saying that in our opinion the evidence most to be relied upon, whether regarding the character of the witnesses or their means of information, shows that representatives from the southern States would prove perfectly loyal. We specially refer for this only to the testimony of Lieutenant General Grant. His loyalty and his intelligence no one can doubt. In his letter to the President of the 18th of December, 1865, after he had recently visited South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia, he says:

"Both in travelling and while stopping, I saw much and conversed freely with the citizens of those States, as well as with officers of the army who have been among them. The following are the conclusions come to by me :

"I am satisfied that the mass of thinking men of the south accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. The questions which have heretofore divided the sentiments of the people of the two sections—slavery and State rights, or the right of a State to secede from the Union—they regard as having been settled forever by the highest tribunal, arms, that man can resort to. I was pleased to learn from the leading men whom I met that they not only accepted the decision arrived at as final, but that now the smoke of battle has cleared away and time has been given for reflection, that this decision has been a fortunate one for the whole country, they receiving the like benefits from it with those who opposed them in the field and in the cause." * * * * *

"My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing, they want and require protection from the government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the government, not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course was pointed out they would pursue it in good faith. It is to be regretted that there cannot be a greater commingling at this time between the citizens of the two sections, and particularly of those intrusted with the law-making power."

Secession, as a practical doctrine ever hereafter to be resorted to, is almost utterly abandoned. It was submitted to and failed before the ordeal of battle. Nor can the undersigned imagine why, if its revival is anticipated as possible, the committee have not recommended an amendment to the Constitution guarding against it in terms. Such an amendment, it cannot be doubted, the southern as well as northern States would cheerfully adopt. The omission of such a recommendation is pregnant evidence that secession, as a constitutional right, is thought by the majority of the committee to be, practically, a mere thing of the past, as all the proof taken by them shows it to be, in the opinion of all the leading southern men who hitherto entertained it. The desolation around them, the hecatombs of their own slain, the stern patriotism of the men of the other States, exhibited by unlimited expenditure of treasure and of blood, and their love of the Union so sincere and deep-seated that it is seen they will hazard all to maintain it, have convinced the south that as a practical doctrine secession is extinguished forever. State secession, then, abandoned, and slavery abolished by the southern States themselves, or with their consent, upon what statesmanlike ground can such States be denied all the rights which the Constitution secures to States of the Union? All admit that to do so at the earliest period is demanded by every consideration of duty and policy, and none deny that the actual interest of the country is to a great extent involved in such admission. The staple productions of the southern States are as important to the other States as to themselves. Those staples largely enter into the wants of all alike, and they are also most important to the financial credit of the government. Those staples will never be produced as in the past until real peace, resting, as it can alone rest, on the equal and uniform operation of the Constitution and laws on all, is attained. To suppose that a brave and sensitive people will give an undivided attention to the increase of mere material wealth while retained in a state of political inferiority and degradation is mere folly. They desire to be again in the Union, to enjoy the benefits of the Constitution, and they invoke you to receive them. They have adopted constitutions free from any intrinsic objection, and have agreed to every stipulation thought by the President to be necessary for the protection and benefit of all, and in the opinion of the undersigned they are amply sufficient. Why exact, as a preliminary condition to representation, more? What more are supposed to be necessary? First, the repudiation of the rebel debt; second, the denial of all obligation to pay for manumitt-ted slaves; third, the inviolability of our own debt. If these provisions are deemed necessary, they cannot be defeated, if the south were disposed to defeat them, by the admission into Congress of their representatives. Nothing is more probable, in the opinion of the undersigned, than that many of the southern States would adopt them all; but those measures the committee connect with others which we think the people of the south will never adopt. They are asked to disfranchise a numerous class of their citizens, and also to agree to diminish their representation in Congress, and of course in the electoral college, or to admit to the right of suffrage their colored males of twenty-one years of age and upwards, (a class now in a condition of almost utter ignorance,) thus placing them on the same political footing with white citizens of that age. For reasons so obvious that the dullest may discover them, the right is not directly asserted of granting suffrage to the negro. That would be obnoxious to most of the northern and western States, so much so that their consent was not to be anticipated; but as the plan adopted, because of the limited number of negroes in such States, will have no effect on their representation, it is thought it may be adopted, while in the southern States it will materially lessen their number. That these latter States will assent to the measure can hardly be expected. The effect, then, if not the purpose, of the measure is forever to deny representatives to such States, or, if they consent to the condition, to weaken their representative power, and thus, probably, secure a continuance of such a party in power as now control the legislation of the government. The measure, in its terms and its effect, whether designed or not, is to degrade the southern States. To consent to it will be to consent to their own dishonor.

The manner, too, of presenting the proposed constitutional amendment, in the opinion of the undersigned, is impolitic and without precedent. The several amendments suggested have no connexion with each other; each, if adopted, would have its appropriate effect if the others were rejected; and each, therefore, should be submitted as a separate article, without subjecting it to the contingency of rejection if the States should refuse to ratify the rest. Each by itself, if an advisable measure should be submitted to the people, and not in such a connexion with those which they may think unnecessary or dangerous as to force them to reject all. The repudiation of the rebel debt, and all obligation to compensate for the loss of slave property, and the inviolability of the debts of the government, no matter how contracted, provided for by some of the sections of the amendment, we repeat, we believe would meet the approval of many of the southern States; but these no State can sanction without sanctioning others, which we think will not be done by them or by some of the northern States. To force negro suffrage upon any State by means of the penalty of a loss of part of its representation will not only be to impose a disparaging condition, but virtually to interfere with the clear right of each State to regulate suffrage for itself without the control of the government of the United States. Whether that control be exerted directly or indirectly, it will be considered, as it is a fatal blow to the right which every State in the past has held vital, the right to regulate her franchise.

To punish a State for not regulating it in a particular way, so as to give to all classes of the people the privilege of suffrage, is but seeking to accomplish incidentally what, if it should be done at all, should be done directly. No reason, in the view of the undersigned, can be suggested for the course adopted, other than a belief that such a direct interference would not be sanctioned by the northern and western States, while, as regards such States, the actual recommendation, because of the small proportion of negroes within their limits, will not in the least lessen their representative power in Congress or their influence in the presidential election, and they may therefore sanction it. This very inequality in its operation upon the States renders the measure, in our opinion, most unjust, and, looking to the peace and quiet of the country, most impolitic. But the mode advised is also not only without but against all precedent. When the constitution was adopted it was thought to be defective in not sufficiently protecting certain rights of the States and the people. With the view of supplying a remedy for this defect, on the 4th March, 1789, various amendments by a resolution constitutionally passed by Congress were submitted for ratification to the States. They were twelve in number. Several of them were even less independent of each other than are those recommended by the committee. But it did not occur to the men of that day that it was right to force the States to adopt or reject all. Each was, therefore, presented as a separate article. The language of the resolution was, "that the following articles be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as amendments of the Constitution of the United States, ALL OR ANY OF WHICH ARTICLES, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes as parts of the Constitution. The Congress of that day was willing to obtain either of the submitted amendments—to get a part, if not able to procure the whole. They thought (and in that we submit they but conformed to the letter and spirit of the amendatory clause of the Constitution,) that the people have the right to pass severally on any proposed amendments. This course of our fathers is now departed from, and the result will probably be that no one of the suggested amendments, though some may be approved, will be ratified. This will certainly be the result unless the States are willing practically to relinquish the right they have always enjoyed, never before questioned by any recognized statesman, and all-important to their interest and security—the right to regulate the franchise in all their elections.

There are, too, some general considerations that bear on the subject, to which we will now refer.

First. One of the resolutions of the Chicago convention, by which Mr. Lincoln was first nominated for the presidency, says, "that the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States is essential to the balance of power on which the prosperity and endurance of our political fabric depend." In his inaugural address of 4th March, 1861, which received the almost universal approval of the people, among other things he said, "no State of its own mere motion can lawfully get out of the Union;" and that, "in view of the Constitution and the laws, the Union is unbroken, and to the extent of my ability I shall take care, as the Constitution itself expressly enjoins upon me, that the laws of the Union be faithfully executed in all the States."

Second. Actual conflict soon afterwards ensued. The south, it was believed, misapprehended the purpose of the government in carrying it on, and Congress deemed it important to dispel that misapprehension by declaring what the purpose was. This was done in July, 1861, by their passing the following resolution, offered by Mr. Crittenden: "That in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged, upon our part, in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished, the war ought to cease." The vote in the House was 119 for and 2 against it, and in the Senate 30 for and 5 against it. The design to conquer or subjugate, or to curtail or interfere in any way with the rights of the States, is in the strongest terms thus disclaimed, and the only avowed object asserted to be "to defend and maintain the spirit of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union AND THE DIGNITY, EQUALITY, AND RIGHTS OF THE SEVERAL STATES UNIMPAIRED." Congress, too, by the act of 13th July, 1861, empowered the President to declare, by proclamation, "that the inhabitants of such State or States where the insurrection existed are in a state of insurrection against the United States," and thereupon to declare that "all commercial intercourse by and between the same, by the citizens thereof and the citizens of the United States, shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue." Here, also, Congress evidently deals with the States as being in the Union and to remain in the Union. It seeks to keep them in by forbidding commercial intercourse between their citizens and the citizens of the other States so long, and so long only, as insurrectionary hostility shall continue. That ended, they are to be, as at first, entitled to the same intercourse with citizens of other States that they enjoyed before the insurrection. In other words, in this act, as in the resolution of the same month, the dignity, equality, and rights of such States (the insurrection ended) were not to be held in any respect impaired. The several proclamations of amnesty issued by Mr. Lincoln and his successor under the authority of Congress are also inconsistent with the idea that the parties included within them are not to be held, in the future, restored to all rights belonging to them as citizens of their respective States. A power to pardon is a power to restore the offender to the condition in which he was before the date of the offence pardoned.

It is now settled that a pardon removes not only the punishment, but all the legal disabilities consequent on the crime. (7 Bac. A. B. Tit. Par.) Bishop on Criminal Law (vol. 1, p. 713) states the same doctrine. The amnesties so declared would be but false pretences if they were, as now held, to leave the parties who have availed themselves of them in almost every particular in the condition they would have been in if they had rejected them. Such a result, it is submitted, would be a foul blot on the good name of the nation. Upon the whole, therefore, in the present state of the country, the excitement which exists, and which may mislead legislatures already elected, we think that the matured sense of the people is not likely to be ascertained on the subject of the proposed amendment by its submission to existing State legislatures. If it should be done at all, the submission should either be to legislatures hereafter to be elected, or to conventions of the people chosen for the purpose. Congress may select either mode, but they have selected neither. It may be submitted to legislatures already in existence, whose members were heretofore elected with no view to the consideration of such a measure; and it may consequently be adopted, though a majority of the people of the States disapprove of it. In this respect, if there were no other objections to it, we think it most objectionable.

Whether regard be had to the nature or the terms of the Constitution, or to the legislation of Congress during the insurrection, or to the course of the judicial department, or to the conduct of the executive, the undersigned confidently submit that the southern States are States in the Union, and entitled to every right and privilege belonging to the other States. If any portion of their citizens be disloyal, or are not able to take any oath of office that has been or may be constitutionally prescribed, is a question, irrespective of the right of the States to be represented. Against the danger, whatever that may be, of the admission of disloyal or disqualified members into the Senate or House, it is in the power of each branch to provide against by refusing such admission. Each by the Constitution is made the judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its own members. No other department can interfere with it. Its decision concludes all others. The only corrective, when error is committed, consists in the responsibility of the members to the people. But it is believed by the undersigned to be the clear duty of each house to admit any senator or representative who has been elected according to the constitutional laws of the State, and who is able and willing to subscribe the oath required by constitutional law.

It is conceded by the majority that "it would undoubtedly be competent for Congress to waive all formalities, and to admit those Confederate States at once, trusting that time and experience would set all things right." It is not, therefore, owing to a want of constitutional power that it is not done. It is not because such States are not States with republican forms of government. The exclusion must therefore rest on considerations of safety or of expediency alone. The first, that of safety, we have already considered, and, as we think, proved it to be without foundation. Is there any ground for the latter expediency? We think not. On the contrary, in our judgment their admission is called for by the clearest expediency. Those States include a territorial area of 850,000 square miles, an area larger than that of five of the leading nations of Europe. They have a coast line of 3,000 miles, with an internal water line, including the Mississippi, of about 36,000 miles. Their agricultural products in 1850 were about $560,000,000 in value, and their population 9,664,656. Their staple productions are of immense and growing importance and are almost peculiar to that region. That the north is deeply interested in having such a country and people restored to all the rights and privileges that the Constitution affords, no sane man, not blinded by mere party considerations, or not a victim of disordering prejudice, can for a moment doubt. Such a restoration is also necessary to the peace of the country. It is not only important but vital to the potential wealth of which that section of our country is capable, that cannot otherwise be fully developed. Every hour of illegal political restraint, every hour the possession of the rights the Constitution gives is denied, is not only in a political, but a material sense, of great injury to the north as well as to the south. The southern planter works for his northern brethren as well as for himself. His labors heretofore inured as much if not more to their advantage than to his. Whilst harmony in the past between the sections gave to the whole a prosperity, a power, and a renown of which every citizen had reason to be proud, the restoration of such harmony will immeasurably increase them all. Can it, will it be restored as long as the south is kept in political and dishonoring bondage? and can it not, will it not be restored by an opposite policy? By admitting her to all the rights of the Constitution, and by dealing with her citizens as equals and as brothers, not as inferiors and enemies, such a course as this will, we are certain, soon be seen to bind them heart and soul to the Union, and inspire them with confidence in its government by making them feel that all enmity is forgotten, and that justice is being done to them. The result of such a policy, we believe, will at once make us in very truth one people, as happy, as prosperous, and as powerful as ever existed in the tide of time; while its opposite cannot fail to keep us divided, injuriously affect the particular and general welfare of citizen and government, and, if long persisted in, result in danger to the nation. In the words of an eminent British whig statesman, now no more, "A free constitution and large exclusions from its benefit cannot subsist together; the constitution will destroy them, or they will destroy the constitution." It is hoped that, heeding the warning, we will guard against the peril by removing its cause.

The undersigned have not thought it necessary to examine into the legality of the measures adopted, either by the late or the present President, for the restoration of the southern States. It is sufficient for their purpose to say that, if those of President Johnson were not justified by the Constitution, the same may at least be said of those of his predecessor. We deem such an examination to be unnecessary, because, however it might result, the people of the several States who possessed, as we have before said, the exclusive right to decide for themselves what constitutions they should adopt, have adopted those under which they respectively live. The motives of neither President, however, whether the measures were legal or not, are liable to censure. The sole object of each was to effect a complete and early union of all the States; to make the general government, as it did at first, embrace all, and to extend its authority and secure its privileges and blessings to all alike. The purity of motive of President Johnson in this particular, as was to have been expected, is admitted by the majority of the committee to be beyond doubt; for, whatever was their opinion of the unconstitutionality of his course and its tendency to enlarge the executive power, they tell us that they "do not, for a moment, impute to him any such design, but cheerfully concede to him the most patriotic motives." And we cannot forbear to say, in conclusion, upon that point, that he sins against light, and closes his eyes to the course of the President during the rebellion, from its inception to its close, who ventures to impeach his patriotism. Surrounded by insurrectionists he stood firm. His life was almost constantly in peril, and he clung to the Union, and discharged all the obligations it imposed upon him, even the closer because of the peril. And now that he has escaped unharmed, and by the confidence of the people has had devolved upon him the executive functions of the government, to charge him with disloyalty is either a folly or a slander: folly in the fool who believes it; slander in the man of sense, if any such there be, who utters it.

SUB-COMMITTEE.

Mr. JAMES W. GRIMES, (of Iowa,) United States Senate.
Mr. JOHN A. BINGHAM, (of Ohio,) House of Representatives.
Mr. HENRY GRIDER, (of Kentucky,) House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported the following joint resolution :

JOINT RESOLUTION concerning the State of Tennessee.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the people of Tennessee have made known to the Congress of the United States their desire that the constitutional relations heretofore existing between them and the United States may be fully established, and did, on the twenty-second day of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government, republican in form and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and a State government has been organized under the provisions thereof, which said provisions, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, proclaim and denote loyalty to the Union ; and whereas the people of Tennessee are found to be in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union, and can only exercise the same by the consent of the law-making power of the United States : Therefore, the State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the other States, upon the express condition that the people of Tennessee will maintain and enforce, in good faith, their existing constitution and laws, excluding those who have been engaged in rebellion against the United States from the exercise of the elective franchise, for the respective periods of time therein provided for, and shall exclude the same persons for the like respective periods of time from eligibility to office ; and the State of Tennessee shall never assume or pay any debt or obligation contracted or incurred in aid of the late rebellion ; nor shall said State ever in any manner claim from the United States or make any allowance or compensation for slaves emancipated or liberated in any way whatever ; which conditions shall be ratified by the legislature of Tennessee, or the people thereof, as the legislature may direct, before this act shall take effect.

RECONSTRUCTION — TENNESSEE.

MEMORIAL

OF

CITIZENS OF TENNESSEE,

PRAYING

That the present State organization of Tennessee may be recognized and its perpetuity guaranteed.

FEBRUARY 13, 1866.—Referred to the Joint Select Committee on Reconstruction.

MARCH 5, 1866.—Reported from the Select Committee on Reconstruction, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Reconstruction.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States and of the State of Tennessee, beg leave, respectfully, to represent that by the operations of the recent rebellion the governing officers of their State abdicated their respective posts, and left the government without agents to carry it on. In this attitude of affairs one of our citizens, Andrew Johnson, was, on the 3d of March, 1862, by the President of the United States, appointed military governor of the State, which office he continued to hold until the 3d of March, 1865.

To remedy this state of things, the loyal people of the State, by their delegates, on the 8th of January, 1865, assembled in convention at the capitol, in the city of Nashville, "to take such steps as wisdom might direct to restore the the State of Tennessee to its once honored status in the great national Union."

Certain amendments were proposed to our admirable State constitution, made necessary, in the opinion of the convention, by the altered relations of slavery, and by the action of persons engaged in the rebellion, who had temporarily usurped the machinery of the State government, and by the vacancy of the several State offices, for the filling of which there was no present provision of law. These amendments the convention submitted to the vote of their constituents on the 22d of February, 1865, and they were by them adopted. While this proceeding met with the concurrence and co-operation of the military governor, it was the spontaneous action of the loyal people themselves.

Having thus provided for the reorganization of the government under her pre-existing constitution so amended, the work was completed by the election of a governor and legislature on the 4th of March following, who, on the 3d of April, entered upon the duties of their respective offices.

A copy of the several amendments, incorporated into the organic law of the State, and the proceedings of the legislature at its first session, certified officially by the secretary of State, and published by authority, is herewith appended and adopted as a part of this statement.

The government so organized has had unresisted and uninterrupted jurisdiction of the State ever since.

The undersigned respectfully submit that the said government is republican in form as well as in spirit, and they ask that the same be recognized and its perpetuity guaranteed as the true and proper government of the State of Tennessee, entitled to the same immunities, functions, and prerogatives as the State enjoyed by virtue of an act of Congress approved on the 1st day of June, 1796, until her relations with the government were disturbed by the treason of a portion of her citizens.

INTRODUCTORY DOCUMENTS.

The following papers embrace the commission of Hon. Andrew Johnson as military governor of Tennessee, from the War Department at Washington; his instructions from President Lincoln, in accordance with the 4th section of the 4th article of the federal Constitution; the call of the Executive Union Committee of the State for a State convention, to meet December 19, 1864, at the State capitol; and the call of the same committee for a postponed meeting of the same convention, to meet January 8, 1865, said postponement being rendered necessary in consequence of the siege of Nashville by the rebel army; the alterations and amendments to the State constitution, proposed to the people of Tennessee by that convention, with the accompanying resolutions of that body; the proclamation of Governor Johnson authorizing the opening of the polls throughout the State for the ratification or rejection of said amendments and alterations to the constitution; and the final proclamation of Governor Johnson, declaring said amendments and alterations to be legally adopted as a part of the constitution by formal ratification of the loyal voters of the State

APPOINTMENT OF ANDREW JOHNSON AS MILITARY GOVERNOR OF TENNESSEE
BY THE PRESIDENT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1862.

To the Hon. Andrew Johnson :

SIR : You are hereby appointed military governor of the State of Tennessee, with authority to exercise and perform, within the limits of that State, all and singular the powers, duties, and functions pertaining to the office of military governor, including the power to establish all necessary offices, tribunals, &c.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1863.

You are hereby authorized to exercise such powers as may be necessary and proper to enable the loyal people of Tennessee to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and to be protected under such State government by the United States against invasion and domestic violence. All according to the 4th section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON,
Military Governor of Tennessee.

The following call was published by a committee of Union men in Middle Tennessee. Similar calls were published by Union committees in East and West Tennessee :

To the Union men of Middle Tennessee :

The executive committee of Middle Tennessee take this opportunity of requesting the Union men of the middle division of the State to appoint delegates to the convention at Nashville on the 19th of December. The people of East and West Tennessee will be here; it is our duty to meet them. The people meet to take such steps as wisdom may direct to restore the State of Tennessee to its once honored status in the great national Union.

The dignity of men descended from a race of freemen and heroes, the maintenance of your rights and the interests of your children, all call upon you to act as brave and true men. Come forth in your strength to assert your rights and to organize the loyal sentiment of Tennessee.

If you cannot meet in your counties, come upon your own personal responsibility. It is the assembling of Union men for the restoration of their own Commonwealth to life and a career of success.

LEWIS TILLMAN,
WM. SPENCE,
M. M. BRIEN,
A. V. S. LINDSLEY,
JOS. S. FOWLER,

Executive Committee Middle Tennessee.

The presence of the rebel army around Nashville prevented the convention from assembling, and the following call was made accordingly :

NASHVILLE, December 19, 1864.

To the Union men of Tennessee.

The executive committee of Middle Tennessee have selected the 8th of January, 1865, for the meeting of the State convention at Nashville.

As the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans, the 8th day of January, occurs on Sunday, the convention will not assemble until the 9th.

The committees in East and West Tennessee are requested to make a similar announcement in their respective districts,

M. M. BRIEN,
WM. SPENCE,
LEWIS TILLMAN,
A. V. S. LINDSLEY,
JOS. S. FOWLER,

Executive Committee Middle Tennessee.

DECEMBER 5, 1864.

The convention met and proposed the following alterations and amendments to the State constitution:

PROPOSED ALTERATIONS AND AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Whereas the first article and the first section of the declaration of rights in the constitution of the State of Tennessee declares "that all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; and for the advancement of these ends they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper," we, the people of the State of Tennessee and of the United States of America in convention assembled, do propound the following alterations and amendments to the constitution, which, when ratified by the sovereign loyal people, shall be and constitute a part of the permanent constitution of the State of Tennessee.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1. That slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, are hereby forever abolished and prohibited throughout the State.

SEC. 2 The legislature shall make no law recognizing the right of property in man.

SCHEDULE.

SECTION 1. Section 31 of the second article of the constitution, which is as follows, "The general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owner or owners," is hereby abrogated.

SEC. 2. "The declaration of independence and ordinance dissolving the federal relations between the State of Tennessee and the United States of America," passed and promulgated by the legislature of Tennessee on the 6th day of May, 1861, by which the State was declared separated from the federal Union, and all laws and ordinances by which Tennessee became a member of the federal Union, annulled and abrogated, was in like manner an act of treason and usurpation, unconstitutional, null and void.

SEC. 3. The convention, agreement, and military league entered into by the commissioners of the State of Tennessee and the commissioners of the so-called Confederate States of America, made May 7, 1861, and on the same day ratified and confirmed by the legislature, was an act of treason and usurpation, unconstitutional, null and void.

SEC. 4. No statute of limitations shall be held to operate from and after the 6th day of May, 1861, until such time hereafter as the legislature may prescribe, nor shall any writ of error be refused or abated in any cause or suit decided since the 6th day of May, 1861, and prior to this time, by reason of any lapse of time. And in all actions for torts brought, or which may hereafter be brought in the courts in this State by attachment levied upon the property of the defendant, the court shall have power to proceed to judgment and collection of the same, as upon contracts, without personal service of process upon the defendant, until the legislature may see fit to change the law in such cases.

SEC. 5. All laws, ordinances, and resolutions, as well as all acts done in pursuance thereof, under the authority of the usurped State government after the declared independence of the State of Tennessee, on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, were unconstitutional, null and void from the beginning: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as to affect any judicial decisions made by the State courts held at times differing from those provided by law prior to May 6, 1861; said judicial decisions being made pursuant to the laws of the State of Tennessee enacted previous to said date, and between parties present in court and litigating their rights.

SEC. 6. All laws, ordinances, and resolutions of the usurped State government, passed on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, providing for the issuance of State bonds, also all notes of the Bank of Tennessee, or any of its branches, issued on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, and all debts created or contracted in the name of the State by said authority, are unconstitutional, null and void; and no legislature shall hereafter have power to pass any act authorizing the payment of said bonds or debts, or providing for the redemption of said notes.

SEC. 7. All civil and military officers which have been or may hereafter be appointed by the acting governor of the State, are hereby ratified and affirmed, and they shall continue to hold and exercise the functions of their respective offices until their successors shall be elected or appointed, and qualified as prescribed by the laws and Constitution of the State and United States.

SEC. 8. That the proposed amendments to the Constitution, and the schedule thereto, be submitted to the people at the ballot-box, on the 22d day of February next, and that upon the adoption thereof, by the people, an election shall be held on the 4th day of March next, for governor and members of the legislature, the latter to be voted for by general ticket, upon the basis prescribed in the act apportioning representation in the State, passed on the 19th day of February, 1852, to assemble at the capitol on the 1st Monday in April next, said officers to continue in office until their successors shall be elected and qualified, under the regular biennial election of 1867.

Provided, That said apportionment be so modified as to give to the counties of Johnson, Carter, Campbell, Anderson, Union, Sevier, Macon, and Hancock, each one member, and the district composed of the counties of Fentress, Morgan, Scott, and Cumberland, one additional member in the House of Representatives.

SEC. 9. The qualifications of voters and the limitation of the elective franchise may be determined by the general assembly, which shall first assemble under the amended Constitution.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That at the election in February those in favor of the foregoing amendments and schedule shall deposit a ballot on which shall be written "Ratification," and those who are opposed shall deposit a ballot on which shall be written "Rejection."

Resolved, That when the above amendments of the constitution of the State of Tennessee shall be submitted to the people of the State for their ratification or rejection, and at the first election held under said constitution as amended, if ratified by the people, no person shall be permitted to vote unless he first take the following oath at the polls; and the name of each voter shall be written upon the back of his ticket, and it shall be the duty of the judges and clerks of said election to preserve said tickets and file them with the clerks of the county courts of their respective counties for future reference. Provided, That this oath shall not be required of the citizens who are well known to the judges of the election to have been unconditional Union men. Provided, also, That voters otherwise qualified may vote within any county of the State, and if in the military service, wherever they may be on the day of election; and that the commanding officer of each regiment, battalion, detachment, battery, or hospital, is empowered to hold such elections.

Oath.—I solemnly swear that I will henceforth support the Constitution of the United States, and defend it against the assaults of all its enemies; that I am an active friend of the government of the United States, and the enemy of the so-called Confederate States; that I ardently desire the suppression of the present rebellion against the government of the United States; that I sincerely rejoice in the triumph of the armies and navies of the United States, and in the defeat and overthrow of the armies, navies, and of all armed combinations in the so-called Confederate States; that I will cordially oppose all armistices or negotiations for peace with rebels in arms, until the Constitution of the United States, and all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof shall be established over all the people of every State and Territory embraced within the national Union; and that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adopted for the attainment of those ends; and further, that I take this oath freely and voluntarily and without mental reservation. So help me God.

Resolved, That the returns of this election shall be made to the secretary of State, and the result be declared by the proclamation of the acting governor.

Resolved, That the convention do nominate and offer to the people a candidate for governor, and that the delegates from the several senatorial and representative districts be requested to nominate and present to the convention candidates for their respective districts, to be placed upon the general legislative ticket: Provided, If the Union people of any district shall desire to make another selection, that they have opportunity to do so.

Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the executive committee to fill all vacancies that may occur in the list of candidates and officers for holding elections solicited by the convention.

Resolved, That the names of such as may be selected shall be forwarded to the chairman at Nashville, on or before the 10th day of February next, when the chairman shall publish the complete list in the papers of the State.

GOVERNOR'S PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, at a large and respectable convention of the free and loyal people of the State of Tennessee, begun and held in the city of Nashville, on the 9th day of January, 1865, certain articles amendatory of the constitution of the State and the schedule thereto appended, were, with great unanimity, adopted and propounded to the people for ratification or rejection on the 22d of February, 1865; and whereas, the schedule provides that in the event of the ratification of said proposed constitutional amendments, the loyal people of the State shall, on the 4th of March next thereafter, proceed by "general ticket," to elect a governor and members to the general assembly, to meet in the capitol in Nashville, for the transaction of public business, on the first Monday of April, 1865; and whereas, the convention aforesaid, acting in the primary and sovereign capacity of the people, prescribed certain rules and regulations under which the elections should be conducted, and designated, in many of the counties, certain persons to open and hold the same, and in others omitted to name any one, which, to avoid confusion, I have, as far as practicable, caused to be supplied; and in addition thereto, and for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the objects of the convention and enabling the sovereign loyal people of the State to express their judgment freely and fully on the grave question submitted to their decision:

Therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, military governor of the State of Tennessee, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested, do hereby declare that the several persons in the proceedings of the convention named and appointed to open and hold the elections therein provided for, are hereby empowered and directed to open and hold said elections in person in their respective counties, wherever practicable, and to appoint and qualify, if necessary, such judges and inspectors of elections and other officers, as may be necessary to open the polls and conduct the elections in such other parts of their respective counties as the convenience of the people may require, and to make returns to the secretary of the State, as provided by the third resolution of the convention, as nearly as practicable in conformity to the act of assembly, in such cases made and provided.

And I do hereby further declare, and fully authorize and direct the executive committee appointed in each grand division of the State, and referred to in the fourth and fifth resolutions of the proceedings of said convention, to supply, whenever practicable, the places of all such persons as, for any cause, may become vacant in the list of persons hereinbefore qualified to hold said elections; and in such cases, when it is not convenient or practicable for vacancies to be filled as above provided, any loyal citizen of the county is hereby authorized and empowered to open and hold said elections, and make return thereof, which shall be as valid as if done by any of the persons hereinbefore mentioned.

I do furthermore authorize and empower the commanding officer of each regiment, battalion, detachment, battery, or hospital of Tennessee troops, wherever they may be on the day of said elections, to open and hold elections for their respective commands or hospitals, and make due return thereof, under the same rules and regulations above prescribed.

Here I might well close this proclamation, but I will be pardoned for adding that the action of the convention is wisely submitted to the loyal people—the true source of all political power—for approval; and I feel assured, as they appreciate the restoration of good government, and the protection of their lives and property, they will not hesitate to come forward, as one man, and with one voice ratify and confirm the action of the convention. We have been, in Tennessee, torn asunder by civil war, and all our public and private interests broken down, and the folly of the rebellion has surely been sufficiently demonstrated to admonish all classes that they can no longer live in hostility to the national government, and ought no longer to remain without civil authority in the State. Strike down at one blow, the institution of slavery—remove the disturbing element from your midst, and by united action restore the State to its ancient moorings again, and you may confidently expect the speedy return of peace, happiness and prosperity.

In testimony whereof, I, Andrew Johnson, military governor of Tennessee, do hereunto set my hand, and cause the great seal of the State to be affixed at the executive office, in the city of Nashville, on this the 26th day of January, 1865.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

OFFICIAL DECLARATION OF THE RATIFICATION OF THE AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—GOVERNOR'S PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, the convention that recently assembled in the city of Nashville proposed certain alterations and amendments to the constitution of the State of Tennessee, and the schedule thereto appended, which, by the direction of the convention, were submitted to the people at the ballot-box on the 22d instant, and by them ratified and confirmed; and whereas the convention further provided, that in the event of the adoption of "the amendments to the constitution, and the schedule thereto," an election for governor and members of the legislature should be held on the 4th of March next following, to assemble at the capitol in Nashville on the first Monday in April next thereafter; and whereas the returns of the election for the ratification or rejection of the proposed amendments of the constitution were, by the 3d resolution adopted by the convention, to be made to the secretary of State, and the result declared by proclamation of the acting governor; and whereas complete returns have not been yet made as provided by the foregoing resolution, but enough is already ascertained to place the result of the election beyond all doubt, and fully to justify the announcement that the following articles amendatory of the constitution of the State and schedule thereto appended have been adopted by the people, viz:

"ARTICLE I.

"SECTION 1. Slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, are hereby forever abolished and prohibited throughout the State.

"SEC. 2. The legislature shall make no law recognizing the right of property in man.

"SCHEDULE.

"SECTION 1. Section 31 of the second article of the constitution, which is as follows: 'The general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owner or owners,' is hereby abrogated.

"SEC. 2. 'The declaration of independence and ordinance dissolving the federal relations between the State of Tennessee and the United States of America,' passed and promulgated by the legislature of Tennessee on the 6th day of May, 1861, by which the State was declared separated from the federal Union, and all laws and ordinances by which Tennessee became a member of the federal Union annulled and abrogated, was in like manner an act of treason and usurpation, unconstitutional, null, and void.

"SEC. 3. The convention, agreement, and military league, entered into by the commissioners of the State of Tennessee and the commissioner of the so-called Confederate States of America, made May 7, 1861, and on the same day ratified and confirmed by the legislature, was an act of treason and usurpation, unconstitutional, null, and void.

"SEC. 4. No statute of limitations shall be held to operate from and after the 6th day of May, 1861, until such time hereafter as the legislature may prescribe, nor shall any writ of error be refused or abate in any cause or suit decided since the 6th day of May, 1861, and prior to this time, by reason of any lapse of time. And in all actions for torts brought, or which may hereafter be brought in the courts of this State by attachment levied upon the property of the defendant, the courts shall have power to proceed to judgment and collection of the same as upon contracts, without personal service of process upon the defendant, until the legislature may see fit to change the law in such cases.

"SEC. 5. All laws, ordinances, and resolutions, as well as all acts done in pursuance thereof, under the authority of the usurped State government after the declared independence of the State of Tennessee, on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, were unconstitutional, null, and void, from the beginning: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as to affect any judicial decisions made by the State courts, held at times differing from those provided by law, prior to May 6, 1861; said judicial decisions being made pursuant to the laws of the State of Tennessee enacted previous to said date, and between parties present in court and litigating their rights.

"SEC. 6. All laws, ordinances, and resolutions of the usurped State government, passed on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, providing for the issuance of State bonds; also all notes of the Bank of Tennessee, or any of its branches, issued on or after the 6th day of May, 1861, and all debts created or contracted in the name of the State by said authority, are unconstitutional, null, and void; and no legislature shall hereafter have power to pass any act authorizing the payment of said bonds or debts, or providing for the redemption of said notes.

"SEC. 7. All civil and military officers who have been or may hereafter be appointed by the acting governor of the State, are hereby ratified and affirmed, and they shall continue to hold and exercise the functions of their respective offices until their successors shall be elected or appointed and qualified as prescribed by the laws and constitution of the State and United States.

"SEC. 8. The proposed amendments to the constitution, and the schedule thereto, shall be submitted to the people at the ballot-box on the 22d day of February next, and upon the adoption thereof by the people an election shall be held on the 4th day of March next for governor and members of the legislature, the latter to be voted for by general ticket, upon the basis prescribed in the act apportioning representation in the State, passed on the 19th day of February, 1852, to assemble at the capitol on the first Monday in April next, said officers to continue in office until their successors shall be elected and qualified under the regular biennial election of 1867: Provided, That said apportionment be so modified as to give to the counties of Johnson, Carter, Campbell, Anderson, Union, Sevier, Macon, and Hancock each one member, and the district composed of the counties of Pentress, Morgan, Scott, and Cumberland one additional member in the house of representatives.

"SEC. 9. The qualification of voters and the limitation of the elective franchise may be determined by the general assembly which shall first assemble under the amended constitution."

And whereas the time at which it is provided the election for governor and members of the general assembly shall be held is so near at hand that I deemed it proper, in advance of full returns, to declare the result of the election adopting the constitutional amendments:

Therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, military and acting governor of the State of Tennessee, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested, do hereby declare that the foregoing alterations and amendments to the constitution of the State of Tennessee, and the schedule thereto annexed, have been ratified and confirmed by the vote of the people of the State, and that said articles now constitute a part of the permanent constitution and supreme law of the State of Tennessee, and as such are hereafter to be so held and regarded by the people thereof.

And I do hereby further declare and fully authorize and direct the several persons in the proceedings of the late convention named and appointed to open and hold the election for the ratification or rejection of the amendments to the constitution, to open and hold an election for governor and members to the general assembly, as in the schedule prescribed, on the 4th of March next; and they are hereby empowered and directed to open and hold said election, in person, in their respective counties, wherever practicable, and to appoint and qualify, if necessary, such judges and inspectors of election, and other officers, as may be necessary to open the polls and conduct the election in such other parts of their respective counties as the convenience of the people may require; and to make returns to the secretary of state as provided by the third resolution of the convention, as nearly as practicable in conformity to the act of assembly in such cases made and provided.

And I do hereby further declare, and fully authorize and direct the executive committee, appointed in each grand division of the State, and referred to in the fifth resolution of the proceedings of said convention, to supply, whenever practicable, the places of all such persons as may for any cause become vacant in the list of persons hereinbefore declared qualified to hold said election; and in such cases, when it is not convenient or practicable for vacancies to be filled as above provided, any loyal citizen of the county is hereby authorized and empowered to open and hold said election, and make returns thereof, which shall be as valid as if done by any of the persons hereinbefore mentioned.

I do further authorize and empower the commanding officer of each regiment, battalion, detachment, battery, or hospital of Tennessee troops, wherever they may be on the day of election, to open and hold an election for their respective commands or hospitals, and make due return thereof under the same rule and regulations above prescribed.

In closing this proclamation, I sincerely congratulate the people of Tennessee on the happy result of the election, and the opening prospects of a speedy and permanent reorganization of the State government. For nearly three years, in the midst of dangers and difficulties the most complicated and perplexing, I have labored to restore the State to its former proud position in the Union. My constant effort has been to save it—not to destroy it; but the rebellious sentiments of the people often interposed obstacles which had to be overcome by military power. The task was painful, but the duty has been performed, and the result has passed into history. Time, I am happy to say, has greatly calmed the passions of the people, and experience restored them to reason. The folly of destroying their government, and sacrificing their sons to gratify the mad ambition of political leaders, needs no longer to be told to the laboring masses. The wasted estates, ruined and dilapidated farms, vacant seats around the hearthstone, prostrate business, insecurity of property, and even life itself, everywhere proclaim it in language not to be misunderstood.

But all is not lost. A new era dawns upon the people of Tennessee. They enter upon a career guided by reason, law, order, and reverence. The reign of brute force and personal violence has passed away forever. By their own solemn act, at the ballot-box, the shackles have been formally stricken from the limbs of more than 275,000 slaves in the State. The unjust distinctions in society, fostered by an arrogant aristocracy, based upon human bondage, have been overthrown, and our whole social system reconstructed on the basis of honest industry and personal worth. Labor shall now receive its merited reward, and honesty, energy, and enterprise their just appreciation. Capital heretofore timid and distrustful of success may now confidently seek remunerative and permanent investments in the State. Public schools and colleges begin anew their work of instruction, upon a broader and more enduring basis. The foundations of society, under the change in the constitution, are in harmony with the principles of free government and the national Union; and if the people are true to themselves—true to the State—and loyal to the federal government, they will rapidly overcome the calamities of the war, and raise the State to a power and grandeur not heretofore even anticipated. Many of its vast resources lie undiscovered, and it requires intelligent enterprise and free labor alone to develop them, and clothe the State with a richness and beauty surpassed by none of her sisters.

In testimony whereof, I, Andrew Johnson, military and acting governor of Tennessee, do hereunto set my hand and cause the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the executive office, in Nashville, on this 25th day of February, A. D. 1865.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

Nashville, April 6, 1865.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

In accordance with long-established custom, and in obedience to the requirements of the constitution, it becomes my duty to communicate to the legislature the condition of the State, and to recommend for their consideration such matters as I may deem expedient.

When we contemplate the distracted condition of the country, the four dreadful years of trial through which we have passed, and the manner in which it has been preserved, our minds naturally turn to Him whose care has been over us, who has protected and preserved us, through scenes of blood and carnage unprecedented in the history of wars. For the preservation of our lives and certain remnants of our property; for the care and protection of Providence over those who have gone forth to battle, and are still risking their lives in defence of the principles upon which our happiness and property rest; for life, health, food and raiment; for our safe conduct through untold changes, by a kind Providence; for the prospect of the restoration of law and order in our distracted State; for the gleam of light, looking to peace, now breaking through the clouds that have enveloped us for the four years past; for these and numerous other blessings of which we have been the recipients, let us, in all humility and sincerity, render thanks to Almighty God, and let us earnestly implore a continuance of his favor.

Secession is an abomination that I cannot too strongly condemn, and one that you cannot legislate against with too much severity. What has it done for our country in the space of four years? It has plunged our country into civil war, paralyzed our commerce, destroyed our agricultural pursuits, suspended the whole trade and business of our country, lessened the value of our property, destroyed many of the pursuits of life, and has involved the South in irretrievable bankruptcy and ruin.

What has it done for Tennessee? It has formed odious and unconstitutional military leagues, passed military bills, and inaugurated a system of oppressive taxation, without consulting the people, and then, in mockery of a free election, has required them by their votes to sanction its usurpation, at the point of the bayonet, under the penalty of imprisonment and death. It has offered a premium for crime, in ordering the discharge of culprits from prison, on condition that they would enter the rebel army, and in recommending the judges to hold no courts for the trial of offenders. It has stained our statute book with the repudiation of honest northern debts, and has palpably violated the Constitution, by attempting, through its unlawful extensions, to do away with the right of suffrage. It has passed laws making it treason to say or do anything in favor of the government of the United States, or against the so-called Confederate States. It has prostrated and overthrown the freedom of speech and of the press; it has involved the whole South in a war whose success is now proven to be utterly hopeless, and which, ere another year roll round, must lead to the ruin of the common people. Its bigoted, murderous, and intolerant spirit has subjected the people of Tennessee to many grievances. Our people have been arrested and imprisoned; our houses have been rudely entered and shamefully pillaged; our families have been subjected to insults; our women and children have been tied up and scourged, or shot by a ruffian soldiery; our towns have been pillaged; our citizens have been robbed of their horses, mules, grain, and meat, and many of them assassinated and murdered.

Hundreds, yes, thousands of our young men, middle-aged and old men, have been driven from our State, and compelled to enter the federal army, in strange regiments, and their bones now lie bleaching upon the many battle-fields of the south and west, and all this because our people were true to the traditions of their fathers, and refused to worship rebel gods. And to the honor of the people be it known, that more regiments to-day swell the number of the armies of the Union than there are living traitors in the ranks of the enemy.

In this once proud capital of the "Volunteer State," there have been thousands of Union refugees, men, women, and children, broken-hearted, naked and starving; a great many are here still. They have fled from the wicked and murderous guerillas, after being robbed of everything they possessed. They have lived in camps or tents, by fires in the open woods, have dragged out a miserable existence for a time, and died among strangers. Hundreds have suffered from actual want of necessary food, shelter, and clothing, while many residences in this rebellious city have been occupied by the families of those who were fighting against their country, or, being citizen rebels, and home traitors, have fled within the rebel lines. These families have remained here protected, and have wielded an over-ruling social influence. Many of them are wealthy, and live in ease and comfort. They have busied themselves in giving information to the enemy, in carrying delicacies to rebel prisoners who have been confined here for their crimes and treason. And it is stated upon undoubted authority, and the fact is notorious in this capital, that the disloyal families never contributed in the slightest degree to the relief of the poor and distressed women and children, or disabled soldiers thrown upon this population by the operations of the war. I state these facts, which may have the appearance of a personal and local character, that you may know how to shape your course when personal and local legislation is called for.

I have the honor to submit to the general assembly of the State of Tennessee a copy of a joint resolution of Congress, passed by a vote of two-thirds of each house, entitled "A resolution submitting to the legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States," which is in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SECTION 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"Approved, February 1, 1863."

The slavery question here comes up in a form hitherto not discussed in our politics. It is not a question as to the right of Congress to exclude slavery from the Territories, to legislate upon the matter themselves, nor does it involve the discussion of any doubtful powers, but is the simple proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States in the manner prescribed by that sacred instrument, so as to strike down the monster institution which has embroiled the government for half a century, and culminated in the most wicked, uncalled for and bloody war known to the history of the civilized world.

Slavery, secured to the people of the south more permanently by the Constitution of the United States, and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof, than any species of property claimed by them—not even excepting their lands—will now perish by the war it brought about to enlarge its power and perpetuate its existence. Let us do our part in this great work by ratifying the action of Congress, and carrying out the wishes of our people. After the ratification by the people of our State of our amended State constitution, embracing the same proposition, and after your election to the general assembly on this platform, and by the same people, I have not considered an elaborate argument in favor of the proposition submitted by Congress at all necessary. I may be allowed to say, however, that to prohibit slavery in a State requires a change in the State constitution. Pregnant as we find slavery to be of all sorts of political mischief, it is not to be got rid of, under the constitution, in any other than a constitutional manner. And, while the sooner this can be done the better, it does not appear in what part of the Constitution of the United States the power of regulating it at all, in times of peace, is to be found. Fortunately for the future happiness of the country, the Constitution has provided a way in which the people can remedy the evil, without any questionable exercise of power, and that is by amending the Constitution, just as Congress has proposed.

Slavery was so far made the subject of constitutional cognizance, by the people of the United States, when they adopted the articles of confederation, that it found a place in the compromises of that instrument, both in fixing the ratio of representation and the apportionment of direct taxes; and also in requiring the people of a free State to surrender so much of this "sovereignty" as not to have the right to protect the slave that sought refuge from bondage—it would seem too late in the day to question the right of the people to adopt amendments to that instrument, in regard to this or other subjects embraced in its provisions. It becomes us, therefore, to approach this subject with an enlightened statesmanship, and with a decree of moral courage that is not afraid to do right, appealing to the ultimate judgment of mankind to vindicate our action.

It is in this way, and in no other, that a uniform rule can be provided, and an end put thereby, in all time to come, to a possibility of reviving that which has been the fatal cause of all the mischief in the country. To insist upon excluding slavery from a State by amending her constitution, before recognizing her again as within the pale of the Union, would look awkward, and fall below the dignity of political sagacity. Our State has shown her hand, and placed herself square upon the record; and I flatter myself that her representatives here assembled are ready for a measure which shall forever exclude slavery from the United States.

Some legislation is necessary for the protection, government and control of the emancipated slaves among us. When this war is over a portion of those who fought to perpetuate slavery will show the emancipated slave no quarter, and especially that class of slaves who have been rude and violent toward their former owners. What the character of this legislation should be, I leave the good-sense, prudence and reflection of the members of the general assembly to determine.

It is certainly proper and right for the legislature of Tennessee to determine to what extent this State shall be overrun with the emancipated slaves of other States. If their presence in any State is a blessing they should be distributed; if an evil, it is but just that we should be taxed only with our own share of them. I am, myself, the advocate of providing for them a separate and appropriate amount of territory, and settle them down permanently, as a nation of freedmen. In this case, as in most others, it will probably be well to guard against exceptive legislation. The negro has had no agency himself in bringing on our troubles, and does not merit unkind treatment at our hands.

The attention of the legislature is earnestly called to the subject of the roving bands of guerillas, and squads of robbers and murderers who frequent those counties and portions of counties remote from our military forces. The depredations and murders committed by them are of such frequent occurrence as to have created a general feeling of insecurity among our citizens, causing hundreds to sacrifice their property, and abandon their homes and the graves of their parents and loved ones, seeking new homes, among strangers in the north-western States.

The criminal laws of Tennessee prior to the rebellion were equal to the demands of justice and the wants of society, but they are now inadequate in both the cases. The corruptions of the rebellion have exhibited themselves in every quarter, and the effects of the same have been to demoralize all classes of society, more or less, calling for more stringent enactments, so as to meet the numerous cases arising in our country. I advise that horse stealing, house breaking, and highway robberies be punished with death. Let the proof in all such cases be clear and unquestionable, and then let the offenders be hung, even for the first offence. This character of a law will close out all these acts of perfidy which now render life and property insecure, more or less in all counties of the State; and, when the necessary reform is had, a future legislature can repeal or amend the statute. Such a law may look to others like a bloody act, but it can never affect injuriously an honest man or a law-abiding citizen. And you, gentlemen, should feel no concern for the opposite class of men but to punish and reform them.

The attention of the legislature is especially directed to the militia laws of the State. The occurrences of the past four years have disclosed the fact that our militia laws, as they now are, are very imperfect, and need further amendments to make them effective. The State arms were carried into the rebellion, through the influence of the bad men in authority four years ago, and throughout the length and breadth of the State she has not arms enough to arm a captain's company. This deficiency should be provided for at once. I have no doubt that the federal government, upon a fair presentation of the case, would come to our relief with a liberal hand.

If, in the wisdom of the legislature, an efficient military force, over and above what is provided for in general terms, should be placed at the disposal of the executive, I suggest an appropriation for military contingent expenses. In any rate, the legislature would do well to pass an act providing for a military contingent fund, of a moderate character, confiding it under the control of the executive, and making it his duty to report to the legislature at each session. Should there be no use for the fund, the executive will, of course, make no drafts upon it, and it will be his pleasure to report that the money belonging to the military contingent fund remains in the State treasury unexpended.

I am aware that a proposition to increase the salaries of public officers in the State will meet with opposition; that it is not a popular measure, and that demagogues will use such a vote upon the stump against members voting for an increase. Acting alone from a sense of duty, and desiring to see justice done to those patriotic men who are serving the State, I suggest an increase in the pay of all civil officers whose compensation is fixed by law. Supreme judges should be paid a salary of $5,000; chancellors and circuit judges should be allowed $3,000, and the treasurer, comptroller, secretary of state, attorney general, and other officers should be allowed a corresponding increase in their salaries. And I respectfully, but frankly, suggest that the pay of members of the general assembly be increased, and the more so as such increase could not take effect during your term of office.

It is folly to think of a man in public office now supporting his family on the salary he received four and five years ago. Boarding, clothing, meats, vegetables—in fact, everything has increased to twice former prices. And yet the wages of the public officers are down at the old prices. If any one of the incumbents named is worthy of his office he is worthy of a support from that office. His pay should be made equal to his necessary expenses. The State cannot reasonably expect a man to devote his individual time and his whole energies and talents to an office, when the salary of such office will not defray the necessary expenses of his family. Gentlemen capable of filling such offices are capable of supporting themselves in other vocations, and it is obvious that they will be forced to turn their attention to other pursuits in order to gain a livelihood. The increase of such salaries will add something to our taxes, but the amount will be so small as scarcely to be felt by the people. I doubt not they will cheerfully contribute in this way to aid in sustaining good and competent men in important official positions. I recommend, therefore, that immediate action be taken in this matter.

The financial condition of the State demands the early and prompt attention of this general assembly. The reports of the comptroller and treasurer are to October 1, 1861. From that time to the restoration of the capital to the national authority, February following, and the flight of the State authorities, the information left us is imperfect and insufficient. The subsequent operations will appear from the current report of the comptroller, whose high character for integrity and truth commend him to your confidence. The balance in the treasury on the 1st of October, 1861, according to the treasurer's report, was $185,496 66; besides, warrants for payment remain in the treasury for $60,461 04. Warrants for payment out of the treasury had been issued but not presented for $145,417 12. How far the figures were modified by the operations of the next four months and a half, to the middle of February, 1862, I have no information. Except the military expenses, it is presumed that the balance was not changed, judging from the uniformity apparent in the fiscal operations of the preceding four years. Since that time Middle and West Tennessee have been generally within the federal lines, and East Tennessee since September 1, 1862. Governor Johnson has occupied the capitol, and exercised gubernatorial jurisdiction over those portions of the State held by federal authority. Governor Harris, who adhered to the rebel cause, is very generally understood to have collected revenue in the counties within their military lines. The comptroller will be found to have given in his report the financial history of Governor Johnson's administration. This report is respectfully submitted for your careful consideration, and the recommendations of that officer are approved by me. What moneys were collected by Governor Harris and his subordinates I am unable to state, nor am I prepared to say that it is important for you to inquire. It will be a matter for your consideration whether the arrearage of taxes for the past four years shall be collected in whole or in part. The principal, if not the current, liabilities during that period are the interest on the State debt. The usual payments to common schools and academies, and to several charitable institutions of the State, were not made. The consequences of the failure would not be atoned for by reaching them now. The same is substantially true of various other items of ordinary expenditures.

The State debt, as reported by the comptroller in October, 1861, is said to be $6,896,606 66, and this demands your attention. This includes $3,000,000 of eight per cent. bonds for the "defence of the State," which has recently been discarded by the people at the ballot-box. This unauthorized and most unjust indebtedness repudiated, leaves the indebtedness of the State properly $3,896,606 66, at an annual interest of $212,335 25. The interest is presented to have been paid on the 1st of January, 1861. It is not known how much has since been paid, if any. The bonds will show, either by the indorsements or the absence of the coupons. Besides this debt the State has bonds for internal improvement purposes, and has indorsed the bonds of railroad companies to the amount of $16,211,000. For these the State is ultimately liable upon the failure of the companies. These bonds it is believed the State will have to provide for to preserve its credit, making an aggregate indebtedness of $20,005,606 66, and the annual interest $1,185,048 25. Of this debt proper $66,666 66 matured in 1861, $61,250 in 1862, $177,750 in 1863, and $58,500 in 1864—in all, $366,166 66, at once to be provided for. The comptroller states that the bonds maturing in 1861 were "taken possession of and held by the State, subject to adjustment at the end of the war." Besides these the State held bonds, mostly her own, as follows: the Spencer T. Hunt fund, 6; the railroad sinking fund, 161; deposited by the free banks, 341; deposited by foreign insurance companies, 80; and in all, 588 bonds. These bonds, held in trust, were carried away, it is believed, with the valuables of the State treasury, by the State officers, who ingloriously fled on the approach of the national flag. Double payment can probably be avoided. Evidence must be in existence by which they can be identified. The notorious condition of our State affairs has been sufficient to put dealers upon their guard. So that if any of the bonds have been fraudulently sold, payment to the present holders may be justly stopped. Furthermore, it will be well to consider how far it is your duty as agents of the State, not only not to pay the bonds held by those who have been actively engaged in the rebellion to overthrow the government, whether held by them or parties who may seek to conceal them for the benefit of the rebels, as they will likely do, I advise that you adopt measures to prevent their payment. The bonds can in no event compensate for the loss the disloyal holders have occasioned the State. The justice of holding them responsible in this way it is believed cannot be successfully controverted.

The arrearage of interest, amounting to nearly twenty-five per cent. of the principal, is more than the people can easily pay at sight, with the other burdens, public and private, thrown upon them by the war. It will be necessary, therefore, to anticipate the means, so as at the same time to preserve the State credit by satisfying the creditors and to preserve the people from oppressive taxation.

The recent amendment to the State constitution abolishing slavery will require some changes in the revenue laws. The item of slaves will no longer appear in the list of taxables. The census of 1860 shows there were in the State about 275,000. The assessors' returns show that 130,425 were reported for taxation. Their average value had steadily increased from $413 72 in 1846 to $886 40. It is a significant fact that the next year, the first of the war, the average fell to $769 36, taxes being at the low rate of seven cents upon the one hundred dollars, to which our State taxation was reduced in 1860, the slaves averaging a little the rise of sixty-two cents each, amounting to $80,000 in the aggregate. The slaves held no property. Being emancipated, they will now be subjected to a poll-tax. Many of them will soon acquire taxable property far beyond their personal value as slaves.

As soon as this war ceases there is every reason to expect a large accession to our population. Thousands of sensible and practical men have been here, connected with the army, and have looked with astonishment and delight at our productive soil, charming climate, and great advantages of agriculture. They have seen that a farm hand in a northern State is ordinarily worth from thirty to fifty dollars a month—that is to say, he earns that much, or say $600 per annum. In our State a good farm hand can make five bales of cotton of five hundred pounds each, which would make the profits of his labor worth $2,000 per annum, against $600 in a northern State—a better and more certain business than going to California or any of the gold regions. Therefore it is the value of land with us will be proportionately increased. If the tax of seven cents on the one hundred dollars, to which our burdens had been reduced in 1860, shall be increased to a reasonable extent, it is believed sufficient revenue will be realized in the next three years, over and above the ordinary expenditures, to meet the arrears of interest on the debt, to pay the sum now due, and the further sum of $1,245,090, falling due in 1868.

It is further suggested that the list of taxable property might be increased without being oppressive. By the returns of 1860 it appears that all "other property" subject to taxation, besides land, amounted in value to but $24,362,151—less than one-half the assessed value of the town lots. Before the war our financial resources were so ample, compared with the limited demands upon them, that it was necessary to tax but a few of the principle articles of property. Our affairs are now quite changed, and every interest should be made to bear its proper burdens.

The common school system will, in this connexion, demand your attention. The fund appropriated for this purpose has been squandered by the bad men and dishonest functionaries who fled on the approach of the old flag. What shall be done to replace this great loss? At no period in the history of the State has the young and rising generation appealed so affectingly for legislative aid. Practically denied all scholastic advantages during the last four years, and deprived as thousands have been of their natural protectors, if they are not soon provided for, it will be too late for them. Indeed, not a few have already passed beyond the age to attend school, hopelessly illiterate.

In this connexion your attention is called to an act of Congress providing for the establishment of an agricultural college. Most of the States are in advance of us in accepting the offer, and perhaps we might profit by examining their legislation in regard to this subject.

The currency and the banks are nearly allied to finances, and are in such a demoralized condition as to demand prompt action and most positive legislation. The State owes it to herself to look into the condition of the three old banks—the Bank of Tennessee, the Union and the Planters' banks—each having its parent bank in Nashville, with affiliated branches extending over the State; also several stock banks and the free banks. With, perhaps, one or two exceptions, it is believed they are all hopelessly insolvent. All have, beyond doubt, violated their charters, and may properly be closed up. Nay, where they have value received for their notes and are worth it they should be made to redeem their issues. The policy formed by these banks, even before the war, was to keep their paper at lower quotations than that of any of the surrounding States. Even at home it was at a discount, and in some of the neighboring States it was uncurrent. This imposed upon our commerce the payment of large sums of premiums upon all remittances beyond the State, which in the end came off the people. Such a currency could only result from unsound financial principles; for the balance of trade with most of the surrounding States was decidedly in our favor. It is therefore recommended that all existing banks be wound up at once, and that no more State banks be chartered. The several hundred thousand in real estate owned by the State bank should be cashed without delay. The stock was owned by the State, and it held large deposits of currency and securities. As the Union army advanced to the possession and occupation of the towns where the branches were located the officers fled with the assets beyond the limits of the State, and they are now doubtless irretrievably gone. In the outset of the rebellion this bank was used by the guilty conspirators, and large issues were made to further their schemes of treason. It has been determined by the people that these issues shall not be paid.

There are many notes outstanding of the bank issued after the date specified in your amended constitution, and intended alone for the benefit of the rebellion. Shall they be redeemed by a tax imposed upon the people? I know of no legal or moral obligation to redeem those notes, even if they occupied such an attitude that such an obligation could be enforced. It is known that when bank notes become uncurrent they are sold by the small holders, who are not in a condition to hold such paper, and bought up by speculators, generally at their own figures. In this way they accumulate in the hands of a few, often at prices almost nominal. The notes of the Bank of Tennessee, it is believed, are held in this way and by this class of dealers. Having lost the principal of this banking capital, and having sold these issues in small quantities at a heavy discount, shall our people be taxed to make these issues good in the hands of speculators? I confess I can see no equity in it. Doubtless instances will occur of individual hardship, and others will be pressed upon your attention, not so much by the parties themselves as by others interested in the adoption of a general policy based upon these existing cases. There remain to the bank large assets, uncollected debts, and the present liabilities of the faithless officers. Suits are understood to be pending against many of these officers of branches. The others should be held to their responsibilities. I content myself with these general suggestions, trusting in your wisdom, if you deem them practicable, to arrange the details.

The national banking system is believed on many accounts to be preferable. This would give us a circulation current all over the country, and subject our banking to more correct principles of finance. Other States are adopting the national banking system, and I recommend the same to the legislature of Tennessee. Such an institution could be used profitably as the fiscal agent of the State, and if you can secure the means, one in each of the other grand divisions of the State would work to advantage.

The qualification of voters, and other limitations of the elective franchise, have been intrusted to you by the people. This delicate responsibility will devolve upon you a heavy task, and merits your whole attention. That there should be some additional limitations prescribed few will deny. Many persons in the State, by every act of which they were capable have disfranchised themselves. Probably they neither expected or desired the privilege of again voting, and would not exercise it if granted them. Many others have committed acts deserving disfranchisement, who nevertheless will resist it, and strive for every civil right they enjoyed before the war, and before their treason had involved the State in so much suffering. While I would not recommend you to give way to the impulse of vengeance any more than to the appeals of sympathy and pity, I would urge you to guard the ballot-box faithfully and effectually against the approach of treason, no matter in what character it may come. The loyal people of the State who sent you here expect you to act decisively in the matter, and have no child's play in determining the qualification of voters. The subject has been considered by several of our sister States, whose reform was not any more loudly called for than with us. It is quite probable that this action and its effects may assist you in deciding what to accept and what to avoid.

As you are aware, upon the approach of the national forces and their occupation of our country, the government took possession of our railroads, in most of which the State is a large stockholder. The State is deeply interested in her internal improvements, as she has indorsed bonds at the rate of ten thousand dollars per mile, for nearly all the railroads in Tennessee. And as most of these bonds are held by guardians for the benefit, in many instances, of minors and widows, I think it nothing more than simple justice to pay them the interest already due them.

The Nashville and Chattanooga railroad was taken possession of by the federal authorities on the 7th of March, 1862, and has been held and used ever since, and, regarded as a military necessity, it was proper and right. Presuming the government to have kept the account strictly, she is now about ready to make a settlement. My information is that certain officers of the company visited Washington on two different occasions for the purpose of obtaining a settlement with the quartermaster general. They failed in their efforts, though the President of the United States, who was present on both occasions, expressed his views verbally as favoring the payment of the company for the use of the road. You should now call upon the proper authorities at Washington for payment to this and other companies, requiring the money received to be applied to the payment of interest on their bonds. The amount indorsed by the State for the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company is $1,535,000, and the interest accrued thereon is now nearly $300,000. It is believed that upon a just settlement the government will owe the company largely over that amount. This road cost the company $3,846,900, including its equipments and depots.

The other roads in the State are similarly situated and demand your attention. Those officers of roads and stockholders who fled south, carrying with them the rolling stock and funds, should be held to a strict accountability, and their property and stock should be made in part to atone for these losses to the State and country. The case of the East Tennessee and Georgia railroad and its faithless president requires our special attention.

It is believed the time has now come for the companies again to use their roads—for the government, if need be, under even a military superintendent—thereby effecting a vast saving to the government, asking only the same pay for freights and passengers they are now paying to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company. As this war is for the benefit of the whole nation, it is not believed that the general government intends that Tennessee shall pay more than her just proportion of the war debt.

Your attention is called to the fact that the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company is running a portion of that road in this State, say about sixty miles, with another branch from Bowling Green to Clarksville, and for all that portion of road in our State the government pays the Kentucky company as if the road were in any other loyal State. The information I have is to the effect that the Kentucky company treats with indifference the claims of Tennessee upon that road. It is your duty to let that company know, in decided but respectful terms, what your rights are, and that you dare assert and maintain them.

The duty devolves upon you at this session of electing two senators to the Congress of the United States, and of re-districting the State, so as, without delay, to provide for the election of eight representatives to the next Congress. It is with profound regret that I have observed several republican journals, and some leading politicians of ability and influence are opposed to the admission of senators and representatives from Tennessee. They take the ground that the State should be treated as a Territory and continued under military government, subject to the arbitrary orders of military rule. If their dangerous and revolutionary doctrine is adhered to by any considerable portion of senators and representatives in Congress I shall, for one, dread the consequences. My confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of senators and representatives leads me to believe they will discard, indignantly, any such proposition. The loyal people of Tennessee have resolved through the ballot-box to rule themselves under the federal flag; taking the ground that the State has never been out of the Union, and boldly denying that the unconstitutional and treasonable acts of those in rebellion ever carried them out of the Union. Besides, the inauguration of the Vice-President from this State, and the withdrawal of a military governor to give place to civil authority, fix the status of Tennessee in the estimation of the federal authorities proper. And to your good sense and unyielding firmness I submit this grave question, not doubting that your action will be correct.

Your attention is called to the condition of affairs in the State prison, full and specific details of which are given in the report of the officer who is in charge of that institution. I have every confidence that the legislature will look into the wants of the institution, and do for it what, in the judgment of members, may seem proper. Meanwhile, I suggest the establishment of branches of the penitentiary in the western district and in East Tennessee. The cost of building on a moderate scale would be saved to the State in fifteen or twenty years in the single item of a cash market, in each end of the State, for provisions to sustain, and raw material to keep the convicts employed in manufacturing—such as lumber, marble, iron, coal, leather, &c. The erection of buildings would furnish employment and cash wages to a number of mechanics; and, as there are several salaried officers attached to such an institution, it would distribute the patronage of the State in her three natural divisions. If this be not done, an enlargement of the State prison will be required. The demoralized condition of both our white and colored population will cause scores to be sent to the penitentiary as our courts go into operation.

The Tennessee hospital for the insane, one of the charitable institutions of the State, located in this vicinity, deserves your attention and your aid. The prosperity and success of that noble State charity were all that its friends and the friends of humanity could desire at the breaking out of this wicked rebellion; but the institution has struggled hard to keep above the waves of oblivion for four years past. It kept its deposits in the Bank of Tennessee, and my information is, that when the faithless officers of the bank fled, on the approach of the national flag, they carried with them some $30,000 belonging to the institution. For the details in regard to its past operations and present necessities I refer you to the report of the superintendent and chief surgeon, a faithful and intelligent citizen.

The Tennessee blind school, a State institution in this city, has been utterly destroyed by the federal forces, and the unfortunate pupils, some forty in number, are distributed among their friends and the friends of humanity. It was not a military necessity that called for the destruction of the institution, but it was the work of recklessness; and if this general assembly will present the subject to the government at Washington in this light, it is believed that proper steps will be taken to restore this noble charity. The hopes of those pupils at best are blasted and their cup of bitterness is full when we have done all that lies in our power. We look out upon the world and we know it by its visible beauty; we know our wives by their affectionate looks, our children by their smiles and features, our neighbors by their faces and manner of address; but these, and all other earthly things, are to these blind people shrouded in darkness, and friends, children, and the world are lost to them forever.

The Tennessee deaf and dumb school, located at Knoxville, merits your attention, as it is one of the charitable institutions of the State. The exciting events which are daily transpiring in the country should not induce us to lose sight of those whose misfortunes so strongly appeal to us for aid and comfort. The buildings and grounds, erected and purchased at a heavy expense by the State, are now used for hospital purposes by our army. Of the fourteen trustees, nine of them went into the rebellion, and most of them fled south. An equal proportion of the officers and teachers of the school proved to be rebels. An early organization of the institution upon a loyal basis is called for, and it is hoped will attract your attention.

The East Tennessee university, located at Knoxville, is a time-honored institution, and was chartered and endowed by the State in 1807. It has been almost destroyed by the federal army. The library, furniture, and fixtures are hopelessly destroyed. The main buildings are standing, and it is but just to the educational interests of the most loyal portion of the State that the government should place that institution on as good a footing as it found it. A majority of the board of trustees turned out to be rebels, and their places should be filled with loyal men.

There are doubtless other institutions in the State which deserve the attention of this general assembly, but I am not informed as to their situations. The members representing all the counties will be able to look after their interests, and should feel that the duty devolves upon them.

Having thus fully placed before you the information requisite to enable you to judge of the condition of the State, the evils which environ us, and the measures of legislation needed for averting them and ridding ourselves of them, it remains for me but to invoke your attention to the consideration of those means by which, above all others, we may hope to restore order and prosperity to our country. And if one be more prominent than another, it is the necessity for earnest and cordial co-operation between the State and federal government. To you especially, as senators and representatives, do the loyal people of Tennessee look for encouragement and counsel. And to your action in the halls of legislation will all eyes be turned—not only in Tennessee, but in other States—for examples of what is befitting loyal men. I feel full confidence that you will prove yourselves equal to the emergency, and meet expectations both at home and abroad. I feel assured that, being united in a common and holy cause, you will rise above all selfish considerations, and, bowing submissively to the Divine will, you will unite with all good men in reverently invoking the blessings of our Heavenly Father upon all we say and do while in the service of the State.

It is, perhaps, proper for me to state that since writing this message important facts have come to my knowledge, and upon unquestionable authority, relating to the use of a portion of the funds of the Bank of Tennessee, that may require me to send you, at no distant day, a special message. The interests of the State, and the just rights of the people, should be sacredly and vigilantly guarded, no matter who suffers ruin and disgrace.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW.

Public acts of the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, passed at the first session of the thirty-fourth general assembly, which was begun and held at Nashville on Monday, the third day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

CHAPTER I.

AN ACT to regulate the county court of Shelby county.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That in the county of Shelby, in case of vacancy, removal, or when the county judge shall, from any cause whatever, fail to hold his court, and a majority of the magistrates shall fail to appear and elect a chairman, as is now provided by law, the clerk of said court shall give notice, in writing, to any judge or chancellor of said county, who shall have full power to hold said county court and discharge all the duties as the judge or chairman could do by law.

SEC. 2. This act to take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed April 28, 1865.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 10, 1865.

CHAPTER IV.

AN ACT to punish all armed prowlers, guerillas, brigands, and highway robbers, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That every man or squad of men, who may hereafter make inroads for plunder upon the peaceable inhabitants of this State, and by force deprive them of their property, or endeavor so to deprive them, by the alarm caused by their being armed, when in fact he or they were not at the time part of any organized army and sharing continuously in its duties, but who sometimes return to their homes, with the assumption of the semblance of peaceful pursuits, divesting him or themselves of the appearance and character of soldiers, are hereby declared guerillas and highway robbers and brigands, and upon his or their conviction shall suffer death by hanging.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That scouts or single soldiers, if disguised in the dress of the country, or clothed in the uniform of either army, who shall willfully, maliciously and forcibly take from the possession or person of the peaceful citizens of the State their property by threats of violence, or the actual use of force and violence and under the terror of arms, shall, upon conviction, suffer death by hanging.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That all armed prowlers, by whatever name they may be called, who shall willfully, maliciously and forcibly make an attack upon any one of the peaceable citizens of this State for the purpose of robbing him or her, or of stealing his or her property, or of killing him or her, shall, on conviction, suffer death by hanging.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That all persons who shall knowingly, willingly, and voluntarily feed any such person or persons as described in the previous sections of this act, or furnish them information for the purpose of aiding and assisting them in their unlawful and illegal objects, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a period of not less than five years nor more than twenty-one years.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 17, 1865.

CHAPTER V.

AN ACT to amend the criminal laws of the State of Tennessee.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That whoever shall feloniously take or steal any horse, mule, or ass, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death by hanging: Provided, The jury before whom the offence is tried shall, if they think proper, commute the punishment to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That whoever shall feloniously break open the house of another for the purpose of committing a larceny or robbery therein, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death by hanging: Provided, The jury before whom the offender is tried and convicted may, if they think proper, commute the punishment for the offence to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That whoever shall feloniously rob another, or steal from his person, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death by hanging: Provided, The jury before whom the offender is tried and convicted may, if they think proper, commute the punishment to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That any person duly convicted of house or bridge burning, shall suffer death by hanging: Provided, The jury, if they think proper, may commute the punishment to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years: And provided, further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as repealing the laws now in force for the punishing of the offences mentioned in this act; but all persons who have heretofore committed any of the offences mentioned in this act shall be tried under the existing laws, and, if convicted, shall be punished as now prescribed by law.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 17, 1865.

CHAPTER VI.

AN ACT to repeal the 3d article of the 5th chapter, title 5, of the Code of Tennessee.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the 3d article of the 5th chapter, title 5, 2d part of the Code of Tennessee, be and is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 18, 1865.

CHAPTER VII.

AN ACT to establish the eighth chancery district of Tennessee.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That an eighth chancery district be, and is hereby, established in the State of Tennessee, to be composed of the counties of Sevier, Blount, Monroe, Roane, Knox, Anderson, and McMinn.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the chancellor elected, pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall hold the courts in the several counties composing said district at the times and places in said counties now designated by law, and said chancellor shall have all the powers and emoluments given to other chancellors of this State; and until a chancellor shall be appointed or elected for said district, it shall be the duty of the present chancellor to hold the courts in said counties as heretofore.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 22, 1865.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN ACT to amend the revenue laws of the State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That section 553 of the Code of Tennessee be, and the same is hereby, amended, so that the following rate of taxation shall be levied and collected, as now provided for, by law: on every taxable poll, one dollar; on every hundred dollar's worth of taxable property, twenty-five cents; on sales of land, one cent per acre; on sales of town lots, or parts of town lots, for each lot, or part, five dollars; on sales of merchandise by merchants, two cents on the dollar on its invoice cost at the place where purchased, unless the tax on the same has once before been paid to the State, in which event no additional tax will be paid; on sales of merchandise by a peddler, for each county in which he travels, if on foot, twenty dollars; if on horseback, fifty dollars; if in a vehicle, fifty dollars; and for each vehicle, if he uses more than one, fifty dollars; on the regular business of selling at auction any article, the selling of which is not taxable, fifty dollars; in all other cases the same rate which is imposed on sales of merchandise on commission, on the regular business of selling goods, wares, and merchandise on commission, on the gross amount of sales, public and private, when the amount does not exceed ten thousand dollars, thirty-five dollars; between ten and twenty thousand dollars, sixty dollars; between twenty and thirty thousand dollars, eighty-five dollars; between thirty and forty thousand dollars, one hundred and ten dollars; and in like ratio; on the regular or general business of brokers, one thousand dollars; on granting policies of insurance, by other than companies chartered by the State, twelve hundred and fifty dollars; on the business of banking, by companies operating under the law to authorize and regulate the business of banking, thirty-five cents on each hundred dollars of the capital of each bank; on the business of banking by banks, or associations of persons of other States of the Union, three-fourths of one per cent. on the capital stated in the affidavit filed for the license as intended to be used in the succeeding twelve months; on discounting securities for money, shaving notes, two cents on every dollar employed, but in no case less than ten dollars; on theatrical exhibitions, if the theatre or place of exhibition be in a city, five hundred dollars; if in other places, fifty dollars; on exhibiting for profit a circus, or circus and animal show, seats of activity or strength, if in a city, one hundred dollars for each day and night exhibition; if in any other places than aforesaid, fifty dollars; on keeping a confectionery, ice-cream saloon, and other places of refreshment, seven and a half per cent. on the capital employed, and the keeper shall take out a license as merchants by law are now required, and shall, in addition to said per centum, pay ten dollars for each privilege; on each petition filed in any court of record for the division and distribution of estates, five dollars; on each appeal, writ of error, or certiorari from the circuit or chancery court to the supreme court, five dollars; on each appeal or certiorari, from before a justice of the peace, three dollars and fifty cents; on each presentment or indictment, three dollars and fifty cents; on each original suit in any of the courts of law or equity in this State, five dollars.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the owners of steam, saw, and grist mills, erected upon the lands of another, shall pay an annual tax to the State of one hundred dollars; that all persons who set themselves up as lawyers, and propose to practice law in any of the courts of the State, or held within the State, or before any military commission, shall pay an annual tax to the State of twenty-five dollars; that all persons who propose so to practice shall take out a license from the county court clerk of some county, certifying that the tax has been paid. Any person proposing to, and practicing as aforesaid, failing, or refusing to take out said license, shall pay a double tax, to be recovered before any circuit court of the State where motion is made by the attorney general of any district, upon ten days' notice to said delinquent, either by publication in some newspaper in the State, or in writing.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That all persons who set themselves up as doctors of medicine or surgeons (the term doctor, to include all persons who, for pay, propose to cure diseases, public or private, and the term surgeon shall be taken in the general application of the term, and shall include dentists,) shall pay an annual tax to the State of twenty-five dollars; license to be obtained, payment made, and recovery had, as provided for in the second section of this act, governing lawyers.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That all persons known as photographers, and dealing in photographic and ambrotype apparatus and material, shall take out a license, and pay the same tax to the State as merchants now pay; and all persons who are or may hereafter set themselves up as artists, for the purpose of taking photographs, ambrotypes, or daguerrean likenesses, if in a city, for each gallery opened, one hundred dollars; at any other place, excepting in the country, twenty-five dollars; if in the country, five dollars; (the term gallery to mean any place where the artist takes pictures;) said tax to be paid to the clerk of the county where the gallery is opened. Any person opening a gallery as aforesaid, without paying the tax, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That sub-section two of section 691 of the code of the State be, and is hereby, amended, by striking out the words "twenty-five dollars" and inserting the words "fifty dollars," and by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "twenty."

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That the foregoing tax shall be assessed and collected as is now provided by law; that any county which refuses or fails to make the assessment and appoint a tax collector to collect the taxes due the State within the year 1865, unless the governor of the State shall be satisfied that the people of the county made honest efforts so to do, and it was impossible for them to comply with this act, shall pay a double tax; and the governor shall send an assessor of his own appointing to said county, with a sufficient posse to levy and collect said double tax; that the collector so appointed shall seize a sufficiency of the delinquent's personal property to satisfy the taxes and charges, and sell the same in any county of the State where he can get bidders, after giving the notice now required by law. If the delinquent have no personal property of which to make the taxes, then the collector shall levy on sufficient real estate to pay the same, and shall return the facts to the nearest county having resumed civil functions; and upon return of a written statement of the facts, the circuit court shall, at the second term of the court, condemn the real estate of the delinquent, or so much thereof as will be of value sufficient to satisfy the taxes and costs. And the collector shall, after giving forty days' notice in writing, posted on the court-house door of the county where the land was condemned, as well as in the county where the land is situated, if practicable, sell the same at public outcry to the highest bidder, in the same manner and with the same conditions, and upon the same terms, as now provided by law; but this section shall not apply to soldiers belonging to the United States army, or soldiers that have served in the same and have been honorably discharged, or their widows or minor children.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That the 553d section of the Code of Tennessee be so amended as to read as follows: "On keeping a tract for turf-raeing, two hundred dollars; for half-mile tracts, one hundred dollars; for quarter-mile tracts, fifty dollars."

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That any person of undoubted loyalty residing in a county where the tax has been collected, as provided in this act, shall have the privilege of paying his tax at any time before or at the time the collector comes into the county to collect the double tax provided by this act.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That all express companies doing business in the State of Tennessee shall take out a license from the comptroller, and pay over to him one thousand dollars for the privilege of doing business; and, in addition, give bond to the comptroller of five thousand dollars, to account and pay over one-half of one per cent. on their income from their business done in this State.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That the tax assessed on lawyers, by this act, shall be collected by the clerk of the county court of the county where the lawyer resides. Said clerk shall issue license.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That all persons who are engaged in tanning leather as an occupation, shall pay into the treasury of the State twenty-five dollars as a privilege tax.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That, after paying the interest on the State debt proper and current expenses of the State, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars be applied to common school purposes, in addition to what is now allowed by law for said purposes. That all the laws of the State upon the subject of taxes, except as altered or repealed by this act, are still in full force and effect. That the county courts of this State shall have the power to embrace in the catalogue of subjects of taxation for county purposes all subjects mentioned in this act. This act shall take effect from and after the date of its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed May 24, 1865.

CHAPTER IX.

AN ACT to more effectually manage the penitentiary, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the salary of the keeper of the penitentiary of the State shall be two thousand dollars a year, and no more; and that section 5442 of the code be, and the same is hereby, repealed, so far as it gives to the keeper one hundred dollars a year for the board of each assistant keeper.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all of the assistants, clerks, guards, and other employes, shall be boarded at the expense of the penitentiary, without any compensation being paid to the keeper; and it is hereby made the duty of the keeper to have the food properly prepared without any additional expense to the penitentiary.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the keeper of the penitentiary shall hereafter be elected by the joint vote of the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, in convention assembled.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the penitentiary shall be enlarged; and for this purpose the inspectors and keeper of the penitentiary are hereby instructed and required to direct the labor of the convicts to that end and object, so as to enclose the ground belonging to the penitentiary now open, or so much thereof as, in their opinion, the necessities of the institution may require.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the attorney general of the State be, and is hereby, instructed and commanded to examine into the item of the account showing that there is due to the penitentiary the sum of fifty thousand one hundred and thirty-two dollars and eighteen cents, by note and account; and if said indebtedness has been created since the year 1858, to institute legal proceedings against the keepers and their securities who have created said indebtedness in violation of law; and for this purpose he may procure competent counsel to represent the interests of the State, who shall be paid as the general assembly may hereafter direct.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That the office of auditing clerk in the penitentiary be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

CHAPTER XVI.

AN ACT to limit the elective franchise.

Whereas the first article and the first section of the declaration of rights in the constitution of the State of Tennessee declares: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; for the advancement of these ends they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper; and whereas a large and respectable convention of the free and loyal people of the State of Tennessee met in the city of Nashville, on the 9th day of January, 1865, and proposed certain alterations and amendments to the constitution of the State of Tennessee, for rejection or ratification by the loyal people on the 22d of February following; and whereas said amendments and schedule were solemnly ratified with great unanimity by the authoritative voice of the people; and whereas the 8th section of said schedule provided for the election of a governor and members of the legislature on the 4th day of March, 1865, and who, in accordance therewith, were elected by the ballots of the loyal people; and whereas the same authoritative voice, in section 9th of the schedule, delegated to the general assembly meeting first under this amended constitution, the right to fix the qualification of voters and the limitation of the elective franchise; therefore, acting faithfully under and in accordance with this delegation of supreme power—

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the following persons, to wit:

1. Every white man twenty-one years of age, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, and publicly known to have entertained unconditional Union sentiments from the outbreak of the rebellion until the present time; and

2. Every white man, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, having arrived at the age of twenty-one years since March 4, 1865: Provided, That he has not been engaged in armed rebellion against the authority of the United States voluntarily; and

3. Every white man of lawful age coming from another State, and being a citizen of the United States, on proof of loyalty to the United States, and being a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election; and

4. Every white man, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of this State, who has served as a soldier in the army of the United States, and has been or may be hereafter honorably discharged therefrom; and

5. Every white man of lawful age, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the county wherein he may offer his vote six months next preceding the day of election, who was conscripted by force into the so-called confederate army, and was known to be a Union man, on proof of loyalty to the United States, established by the testimony of two voters under the previous clauses of this section; and

6. Every white man who voted in this State at the presidential election in November, 1864, or voted on the 22d of February, 1865, or voted on the 4th of March, 1865, in this State, and all others who had taken the "oath of allegiance" to the United States, and may be known by the judges of election to have been true friends to the government of the United States, and would have voted in said previously mentioned elections if the same had been holden within their reach, shall be entitled to the privileges of the elective franchise.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all persons who are or shall have been civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called Confederate States of America, or who have left judicial stations under the United States or the State of Tennessee to aid, in any way, the existing or recent rebellion against the authority of the United States, or who are or shall have been military or naval officers of the so-called Confederate States, above the rank of captain in the army or lieutenant in the navy; or who have left seats in the United States Congress or seats in the legislature of the State of Tennessee to aid said rebellion, or have resigned commissions in the army or navy of the United States, and afterwards have voluntarily given aid to said rebellion; or persons who have engaged in treating otherwise than lawfully, as prisoners of war, persons found in the United States service as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacities; or persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion; or persons who held pretended offices under the government of States in insurrection against the United States; or persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, or fled before the approach of the national forces and passed beyond the federal military lines into the so-called Confederate States, for the purpose of aiding the rebellion, shall be denied and refused the privilege of the elective franchise in this State for the term of fifteen years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That all other persons, except those mentioned in section 1 of this act, are hereby and henceforth excluded and denied the exercise of the privilege of the elective franchise in this State for the term of five years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That all persons embraced in section 3 of this act, after the expiration of said five years, may be readmitted to the privilege of the elective franchise by petition to the circuit or chancery court, on proof of loyalty to the United States, in open court, upon the testimony of two or more loyal citizens of the United States.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That so long as any of the white citizens of the State of Tennessee, who by this act are entitled to exercise the elective franchise, shall be connected with the army of the United States, or with the military force of this State in actual service, the governor shall issue writs of election to the commanding officers of such brigades, regiments, or detachments of Tennessee soldiers, wherever located, who shall open and hold the election, and receive the votes of their respective commands, and return the same to the secretary of state, and which shall be counted in the same way and manner as if said votes had been cast in any of the counties of the State to which the soldiers belonged.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the county court clerk, in each county, to open and keep a registration of voters, and before whom, under oath, that the voter falls within the provisions of article 1 of this act, shall be made. Provided, No man of publicly known Union sentiments shall be required to make oath in doing the same; and said clerk shall receive such compensation as the county court in each county may deem proper; and also said clerk shall issue to all such persons a certificate of registration, and no one shall be permitted by the judges of election to vote unless so registered.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That any voter may be challenged by an admitted voter of section 1 of this act, on offering his vote; and thereupon the judges of election shall peremptorily administer to the person so challenged, before permitting him to vote, the following oath, said oath also to be taken by all judges of election and candidates for office:

"OATH

"I solemnly swear that I will henceforth support the Constitution of the United States and defend it against the assaults of all its enemies; that I am an active friend of the government of the United States; that I will heartily aid and assist the loyal people in whatever measures may be adopted under the Constitution of the United States, and under all laws and proclamations made in pursuance thereof, to establish the national authority over all the people of every State and Territory embraced in the national Union; and that I will faithfully and most heartily support and defend the constitution of the State of Tennessee, and the amendments and schedule thereunto appended and adopted by the people on the 22d day of February, 1865; and also all acts of the general assembly assembled in accordance therewith; and that I take this oath freely, voluntarily, and without mental reservation: So help me God."

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That any person taking this oath falsely shall be guilty of perjury, and shall suffer the pains and penalties attached to that crime.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the power is reserved to alter, amend, or change the provisions of this act at any time when, in the opinion of this general assembly of the State, it is right and proper to do so.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER XVII.

AN ACT to repeal an act incorporating a military department in Andrew College, and the Memphis Arms Company, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the acts incorporating a military department in Andrew College, and the Memphis Arms Company, which were passed January 30, 1861, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That an act passed January 31, 1861, authorizing the mayor of the city of Memphis and the sheriff of Shelby county to call out the 154th regiment to suppress insurrection, riot, or invasion, at the expense of the city and county, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That an act to incorporate the Memphis Light Dragoon Company, which was passed January 31, 1861, be, and is hereby, repealed.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AN ACT to amend section 117 of the code, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the criminal court of the county of Montgomery be, and the same is hereby, abolished; and that the jurisdiction of said court be, and the same is hereby, conferred upon the circuit court of Montgomery county as fully and completely as can by law be done.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all of the causes in the criminal court of Montgomery county shall be transferred to the circuit court of Montgomery county, and all bonds taken for the appearance of defendants be returnable to the first Tuesday after the second Monday in September, 1865, before said circuit court.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the circuit judge of the tenth judicial circuit of the State of Tennessee shall have full power to try all such criminal causes as may be thus transferred to it, or that may hereafter arise in the county of Montgomery; and that he is hereby clothed with full power to fix a day at each term of his court when all such business shall be taken up.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That there shall be regularly empanelled a grand jury for the county of Davidson, which shall be elected, sworn, and empanelled by the circuit court of Davidson county, and shall have its sittings during the regular session of said court, and with full power of all other grand juries in the State; and that the bills and presentments so made by the grand jury thus empanelled and returned, shall be regularly transferred to the criminal court of Davidson county for process to issue, and trial to be had, as in other criminal cases.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the circuit court of Montgomery county shall have full power, with all other criminal courts of the State, to organize and empanel a grand jury as now provided for by law.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER XIX.

AN ACT to authorize the investment of trust funds, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the courts of law and equity in this State be, and they are hereby, authorized to have the money and funds in the hands of clerks and receivers, or trustees, in litigation, or under the control of said courts, invested in the public stocks or bonds of the United States, under such rules and orders in each case as may be legal and just.

SEC. 2. That guardians, executors, administrators, and trustees shall also be authorized and empowered to invest money and funds in their hands in the public stocks or bonds of the United States, and make report thereof to the county court of the county where such guardian, executor, administrator, or trustee resides, unless another mode of investment is required by will or deed of the testator or other person who has established the funds.

SEC. 3. This act to be in force from and after its passage.

WILLIAM FEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Passed June 6, 1865.

CHAPTER XX.

AN ACT to establish a claim agency of Tennessee in the city of Washington.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint an agent for the State of Tennessee, learned in the law and faithful in business, who shall keep his office in the city of Washington, whose duty it shall be, whenever requested by the party or parties interested, to prosecute before the Court of Claims at Washington, or before any of the departments at Washington, any claim or demand growing out of the existing war which the State of Tennessee, or any citizen or soldier thereof, has against the government of the United States: Provided, That the person appointed under this act shall hold no other office or appointment under the United States or the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said agent to answer all communications addressed to him by any Tennessee soldier or citizen, or any officer of the State government, in regard to any matter of business in any of the departments at Washington.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That said agent shall perform such other duties as may from time to time be required of him by the governor, and may be removed by the governor whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the people of Tennessee require it.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the agent appointed under this act shall not, directly or indirectly, receive or charge any fee for services rendered under this act to Tennessee soldiers, their widows, heirs, and legal representatives; nor shall he purchase, trade, or deal in any claim against the United States, whether the same is or is not in his hands for collection.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That any violation by said agent of the provisions of the preceding section shall be a misdemeanor in office, and punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the jury. He may be indicted in the circuit court of the county where the claimant or soldier resides, or in the circuit court of the county in which the agent resides.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That, before entering on the discharge of the duties of his office, he shall take the oath that other officers of this State are required, under the Constitution, to take, and shall execute a bond with sufficient security, to be approved of by the governor, conditioned that he will faithfully and diligently discharge the duties of his office; make full, fair, and complete returns of all claims and funds which may come into his hands or may be intrusted to him, and pay over to the claimant all money, vouchers, and effects which he may receive for any claimant; and that he will not, directly or indirectly, purchase, trade, or deal in any claim whatever against the United States; which bond shall be filed and preserved in the office of the secretary of state, and upon which any one aggrieved may maintain a suit for any breach thereof, and any recovery on the same shall not bar any other suit upon the same for any other and distinct cause of action.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That the agent shall receive, as compensation for his services under this act, a salary of fifteen hundred dollars, payable out of the State treasury.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That for prosecuting the claims of the State, or the claims of soldiers, their widows, heirs, and legal representatives, said agent shall receive no other compensation than the salary herein allowed, but for prosecuting and collecting the claims of other persons, citizens of Tennessee, he is allowed to charge any fee agreed upon between him and the claimant not exceeding five per centum on the amount of the claim allowed, where such allowance is one hundred dollars or less; if over one hundred and not exceeding one thousand dollars, five dollars on the first hundred dollars and three per centum on the residue may be charged, and if more than one thousand dollars, then two and a half per centum on the excess over one thousand dollars collected: Provided, The agent shall not attend to the prosecution of the claims of any other State, and for a violation of this section he shall be dismissed from his office by the governor, and on indictment in the circuit court of the county where the claimant resides, fined in a sum not exceeding five times the amount of fees charged.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the agent shall hold his office for a period not exceeding two years from the first day of October, 1865; and in the event of his death, resignation, or removal from office, the governor may appoint a successor for the unexpired term, who shall receive the office, books, papers, and claims of his predecessor, and be governed by the provisions of the foregoing sections of this act.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and shall continue in force until the first day of October, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 6, 1865.

CHAPTER XXIII.

AN ACT to provide for the payment of certain counsel fees.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That in all cases where suits have been brought, or may hereafter be brought, against any persons that have been connected as president, cashier, directors, debtors, or in any way liable to the Bank of Tennessee or branches, by attorneys, instructed by the attorney general of the State to bring said suits, said attorneys shall be paid such compensation for their services as the governor, secretary of the State, and the attorney general of the State may deem just; the same to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon the certificate said officers certifying the amount to the comptroller.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That in all cases where the interest of the State requires (in the judgment of the governor and attorney general of the State) additional counsel to the attorney general of the State or district attorney, the governor shall employ such counsel, who shall be paid as provided in the first section of this act. This act to take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 7, 1865.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AN ACT for the protection of sheriffs and other civil officers of the State.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the sheriffs of the several counties in this State are hereby authorized to raise a posse of men, not to exceed twenty-five in number, as a county patrol, and to aid the sheriff and all other civil officers of the county in enforcing civil law and order; and, further, the sheriffs of the different counties in this State shall, in all cases of emergency, have discretionary power to summon, in addition to the posse granted by this act, as many more men as will, in his judgment, be sufficient to either capture or disperse all opposing forces.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the above county guards shall consist of the citizens of the county, and none shall be eligible to serve but such as have a good moral character and unquestionably loyal to the United States and State of Tennessee.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the expense of raising and keeping in said service the above force shall be paid by the county in which it is raised, and the clerk of said county shall keep a current account of all such expenses, and report the same to the comptroller of the State, and that the county court shall have power to disband the same when in their opinion the causes for which they were raised shall have passed away.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 7, 1865.

CHAPTER XXV.

AN ACT "to regulate the stock of the county of Sumner in the Nashville and Louisville railroad, and for other purposes."

Whereas, under the authority of an act of the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, the citizens of Sumner county voted to subscribe $300,000 stock in the Louisville and Nashville railroad; and whereas, by a subsequent act of the legislature, said subscription was paid by the issuance of the bonds of the county, payable in twenty years, with six per cent. interest, payable semi-annually in the city of New York, $100,000 of which are dated the 1st of June, 1854, $100,000 of which are dated 1st of June, 1855, and the remaining $100,000 the 1st of June, 1856; all of which were delivered to the president of the Louisville and Nashville railroad, and for which the county received a certificate of stock in said railroad to the amount of $300,000; and whereas there has been no provision made for the redemption of the bonds of the county, issued as aforesaid to pay off the interest that has accrued since the 1st day of January, 1861:

Now, therefore, in order to enable the people of said county to free themselves from said indebtedness,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the county judge of Sumner county shall have the power, and it is hereby made his duty, to advertise in some one of the papers published in the city of Nashville and Louisville, requesting the holders of the bonds of Sumner county to file in his office their amount, date, and number, and to open a negotiation with said holders for the payment of said bonds in the stock of said county in the Louisville and Nashville railroad, at par; and in all cases where the holders of any of said bonds shall agree to take said stock, or a regular transfer thereof, dollar for dollar, then the said county judge shall make said exchange, and by power of attorney acknowledged before the clerk of the county court, or in person, transfer said stock upon the books of the company to such holder, or his, her, or their order, and receive in lieu of said stock such bond or bonds so paid; and he shall report to the next term of the county court all of the bonds so taken up. As he shall so receive a bond, he shall write in legible letters across its face cancelled, with the date and his official signature; and it shall be his duty, in the presence of the clerk thereof and such justices of the peace as may be present, to cancel said bonds, and record shall be made upon the minutes of said court of said cancellation.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That, to meet any interest due on said bonds, the county judge of Sumner county is authorized and required to ascertain from said company what is the amount of dividends due the county on said stock; and after giving three months' notice to holders of coupons in the papers aforesaid, he will pro rata the same among said holders who shall present the same as notified, and give such parties delivering up their coupons authority to draw their portion of said dividends, and as coupons shall be thus taken up, they shall be cancelled in like manner provided for the cancellation of the bonds: Provided, however, That in case any holder of a bond with interest due thereon from the 1st of January, 1861, shall be willing to exchange his bond and interest for the like amount of stock and such dividends as may be due, then said county judge shall make said exchange and deliver the necessary transfers; all of which shall be reported as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate

Passed June 7, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVI.

AN ACT to accept the surrender of the charter of the Bank of Middle Tennessee, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the surrender of the charter of the Bank of Middle Tennessee, at Lebanon, be accepted, and that the stockholders in said bank have three years to settle or liquidate the business; and that all persons holding the notes of said bank shall present them to said bank for payment within three years, or afterwards they will be barred; that said stockholders shall have all the privileges conferred by their charter which are necessary to the collecting the debts and liquidating said bank, and that said bank be exempted from the tax imposed by its charter during the three years granted by this act.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That no bank in this State shall be employed to act as a fiscal agent of the State whose president and cashier and directors have not been since the beginning of the rebellion, and are now, unconditional Union men.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That all stock banks in this State shall be allowed to surrender their charters upon the same terms, and have the same time allowed them in which to wind up their business as is allowed by this act to the Bank of Middle Tennessee: Provided, That each application shall be accompanied by a special exhibit of the bank, showing its ability to meet all its liabilities.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVII.

AN ACT to repeal the law apportioning money to division fairs and county societies.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That section 284 of article 3, chapter 4, title 3, of the code be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That section 296 of article 4, chapter 4, title 3, of the code be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That no money shall be paid out of the treasury for any annual appropriation to division fairs and county societies that may be due them, or which they may claim for any past year or years; and that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8 1865

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AN ACT to supply lost deeds and title papers.

Whereas, under the casualties of war, many of the records belonging to the several offices of the registers of the different counties in the State have been lost and destroyed, and it is necessary to preserve, as far as possible, the monuments of title to land: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the present or any subsequent owner of land in this State may, for the purpose of perpetuating the evidence of his title to his land, carry to any of the registers of the counties in this State where his land or lands are situated the original conveyances which may be in his possession, or the possession of any one else, and have the same recorded by said register in the register's books, together with the certificate attached to said original conveyances showing that it had been previously duly registered; and if the owner of the land should be informed of the existence of any original conveyance in the possession of any third party who will not voluntarily produce it for registration, then the register, on the application of the owner of the land in writing, may cause a subpoena duces tecum to issue to compel the holder to produce said deed or conveyance, so that it may be registered for the security of the title of the claimant or owner. The register shall receive the same fees as now fixed by law for similar services, to be paid by the applicant. And this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXIX.

AN ACT to modify the oath prescribed for liquor dealers.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the oath prescribed in article 6, section 691, of the code be, and is hereby, so amended as to read as follows, to wit:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will not, under the license which I am about to obtain, knowingly permit or connive at any gaming for money, or any other valuable consideration, in the house in which I may retail spirits, or in any other place of which I may have control, either directly or indirectly; and if any person should game or bet to my knowledge, (and I will exercise due diligence to know,) I will give information thereof to the grand jury of my county at the next term of the court: So help me God."

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That all persons now holding license under said section (691) may return the same to the clerk of their respective county courts, and demand in lieu thereof (on payment of the usual clerk's fee for a new license) a license for their unexpired time, in conformity with this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That so much of said section as is in conflict with this act be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

SEC. 20. Be it further enacted, That the further sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the expenses and support of the Tennessee hospital for the insane for the current year, in addition to the sums received from pay patients of that institution.

SEC. 21. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller, under the supervision of the governor of the State, take and state an account of the receipts and disbursements of the superintendent of the blind school, and on the exhibition of vouchers of a properly authenticated character, and upon being entirely satisfied that a balance is due said superintendent, the comptroller issue a warrant upon the treasurer for the same, not, however, to exceed the sum of eleven hundred dollars.

SEC. 22. Be it further enacted, That the sum of five thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for the repairing and putting into operation the deaf and dumb school at Knoxville, said appropriation to be under the direction of the governor and the loyal trustees of said institution; and the comptroller shall issue his warrant upon the treasurer, from time to time, for such sums as the governor and said trustees may direct.

SEC. 23. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller examine the accounts of Sampson & Co., for coal furnished the general assembly, and, under the supervision of the governor, issue his warrants for any amounts due them.

SEC. 24. Be it further enacted, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a porter to the capitol, at the rate of two dollars per day, to hold his office at the pleasure of the said secretary; that the comptroller issue his warrant to said employe, from time to time, for the amounts due him, upon the certificate of the secretary of state.

SEC. 25. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller issue his warrant to A. J. Adams for one hundred and forty dollars, for his services as assistant engrossing clerk, for thirty-five days, at four dollars per day.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller issue his warrant to George O. Cate, doorkeeper of the senate, for one hundred dollars, for performing the duties of messenger of the senate.

SEC. 27. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller of the treasury issue his warrant to Cone & Tunnell, for thirteen hundred and two dollars and forty-six cents, for stationery furnished the two houses of this general assembly.

SEC. 28. Be it further enacted, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, authorized to furnish the adjutant general and quartermaster's offices with necessary stationery to carry on the business of said offices; and the comptroller shall issue his warrant, from time to time, to the treasurer of the State, for the necessary amounts to pay for said stationery.

SEC. 29. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller issue his warrant to Stokely, a colored man, for services in waiting on the senate, for the sum of seventy-four dollars.

SEC. 30. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller issue his warrant for the sum of six hundred and twenty-three dollars and eight cents, for repairs and other expenses.

SEC. 31. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller issue his warrant to A. J. Fletcher, secretary of state, for ninety dollars, for clerk hire.

SEC. 32. Be it further enacted, That the board of trustees of the Tennessee hospital for the insane shall audit and examine the accounts outstanding against said institution, computed from the 14th day of March, 1862, up to the time W. P. Jones was made and appointed superintendent; and the accounts, when so ascertained, shall, upon the order of the chairman of the board of trustees, be paid; and the comptroller shall issue his warrant for the same, to be paid out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 33. Be it further enacted, That section twelve, of an act passed January 19, 1838, entitled "An act to establish a State bank to raise a fund for internal improvements and to aid in the establishment of a system of common schools," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 34. Be it further enacted, That section 2807 of the code is hereby repealed.

SEC. 35. Be it further enacted, That Willis Grantham be allowed the sum of one hundred and forty-one dollars and sixty cents, being his mileage and per diem, as contestant for a seat in the house, up to the 12th April, 1865, and that the comptroller issue his warrant, and the treasurer pay the same.

SEC. 36. Be it further enacted, That the comptroller be ordered to issue his warrant for the sum of two hundred dollars, for mileage and per diem to the 13th April, 1865, to Samuel Tigh of Shelby county, while contesting his seat in this body.

Report of the Committee on Finance, showing the mileage and per diem allowance of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives at the first session of the 34th general assembly, and the aggregate amount of each.

CHAPTER VI.

AN ACT to charter the Tennessee Express Company.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That A. Blizard, M. I. Phillips, G. W. Ross, and their associates, are hereby incorporated as a body politic and incorporate, under the name and style of the "Tennessee Express Company," for the purpose of carrying and shipping goods, wares, and merchandise, letters and private matter, money, or anything else which may be desired of said company to carry, ship, or transport on any railroad or railroads in the State of Tennessee or elsewhere.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be ten thousand dollars, more or less, as may be necessary to carry out the object of said company, and one hundred dollars shall constitute one share of stock in said company; and so soon as said sum of ten thousand dollars shall have been subscribed, the company may meet at such time and place as they may deem proper, for the purpose of electing a president, secretary, and treasurer, who shall forever thereafter hold their offices for one year and until their successors are elected and qualified; and by that name shall be capable in law and equity of purchasing, holding, selling, leasing, and conveying estate, real, personal, and mixed, so far as the same may be necessary for the purposes of said corporation to carry on and conduct the business of said company to the advantage of the stockholders; and by that name may sue and be sued and plead and be impleaded, and shall exercise all the powers, rights, privileges, and immunities which other corporate bodies may lawfully do for the purposes mentioned in this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the officers mentioned in the second section of this act shall be elected by the stockholders of the company, and each stockholder shall be entitled to cast one vote in person or by proxy for each share of stock owned by him; and the president, secretary, and treasurer shall be stockholders of said company; and the company shall have power to make such by-laws and rules as they may deem proper for the government of the company and the business thereof, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this State or of the United States, and shall also have power to use a common seal, and to alter or change the same at pleasure.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said company to keep all such books as may be necessary for the transaction of its business; and all transfers of stock by any stockholder shall be made upon the books of said company, for the inspection of all the stockholders, and a majority of all the stockholders, including the president, at any meeting, shall be competent to act and transact the business of the company.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That said company shall be deemed and held liable for any loss or damage caused by the negligence, carelessness, or wilful misconduct of the same, or any of its officers, agents, or employes, to be recovered by any person aggrieved thereby.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said company to carry and convey all goods, wares, and merchandise and packages received by them for shipment, in the turn in which the same was received by them, and in default thereof, and loss or damage is sustained by the owner of the same, said company shall be held liable for such injury: Provided, Such delay or irregular shipment was not caused by the request of the owner of said goods or packages or his agent. And said company or agents shall receipt the owner for all goods or packages whatever when received.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to give banking privileges to said company.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the right to alter, change, or repeal this act is hereby reserved to any subsequent legislature.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

CHAPTER VIII.

AN ACT to incorporate the Tennessee Colonial Company, for the purpose of promoting emigration, to establish vineyards, develop the mineral and other resources of the State of Tennessee.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That George M. Mowbray, of Pitusville, Pennsylvania; George Wade, of the city of New York; Henry Wise, of New Jersey; A. B. Shunklin, and Dr. Hudson of the city of Nashville, Tennessee, and their associates and successors, be, and they are hereby, created a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the "Tennessee Colonial, Agricultural, Mining, and Manufacturing Company;" and by that name shall have succession for ninety-nine years, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and generally to do every act and thing necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this act, and promote the objects and designs of this corporation.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be two hundred thousand dollars, with the privilege of increasing the same to five hundred thousand dollars, to be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and the persons above named shall open books for the subscription of stock, and when fifty thousand dollars shall have been subscribed the stockholders may meet and elect five directors, and said directors shall elect one of their number president, and also a secretary.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the officers of said company shall be managed by a board of directors, consisting of not less than five stockholders, and such agents and officers as they may appoint. The president and secretary shall be elected annually by the directors, and all vacancies happening in said board, or in any of said offices, may be filled by the acting directors for the remainder of the term for which they are elected or appointed. The board shall establish or change any by-laws for the government of said company, which by-laws shall not be inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the constitution and laws of the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the said company shall have full power to purchase, hold, and dispose of real estate, lease lands, and do all that is necessary for the welfare and promotion of the Tennessee Colonial, Agricultural, Mining, and Manufacturing Company, viz: That said company may raise vineyards and do a general mining, boring, and manufacturing business on lands owned and leased by said company, to mine, bore, forge, roll, smelt, manufacture, transport, and vend in wines, minerals, coal, iron, salt, oil, &c. The land to be held by the company shall form a common stock, and shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and apportioned by the said company among the owners and subscribers of said stock according to their respective interests.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the officers and stockholders of said company and those emigrating on their lands shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and protection guaranteed by the State of Tennessee under the Constitution of the United States.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER IX.

AN ACT to incorporate the Cairo and New Orleans Pilots' Benevolent Association.

Whereas a number of steamboat pilots, engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi river, have formed an association for the laudable purpose of increasing the skill and information, improving the character and habits, and promoting the interests of all those pilots intrusted with the control and safety of steamers and other vessels; and

Whereas the immense and increasing commerce and navigation of the said river demands that suitable legislative encouragement should be given by this general assembly to intelligent and judicious efforts to lessen the dangers of the transportation of persons and property upon the said river; and

Whereas the intrusting of the vessels used in said navigation only to the care of sober, attentive, skillful, and experienced pilots, who have had a regular and thorough training in the business, would greatly tend to enhance the security of life and property constantly at risk on the steamboats and other vessels plying upon the western rivers: Therefore, in order to further the objects and encourage the efforts of an institution so useful and praiseworthy as the above-named association, and to give efficiency, perpetuity, and dignity to the same—

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Harrison Bladell, J. W. Pittman, James D. Perry, Green S. Snow, F. B. Montany, James W. Sayers, William Huston, W. C. Page, Garrison Wasson, James C. Rhoads, W. A. Wilds, W. A. Hale, and their associates and successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of the "Cairo and New Orleans Pilots' Benevolent Association;" and by that name shall have succession for a period of twenty years, and shall be capable of suing and being sued, both at law and in equity, in all courts and places whatsoever; and that they and their successors may have a common seal, and may alter, change, or destroy the same at will; and shall also be capable of acquiring, holding, conveying, and pledging property, real, personal, and mixed, as may be required for the purpose of the association.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That said corporation shall have power to make a constitution and by-laws, and to alter, change, or annul the same at pleasure, in whole or in part: Provided, That nothing therein contained shall be repugnant to the constitution and laws of this State or of the United States.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That said corporation shall have power to erect a hall and buildings suitable for its uses; to purchase, own, and enjoy a good library, philosophical, chemical, and other apparatus, and such things as may be calculated to advance the objects contemplated by this charter, which shall be exempt from taxation; to procure the delivery of lectures; to found and maintain a school; to grant diplomas, and to withdraw and annul the same; to impose fines upon its members for the breach of any of the provisions of the constitution or by-laws of this association; to levy contributions upon members; to create a fund to be applied to the relief of indigent or distressed members, or their families, and to the other objects named in this section; to censure, suspend, fine, or expel a member, for any good cause, calculated to bring discredit upon said association; and generally to do all such other good things as may be necessary to carry out the objects of this association.

CHAPTER X.

AN ACT incorporating the Great Southwestern Oil and Mining Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That James W. Milroy, William Glenn, Shela Waters, James G. Pratt, Benjamin Gonzales, and their associates, successors, and assigns, be, and they are hereby, constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of the "Great Southwestern Oil and Mining Company," and by that name and style shall have succession for ninety-nine years, and shall be competent to sue and be sued in any court of law or equity whatever; to have and use a seal, and alter the same at will; to make and change any by-laws necessary for the government of the company; to purchase, hold, and dispose of such real estate, leases, mines, minerals, iron, coal, oil, and personal property as may be necessary for the legitimate transaction of their business; to mine, forge, roll, smelt, work, manufacture, refine, and sell said minerals, coal, iron, oil, or other products thereof, in or out of this State, and issue such number of shares of stock of said company at the representative par value thereof, as may be ordered by a vote of said company; to determine the par value of shares, and have the right to pay in shares of stock of the corporation for such mining interests in real estate or machinery for manufacturing as may be necessary to purchase or lease for the successful management of the business of said company; and generally to have, enjoy, and exercise all rights and privileges incident to corporations, except the right to issue notes or engage in banking.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That whenever said company shall become possessed of mines, minerals, lands, or leases, situated in this State or elsewhere, a separate and distinct interest of each mine, lead, field, lien, deposit, or lease, may be created under such name as may be adopted, to distinguish the same, and in like manner may organize under, and enjoy as a distinct branch interest, all the rights and privileges named in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

CHAPTER XI.

AN ACT to change a railroad fund into a county fund, for Blount county.

Whereas an act was passed by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, on the 27th of January, 1854, to authorize the county court of Blount county, through their chairman, to subscribe stock to the Knoxville and Charleston Railroad Company, and levy a tax on said county to pay the same on certain conditions; and

Whereas the county court of said county, in good faith, did subscribe said stock, and levy said tax, and proceed to collect the same, to the amount of eight or ten thousand dollars, in the years 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858, and the same was collected and paid over to the county treasurer, as provided by said act; and

Whereas the railroad company failed to carry out the provisions of said act, as specified therein, the courts of said county did then proceed to loan said fund, which was done, taking notes with approved security; and

Whereas said fund is still lying in said condition, and likely to be lost, or a portion of it: Therefore—

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the fund as set forth in the foregoing preamble, collected under the act as set forth, may be changed from the railroad fund into a county fund, for the use and benefit of Blount county, and to be under the control and management of the county court of Blount county as a general county fund.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the county court of Blount county, at the first quarterly term after the passage of this act—and a certified copy of the same being present—to appoint or elect a suitable person to collect said fund, in the name of the chairman of said county court, according to the face of the notes, as executed by the parties borrowing said fund, which notes are now in the hands of the trustee of said county.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said county court to require such person so appointed or elected to give bond and approved security for his faithful performance in the collection and paying over said fund into the county treasury, as other county moneys.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the county court of said county allow said collector a reasonable allowance for his services, not to exceed six per cent. on the amount collected.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said court to require the trustee of said county to give bond and approved security for the faithful keeping and paying over said fund, according to the order of said court.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with the original act passed on the 27th day of January, 1854. This act is only intended to change that part of the fund collected under the said act and paid into the treasury of Blount county in the years of 1855-'6-'7-'8, and no further.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER XII.

AN ACT to incorporate the Tennessee Fire and Marine Insurance Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That B. W. Sharp, Rual Hough, James E. Murryman, John W. Leftwick, Calvin Kelsey, L. Helman, and Frank Tuff, of the city of Memphis, together with those who may hereafter become stockholders, as hereinafter provided for, are hereby created a corporation and body politic, by the name and style of the president and directors of the "Tennessee Fire and Marine Insurance Company," and shall continue from the first day of May, 1865; and by that name are hereby made capable and able at law to have, purchase, receive, possess, and enjoy, retain, and control, to them and their successors, lands, tenements, rents, goods, chattels, and effects, to an amount not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars, and the same to sell, convey, and dispose of; to sue and be sued, to plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all courts and places in this State or elsewhere; may make and use a common seal, and the same to break, alter, or renew at will; to ordain, establish, and put into execution such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations as shall be deemed necessary and convenient for the government of said corporation, not contrary to the laws of this State, and generally to do all acts and things that a corporation may lawfully do.

SEC. 2. That the persons named in the first section of this act, or a majority of them, shall open books of subscription for the stock in said company, which stock shall consist of two thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, payable in the lawful currency of the United States, and at the time of subscribing they shall have the right to demand and receive twenty dollars on each share subscribed for, and have secured the residue to the satisfaction of the corporation, payable in six and twelve months, which obligations may be renewed from time to time, either in whole or in part, or for such portion thereof as the president and directors of the company shall determine; and it shall be the duty of the president and directors to give at least thirty days' notice of any call which they may make for the payment of the capital stock so subscribed; and if any stockholder shall fail to meet said call, or to secure the payment of the remainder as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for the president and directors to sell such delinquent's shares, and transfer the same to the purchaser, or declare the same forfeited to the company, together with all previous payments thereon. No transfer of stock shall be deemed valid and complete so long as the person transferring the same shall be indebted to the said company, until the amount for which he is indebted to the said company is secured to the satisfaction of the president and directors thereof, and the stock of every stockholder shall be held as collateral security for the payment of whatever sum he may be indebted by notes or otherwise to said company.

SEC. 3. That the share or stockholders shall meet at the place of opening the books for the subscription of stock in said company on the first day of August, 1865, and at the office of the company on the first Monday of August in each succeeding year thereafter, and elect a president, vice-president, and seven directors, who shall continue in office until the first Monday in August of each ensuing year, and until their successors shall have been elected, of which said election previous notice shall be given in a newspaper printed in the city of Memphis for at least two weeks previous to said election. Any vacancy that may occur in the board of directors shall be filled by the president and directors until the next annual election. No person shall be a director who is not the owner of at least ten shares of the capital stock.

SEC. 4. That in all elections by the stockholders each share to the number of five shall be entitled to one vote, and every ten shares in addition shall entitle the holder to one additional vote; that no person who is not a resident of the State of Tennessee shall have the right to vote at any election for president and directors unless he shall have been the holder or owner of stock at least six months previous to such election by a regular transfer upon the books of the company; but shares may be voted upon by the executors or administrators of a deceased owner and by proxy.

SEC. 5. That the president and directors for the time being may and shall have power to appoint such officers and agents under them at such places as shall be necessary for executing the business of said company, and to allow such compensation therefor as may be agreed upon, and to require and take bond and security for the faithful performance and discharge of their respective duties and trust; and the said president and directors shall have power to make by-laws and ordinances to govern the corporation, and may repeal, alter, and amend the same. The president and three directors shall constitute a quorum to do business, or five directors in the absence of the president, one of whom shall be vice-president, may do and perform all such acts as might be done and performed by the president and the quorum aforesaid.

SEC. 6. That the president and directors for the time being shall have power and authority in the name of the company to make insurance at such rate of insurance premium or interest as may be agreed upon by the parties, upon buildings, machinery, manufacturing establishments, goods, wares, and merchandise of every description, of all classes and qualities of property transported by land or water in the United States; also to make insurance on steamboats and other water-craft used for transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise therein contained and to be transported or shipped, and to make all such proper contracts for the insurance of other valuable property as may be embraced within the name of personal property, and all such contracts shall be in writing or printed, and shall be made by the authority of the company, by and through their proper and legally constituted officers and agents appointed for that purpose.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of the president and directors on the first Monday of August and March in each year to make a dividend of so much of the profits of said corporation as to them or a majority of them shall appear advisable; and in any case of loss or losses, whereby the capital stock of the corporation shall be impaired or lessened, no subsequent dividend shall be made until a sum equal to such diminution, arising from the profits of said corporation, shall have been added to the capital stock of said corporation.

SEC. 8. Said corporation shall not commence business to the making or issuing of any policies of insurance until two hundred shares are subscribed and paid for, or secured to be paid, as provided for in the second section.

SEC. 9. That whenever said company shall be notified of any loss sustained which may be covered by any policy of insurance granted or issued by the same, it shall be the duty of said corporation to pay the amount so lost or insured in such policy within sixty days after being so notified: Provided, There shall have been no violation of the condition of the policy on the part of the insured.

SEC. 10. Said corporation shall be subject to such tax as may be imposed on similar corporations.

SEC. 11. Be it enacted, That John Wilson, Anson Nelson, John Launsden, and David C. Love, and their associates, shall be and are hereby declared a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the State Insurance Company of Nashville, and by that name shall be intrusted with all the powers, rights, privileges, and emoluments conferred upon the Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company of Memphis.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 5, 1865.

CHAPTER XIII.

AN ACT to incorporate a literary society of Nashville, known as the "Agnomen Club."

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a society of young men of the city of Nashville, organized in March, 1865, and known as the "Agnomen Club," having for its object the general promotion of the arts, literature, science, and the amateur drama, as well as the moral improvement of its members, be incorporated under the name of the "Agnomen Club."

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That said club shall make such rules and by-laws for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its members as it may see fit, not conflicting with the laws of the State or the city of Nashville.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That said club shall be empowered to give such amateur dramatic entertainments, open to the public at such times and places as may be designated by its members, not inconsistent with the laws of the State or city of Nashville.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to give to the club so incorporated the privilege of public exhibition for money, unless they shall first pay the tax, as now provided by law, for exhibitions of a similar character.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 6, 1865.

CHAPTER XIV

AN ACT to authorize and instruct the comptroller of the treasury to audit, and the treasurer to pay, the salary due the Hon. Samuel D. Frierson, chancellor.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the comptroller of the treasury shall audit, and the treasurer of the State shall pay, the quarterly salary due on the 4th March, 1862, and on the 4th day of June, 1862, to the Hon. Samuel D. Frierson, chancellor of the fourth chancery division of the State, because of the same never having been paid, and because of his well-established loyalty to the government of the United States and to the State of Tennessee.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 6, 1865.

CHAPTER XV.

AN ACT to amend an act passed on the 26th of February, 1858, entitled "An act to charter the Cleveland and Ducktown railroad."

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the charter granted to the Cleveland and Ducktown Railroad Company, by an act of the legislature of the State of Tennessee, passed on the 26th day of February, 1858, be so amended that the following named persons be appointed commissioners of said company, instead of those persons therein mentioned, to wit: Thomas H. Calloway, William M. Biggs, Samuel Parks, N. L. Pointe, James Gamble, W. H. Craigmites, John P. Hayes, Julius E. Raht, Simeon E. Browder, William P. Copland, Pleasant M. Craigmiles, D. C. McMillen, John B. Cate, Ake Henry, Y. J. Esterbrook, A. P. McClay, L. McLeod, and G. Greer, and they are hereby constituted and appointed a board of commissioners, seven of whom shall be authorized and competent to act and transact business, and said commissioners and company are clothed with the same rights, powers and privileges, and immunities, which are granted in said charter, of which this is an amendment, and said commissioners shall appoint a time for the stockholders to meet, at such place as they may designate, for the purpose of electing a president and ten directors to manage the affairs of said company.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 6, 1865.

CHAPTER XVIII.

AN ACT to incorporate the Memphis City Railroad Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That William R. Moore, J. M. Hill, S. B. Beaumont, R. Hough, William M. Farrington, Frank Taft, G. P. Ware, S. R. Wood, Fielding Hurst, P. E. Bland, Joseph Bruce, Abner Taylor, Thomas R. Smith, H. B. Wells, Joseph W. Eystra, William C. Bryan, W. P. Hepburn, and Frank Brooks, and their associates, be, and they are hereby, constituted a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the "Memphis City Railroad Company," and by that name may have succession for the term of thirty years, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded with, may have and use a common seal, may purchase and hold such personal and real estate as in the opinion of the directors may be necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation, and the same to sell and dispose of at pleasure; may make all needful by-laws for their government not inconsistent or in conflict with the laws of the State of Tennessee and the United States.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be three hundred thousand dollars, with the right and privilege on the part of said company to make it five hundred thousand dollars, which shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and the same may be subscribed to and made subject to such calls and terms of payment as said directors, hereinafter provided for, shall designate.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the persons above named shall, within one year after this act, meet and elect five of their number by ballot, to act as directors of said company, and thereupon said directors shall choose one of their number to act as president, and may elect such other officers as they may think necessary, and fix the salary of the same—said officers to remain in office one year, and until their successors shall be duly elected; and at the end of one year after the election of such directors, and annually thereafter, after thirty days' notice, to be given by the president and secretary, or either of them, in a newspaper published in the city of Memphis, of the time and place of such election, the stockholders shall meet and elect five directors for the ensuing year—each stockholder to have one vote for each share of stock held by him or her. Said directors shall thereupon proceed to organize, as above provided for the organization of said first board of directors, and so on annually, during the existence of this charter. Said stockholders may vote in person or by proxy. Three of said directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That said company, by their said directors and officers, shall have power to make, complete, and execute all contracts and agreements entered into with the city of Memphis, or other parties, for any purpose whatever, connected either directly or indirectly with the construction, maintaining, or operating said railway, and may alter or enlarge the term of the same with said parties, and may construct, maintain, use, and operate street railways by animal power, on all or any of the streets in the city of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee, for that purpose using all necessary machinery and equipments; said company to use neatly constructed, commodious, and safe cars, to be well adapted to such use and purpose; may enter into all necessary contracts for the building and operating of said railway, and declare dividends on the capital stock of the same.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That this act shall be so construed as to authorize said company to construct, maintain, and operate said railway in the streets of the towns or villages of Chelsea and Fort Pickering, in all respects the same as in the city of Memphis: Provided, That this act shall be so construed as not to grant either the indorsement of the State or the loan of any bonds.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That each stockholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of said company to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock held by him, for all the debts and liabilities of said company, until the whole amount of the capital stock so held by him shall have been paid to the company, and all the stockholders of said company shall be jointly liable for all the debts due or owing to any of its laborers and servants, for services performed for said corporation, but shall not be liable to an action therefor before any execution shall be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, against the said corporation, and then the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with cost, against such stockholders.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That said railroad shall be constructed on the most approved plan for the construction of city railroads, and shall be run as often as the convenience of passengers may require, and shall be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations, in respect thereto, as the common council of the city of Memphis may, from time to time, by ordinance prescribe, and to the payment to the city of such license annually, for each car run thereon, as they may, by ordinance, prescribe; and the persons and their assigns are hereby authorized to charge at the rate of five cents for the conveyance of passengers for the whole or any part of the route from the depot to the terminus of said railroad.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That whenever the said tracks shall be placed on the roads, the same shall be laid with such rails and in such manner as shall not obstruct carriage travel, and said company shall cause said tracks to conform to the grade of the roads as they now are, or as it may be by them, and at their expense, changed or altered, and said company shall keep the surface of such roads inside the rails, and for two feet outside on each side thereof, in good order and repair.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act to incorporate the People's Passenger Railroad Company of the city of Memphis," passed February, 1860, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, together with all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted; That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 7, 1865.

CHAPTER XIX.

AN ACT to incorporate the Tennessee and Kentucky Petroleum, Mining, and Manufacturing Company, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That C. H. Smith, Dr. Joshua Coff, George L. Lewis, George Hillman, W. J. McCoy, W. J. Costner, and their associates, be, and are hereby, created a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Tennessee and Kentucky Petroleum, Mining, and Manufacturing Company," and shall have succession for ninety-nine years. At any time after organization within twelve months, the directors of said company may, if desired, change the name of said company to any other name; and by having a declaration of the same, signed and acknowledged by their president, and recorded, as a deed for land, in the county where the business meeting is held, said new name shall become the corporate name of said body.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That said company, in their corporate name, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity; may adopt and use a common seal, changeable at their pleasure; may contract and be contracted with, and have and enjoy all the privileges and rights incident to corporations.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That said company may acquire and hold, by purchase or lease, any real or personal property necessary or proper to carry on their business; may sell, convey, exchange, rent, or lease the same, or any part thereof, at any time or times during the continuance of this charter; and shall have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities granted by this legislature to any petroleum, or mining, or manufacturing company.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That said corporation shall have power to explore any of the land acquired or held by them by digging, tunnelling, boring, mining, or otherwise, for petroleum, salt, coal, iron, lead, copper, or other material or product; and to prepare, by manufacturing or otherwise, any material or product so found for market; to use or vend the same, either crude or manufactured; to erect such houses and machinery as they may deem requisite to carry on any part of said business. Said company may make, or have executed to them, mortgages or deeds of trust on real or personal property; when necessary in their business; or in order to secure debts due or to become due by or to said corporation.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That this company may ordain and establish, from time to time, alter or amend, such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the government of their affairs as they may deem proper, and which shall not contravene this charter and the laws of the land.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of this corporation shall not be less than one hundred thousand dollars, nor more than five hundred thousand dollars, consisting of shares estimated at twenty dollars each.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That any five of said corporators may open books for subscriptions of stock in said company at such times and places as they may choose. When the sum of ten thousand dollars has been subscribed, then said company may organize and elect officers.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the officers of said association shall consist of a president, a secretary, and seven directors, who shall serve for one year, and until their successors are qualified and inducted into office. The elections shall be at such time and place, and on such notice, as the by-laws may prescribe.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the officers shall be elected annually as aforesaid, by a majority of the votes cast at such election; and in elections, each share shall entitle the owner thereof to one vote.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That, for cause deemed by them sufficient, the directors may dismiss any officer or agent, and appoint a successor to act until the next regular election, or for a shorter term, as they may determine.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That each subscriber for stock in said corporation shall be individually liable only for the amount subscribed for by such person, and only until the same is paid in.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to give banking-privileges to said company; and that the right to alter, change, or repeal this act is hereby reserved to any subsequent legislature.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That Sol. Hesse, N. Hoffelner, Adolph-Loeb, H. T. Tomlinson, J. Nathan, J. S. Menkin, Henry Sussel, and their associates, are hereby incorporated a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the "Memphis Club," in the city of Memphis, county of Shelby, and State of Tennessee, with full powers in their said corporate capacity to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, purchase and hold real and personal property, stock, and incorporate hereditaments; and may dispose of the same in such manner as said association may deem most expedient.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That the said "Memphis Club" may use a common seal, and change the same at pleasure; and enact, from time to time, such by-laws and regulations as may be required for the good order and government of said society, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or the State of Tennessee, and do and perform all other acts for their benefit not inconsistent with the privileges herein granted.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

CHAPTER XX.

AN ACT to amend an act authorizing John C. Haley to establish a turnpike road, passed October 28, 1833.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That F. A. Henager, Jas. R. Rigsby, George W. Rider, and Abel A. Pearson be, and they are hereby, authorized to open, establish, and keep in repair a turnpike road across what is known as the Qualls Trace of Walden's Ridge, beginning at or near where J. L. Hutchison formerly lived, in Rhea county, and from thence to Benjamin F. Bridgeman's mill, at the foot of the mountain, in Bledsoe county; and that the said proprietors have the charter for said road for the same length of time, and upon the same terms and conditions in all respects that a charter for a turnpike road was given to John C. Haley, by an act passed October 28, 1833, and that John Lee, of Bledsoe county, and John P. Walker, of Rhea county, be appointed commissioners on said road, who shall take the same oath, and perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same privileges and emoluments that are enjoined upon and extended to the commissioners of said John C. Haley's turnpike road by the act aforesaid; the charter hereby granted to be void unless the road be opened and completed within four years from the passage of this act.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 7, 1865.

CHAPTER XXI.

AN ACT to incorporate the Memphis and Mound City Arkansas Steam Packet Company, of Memphis.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That G. P. Ware, C. C. Burk, Wm. M. Farrington, Wm. R. Moore, John D. Ware, and their associates, shall be, and they are hereby, constituted a body politic and corporate under the name and style of the People's Passenger and Freight Steam Packet Company of Memphis and Mound City; and by that name may have succession for the term of thirty years; may sue and be sued, plead and be pleaded; may have and use a common seal; may purchase and hold such personal and real estate as may be necessary for carrying on the business of the corporation; and the same to sell or dispose of at pleasure; may make all needful by-laws for their government not inconsistent or in conflict with the laws of the United States, the State of Tennessee, or the city of Memphis and county of Shelby.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be three hundred thousand dollars, which shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and the same may be subscribed to and made subject to such calls and terms of payment as the directors hereinafter provided for shall designate.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the persons above named shall open books for the subscription of stock, and when one hundred shares are subscribed, and ten dollars on each share paid in, the stockholders may then meet and elect five of their number directors of said company, and thereupon said directors shall choose one of their number to act as president, and may elect such other officers as they may think necessary, and fix the salaries of the same, said officers to remain in office one year, or until their successors are duly elected and installed into office, at which time, after three weeks' notice in one newspaper published in the county of Shelby, State aforesaid, the stockholders of said company shall meet and elect the directors aforesaid, each stockholder having one vote for each share of stock held by him or her. Said directors shall thereupon elect their said president and other officers, and said election shall take place annually. Said stockholders may vote in person or by proxy. Three of said directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That said company, by their directors and officers, shall have power to complete and execute all contracts or agreements entered into with the city of Memphis, or other parties, for the use of a landing or wharf of said city, and may alter or enlarge the terms of same. Said parties may enter into all necessary contracts for the building and operating said steam packet company, and declare dividends on the capital stock of the same, provided that the capital stock is not diminished thereby.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That said company, in establishing a tariff of freight and passage to and from Memphis and Mound City, will submit the same to the county court of Shelby county, state aforesaid, for the approval of the same before any of its provisions can be enforced: Provided, this act shall not be so construed as to grant either the indorsement of the State or the loan of any bonds.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That the stockholders of said company shall be individually liable for the amount of their stock subscribed until the same is paid.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That this corporation shall be subject to such taxes as may be imposed on similar corporations of this State.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the corporation of the city of Memphis or the county court of Shelby county to grant any privilege or make any contract with said company that will in any way interfere with the vested rights of any party or parties whatever as now fixed by law.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That this act take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AN ACT to incorporate the Manchester and Barren Fork Mining and Manufacturing Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That W. T. Garrett, J. C. McCrory, and D. P. Ruthbone, and their associates and successors, be, and they are hereby, created a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of "The Manchester and Barren Fork Mining and Manufacturing Company," and by that name shall have succession for ninety-nine years, sue and be sued, plead and be pleaded with, and generally to do every act and thing necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this act, and to promote the object and designs of this corporation.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be two hundred thousand dollars, with the privilege of increasing the same to five hundred thousand dollars, to be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each; and the persons above named shall open books for the subscription of stock, and when fifty thousand dollars shall have been subscribed the stockholders may meet and elect five directors, and said directors shall elect one of their number president, and also elect a secretary.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the affairs of said company shall be managed by a board of directors, consisting of not less than five, and such agents and officers as they may appoint. The secretary and president shall be elected every year by the directors, and all vacancies happening in said board, or in any of said offices, may be filled by the acting directors for the remainder of the term for which they were elected or appointed. The board shall have power to establish by-laws for the government of said company; and to alter the same whenever it may be deemed proper for them to do so. The directors shall have power to require security for the payment of all stock subscribed and not paid in.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the said company shall have full power and authority to purchase and lease lands or real estate, and to dispose of the same, and to do a general mining and manufacturing business on lands owned and leased by said company; to mine, forge, roll, smelt, manufacture, transport, and to vend minerals, iron, coal, petroleum oil, salt, and to hold property of every species necessary for the carrying on of the business of said company, and said company shall have power to make contracts under the corporate seal, signed by the president and attested and signed by the secretary or other officer who may be appointed by the directors for that purpose.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That, should the said company at any time fail to meet its engagements, each person holding stock at the time of such failure shall be individually liable for the debts of the company to the amount of the balance of the unpaid stock of such stockholder.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That this corporation shall be subject to such taxes as may be imposed on similar corporations of this State.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That E. C. Schultze, L. C. Platt, C. M. Northrup, Charles Kochler, Joseph W. Carrier, Lewis Benton, and John A. Smith, shall be, and are hereby, constituted a body politic and corporate, for the purpose of purchasing, selling, mining, improving, and settling with loyal owners, land in the State of Tennessee, known by the name and style of "The New York and Tennessee Mining and Farmland Company," and by that name may have succession for ninety-nine years; may sue and be sued; may contract and be contracted with; may have a common seal and power to change the same at will; may purchase and hold such personal and real estate as they shall deem necessary for carrying out the objects of the corporation, and may sell or dispose of the same at pleasure, and receive pay, security, or mortgages therefor; may mine, work, or otherwise develop the mineral sources, and may construct such machinery and improvements on the land of the corporation as they shall think proper, and have power to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same; and may make all necessary by-laws for their government not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 8. The capital stock of said company shall consist of five thousand shares of the par value of one hundred dollars each, with the privilege of increasing, if necessary, to forty thousand shares, and the trustees shall designate and determine what portion of said stock shall be paid in land and its value, and what portion in cash, which stock shall be deemed personal estate, and transferable in such manner as the by-laws of the company shall direct.

SEC. 9. That the affairs of said company shall be managed by a board of trustees, chosen by the stockholders, who shall hold their office for one year, and until their successors are elected. Every member of said board of trustees shall be a stockholder. In every election, and at every meeting of stockholders, each share of stock on which no call or assessment is due, past, and unpaid, shall entitle the holder thereof to one vote, either in person or by proxy. The board of trustees may choose a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, and such other officers and agents as may be necessary, and fix their salaries. A failure to hold any election on the day designated shall not work a dissolution of the corporation, but such election may be held at a subsequent time, to be designated by the board of trustees.

SEC. 10. If any subscriber for stock shall fail to pay the amount subscribed in such manner as may be prescribed by the by-laws, the same may be recovered by action of debt in any court having jurisdiction, or such stock may be sold, and declared forfeited by the company, on such terms as the board of trustees shall determine and prescribe.

SEC. 11. That the aforesaid persons, or any number of them, or any other person duly authorized by the board of trustees, may, at any time or place, open books for the subscription of stock.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That James Mullens, William H. Wisner, Philemon Gosling, and John C. Coldwell, jr., be, and are hereby, created a body politic and corporate, with succession for ninety-nine years, to be known and designated as "The Cascade Mining and Manufacturing Petroleum Company," with all the powers and privileges of this act, as conferred upon the previous corporations in this act.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect and be in full force from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

CHAPTER XXV.

AN ACT to amend An act entitled An act to incorporate the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company, passed the 27th day of January, 1848.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the 7th section of said act be so amended that the affairs of said company shall be managed by a board of directors, to consist of nine instead of fifteen, as now required by law.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the seventeenth section be so amended that a stockholder, in his own right, of ten shares, shall be eligible to the office of president or director of said company, with all the rights and privileges that they are now allowed by law: Provided, he be a loyal citizen of the United States government.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVI.

AN ACT to incorporate the Tennessee Mining and Manufacturing Company.

Whereas it has been represented to this general assembly that the property known as the Washington County Iron Works, in Washington county, of this State, upon which there now are a furnace, forges, rolling mill, and other improvements, is capable, by the application of the requisite capital, of much further development:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Charles J. McKinney, of Hawkins county; Calvin Hoss, of Washington county; and such other persons as they may associate with them, as owners of the shares hereinafter authorized to be issued, be, and the same are hereby, made a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the Tennessee Mining and Manufacturing Company, and as such, in that name, may have continued succession, and may purchase, have, hold, use, and acquire, by any lawful means, any estate, real and personal, in as full and ample manner as any individual may or might do; and the same may use, lease, let, mortgage, sell, and convey, or otherwise dispose of; and may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded; contract and be contracted with, and have and use a common seal, and the same may change at pleasure; and make by-laws, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of Tennessee, and regulations for the management of their affairs; and may have and use all the rights, powers, and privileges which are or may be necessary for them to have as an incorporated company.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the said company shall consist of shares of ten dollars each, of which the said property, known as Washington County Iron Works, shall constitute a part, at a price to be agreed upon by and between the parties interested, and when two hundred thousand dollars shall have been subscribed, the shareholders may proceed to organize the company by the election of five or more directors; and the directors for the time being may have, exercise, and enjoy, in the name and behalf of the company, all the rights, powers, and privileges which are given or intended to be given herein, and may, from time to time, increase their resources by borrowing money on a pledge of their property, or without such pledge, or by new subscriptions; and the subscribers shall be bound, each for himself or herself, to pay the sums by them respectively subscribed; and when the sums due, or to become due, thereon shall have been paid, such shareholder shall not be liable for any further payment on account thereof.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the by-laws may prescribe the number of and the manner in which the officers and agents of the company shall be appointed, their terms of service, powers, and duties, and may require that they shall take an oath faithfully to discharge their respective duties. And inasmuch as the Nolachucky river is not navigable above the site of the said iron works, and the water power, for manufacturing purposes, may be greatly increased by erecting one or more dams across the said river above the site aforesaid, the company may, and they are hereby authorized to, erect one or more dams across the said river, if the same, in their opinion, be necessary and proper to aid in the establishment of manufactures of iron, or other articles or commodities; subject, nevertheless, to the payment of any damages which may be assessed by a jury empanelled by a court having competent jurisdiction; and provided that the erection of said dam or dams shall not interfere with the navigation of said river.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for thirty years from and after its passage, and until the same be modified and repealed; and all acts and parts of acts conflicting with this act shall be and are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to give, grant, or allow to said company banking privileges.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVII.

AN ACT incorporating the Tennessee and Cumberland Oil and Mining Company.

SECTION 1. *Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That A. G. Wells, C. L. Hequeubough, Wm. C. Bunts, Wm. B. Campbell, Wm. H. Gordon, Deluino F. Smith, Edward Donohoe, George Richardson, F. H. Cotton, their associates, successors, and assigns, be and are hereby created, constituted and declared a body politic and corporate, under the name and style of the "Tennessee and Cumberland Oil and Mining Company," with full-privileges and powers to and for the purpose of prospecting, boring, exploring for, raising, mining, digging, transporting and selling oil, petroleum, kerosene, asphaltum, naphtha, salt, coal, iron, and all other minerals in this State or elsewhere, on any lands they may acquire by purchase, lease or gift; and to manufacture dyes and colors, refine and convert it to such other uses by distillation, refining and manufacturing, as science, chemistry and philosophy has or may hereafter make known and discover; also the privilege and power to manufacture iron from the ore into pig metal, and rolled iron in all its qualities and forms; to erect all necessary machinery, buildings, furnaces, warehouses, docks and levees as shall or may be conducive to the successful operation of their said business in all of its various departments and ramifications; also to lay and conduct pipes, and construct railroads, turnpikes and canals from their lands and works to any navigable river or railroad now constructed or hereafter constructed, and to make the necessary switches and connections for the purpose of transporting said articles, mined and manufactured, and importing such articles and materials as said company may require for the conducting of their said business: Provided, however, That in constructing said roads, canals, &c., they do not interfere with any vested rights; and by said name and style are hereby made a body capable in law, as individual citizens, to contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto, and prosecute to final judgment, in the State and elsewhere, in all courts of law and equity; to make, have and use a common seal, and change the same at will; with full power and authority to purchase, lease, and receive in donation, and enjoy and possess estate, real, personal and mixed, and to lease, rent, sell, alienate, convey, and otherwise dispose of the same; with all rights, powers and privileges necessary and proper for them as an incorporate company; and by such name and style shall have succession for the full term of ninety-nine years: Provided, That nothing in this act shall interfere with the vested rights of any other company under the laws of the State of Tennessee.*

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the incorporators, in person or by proxy, shall, as soon after the passage of this act as convenient, meet and organize by the election of a board of directors of not less than seven nor more than ten in number, who shall have the management and control of the affairs of the company, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and each being a stockholder to the amount of twenty-five shares at least, who, as well as their successors, shall hold their office for the term of one year, and until their successors are elected. Said directors shall annually thereafter, by public notice for thirty days, in one or more newspapers published in the city of Nashville, next preceding the first Monday of June, to the stockholders to meet at the office of the company, in Nashville, in person or by proxy, to elect directors for the next ensuing year, at which elections three of the stockholders, appointed by those present, shall be the judges. If the directors shall fail or neglect to give notice as aforesaid, any two of the stockholders may give said notice, and elect directors in like manner as if the directors had given notice as prescribed by this act. The persons receiving a majority of the votes cast at said elections shall be declared duly elected; and in case of a tie vote a majority of the directors elect shall determine and give one vote, which shall be the casting vote. Each stockholder shall have one vote for each and every share he or she may own; and any shareholder, not present at any such election, may vote by proxy, said proxy being a shareholder and attending such election, and presenting from his principal authority in writing, signed and sealed by said principal and attested by two witnesses.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That if it should happen that an election of directors should not be made on the day designated in the notice, the said corporation shall not for that cause be deemed dissolved; but it shall and may be lawful to make and hold an election for directors on some other designated day, of which notice may be given.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the said directors shall elect annually from their number a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and other such officers, agents, clerks, and employes, from among the stockholders or from other sources, as the interest of the company may require; and may take of each of them such bond or bonds, with security, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties assigned them; allow such compensation as they may think proper, and may remove and dismiss them, or any of them, at pleasure; and shall fill all vacancies in their number caused by death, resignation, or otherwise, by such persons from among the stockholders as they may elect. And the said directors, or a majority of them, may, from time to time, make, ordain, and establish such by-laws and regulations for the government of said corporation in its proceedings, and for the management of its stock and property, as may by them be deemed necessary and convenient:

Provided, however, the same be not repugnant to and inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this State and of the United States.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the meetings of the board of directors shall be at such times and places as they may themselves determine; and special meetings thereof may be called by the president or a majority of the directors, and at all meetings thereof a majority shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That said directors shall keep, or cause to be kept, proper books of stock and accounts of the business and affairs of said company, which shall be subject at all times to the inspection of the stockholders, and they shall annually, at the expiration of their term of office, make a full and correct report to the stockholders of the transactions of the year, showing the amounts of property and means received, and when received, the amount disbursed, and for what purpose disbursed, the amount on hand, together with such other information as may be required by the stockholders or deemed important to the interests of the company.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of the company shall be two million dollars, divided into one hundred thousand shares of twenty dollars each, which capital stock may be increased or diminished as the directors may determine; and the president and directors shall regulate the proportion of stock which may be issued to each member on application.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the stock and property of said company and corporation, of whatever nature, shall be assignable and transferable on the books of said corporation in such manner as the regulations and by-laws thereof may prescribe.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the dividends of the profits of said corporation shall be made at such times among the stockholders as the directors may determine.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall have no power to bind the corporation by any contract or agreement to a greater amount than the capital stock subscribed; and in case of their attempting to do so, the directors so participating in such an attempt shall be responsible in their private property to the parties injured.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That said corporation may receive real estate, leasehold, mining and boring interests and rights, and right of way, in payment of such part of subscription to stock as may be by the directors deemed advisable.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That said corporation shall not be dissolved, unless by a vote of two-thirds of the whole capital stock.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That the right to alter, change, or repeal this act is hereby reserved to any subsequent legislature; and nothing shall be so construed as to grant said company banking privileges.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 8, 1865.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AN ACT to charter the East Tennessee Female College.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a female institution be, and the same is hereby, chartered and incorporated, by the name of "The East Tennessee Female College," to be located at Cleveland, Tennessee.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the following persons be appointed trustees of said institution: G. B. Thompson, M. D., Rev. Wm. C. Dailly, Robert N. Fleming, M. D., Rev. Hiram Douglass, William Hunt, M. D., Rev. Robert Sneed, J. H. Brown, M. D., J. H. Gaut, esq., P. M. Craigmills, M. D., L. P. Gaut, esq., J. H. Craigmills, D. P. O'Neil, Thomas H. Galloway, H. B. Davis, William Cate, James M. Henderson, Thomas L. Cate, Joseph H. Davis, Jonathan C. Tipton, and Isaac Lowe, and they and their successors, as hereafter provided, shall constitute a corporation for ninety-nine years.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That said corporation shall be able and liable, in law and equity, to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, to answer and be answered, and to defend and be defended in all courts and places, as any other legally and regularly constituted corporation; may have a common seal, may alter or change the same at pleasure, and also shall be able to take by purchase, grant or devise, or in any other names, and to hold any real, personal, or mixed estate whatever: Provided always, The clear yearly value of the real estate shall not exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars: And provided also, That the principal and interest of the whole fund be used and applied for the use and promotion of education at said college, and to no other purpose.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That said trustees and their successors in office shall have full power and authority to collect and receive all funds that have in any way been contributed or pledged for the establishment enlargement, maintenance, or benefit of said institution, or for any of its purposes, and apply the same; and give, grant, bargain, sell, or dispose of all, or any, of said real, personal, or mixed estate, as to them may seem best for the interest of said institution.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the number of trustees shall at no time exceed twenty; seven of whom shall constitute a quorum, with power to transact all the business of the institution, except to sell real estate, in which case a majority of the board must act.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That the trustees and their successors in office shall have full power and authority to direct, manage, and control the funds of the institution, for the benefit of the same, to prescribe the course of study and the discipline to be observed in the institution.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That the trustees and their successors in office shall have power to select and elect, whenever a majority of them may think proper, a president of the institution, and such professor or professors, tutor or tutors, as they may consider necessary for the institution, and these, when elected, shall constitute a faculty for the education and government of the students, under the restrictions hereinbefore and hereafter enacted.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the faculty elected, as provided in the seventh section of this act, shall hold office during the pleasure of the trustees: Provided, That no member of the faculty shall be dismissed by the trustees without just cause, previously stated to him in writing, and a full opportunity for defence allowed him before at least ten (10) of the trustees: Provided, That if complaint shall be made to said trustees, or any of them, or they or any of them have knowledge of misconduct on the part of any member of the faculty, it shall be the duty of the trustees to immediately call a meeting of their body to investigate the charges, and if they think proper, by a majority vote of the members present, if five or more, suspend said officer until he be notified and tried, as herein provided.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That no member of the faculty shall be eligible to the office of trustee except the president, who shall, by virtue of his office, be a member of the board trustees.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That said trustees shall, under the regulations provided in this act, have power, upon the death, resignation, or the removal of one of its members, to supply the vacancy by the election of some other person. They shall also have power to make vacant the seat of any member of the board who shall fail to attend its meetings for the term of twelve months; or for bad or any want of good character.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That said trustees shall have power to meet from time to time upon their own adjournment, and as often as they shall be summoned by the chairman or president, or in his absence by the secretary.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That the president of the board of trustees, as well as any other officer that may be necessary for the proper organization of such body, may be elected once in every year, at such time as the board shall fix by a majority vote; and the officer elected must be a member of the board of trustees.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That the trustees, and their successors in office, have power and authority to grant and confer all such literary degrees and honors as are usual in any similar institution in the Union, and to give suitable diplomas, under the signatures of the faculty and five of the board of trustees, which diploma shall entitle the possessor to the same immunities and privileges allowed by usage and statute to the possessors of diplomas from any similar institution: Provided, That this section be subject to legislative control.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That said trustees, and their successors in office, have power and authority to make all ordinances and by-laws for the government of their institution which they may deem expedient for carrying the design of the institution into effect: Provided, That none of the by-laws shall be inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the State or of the United States.

SEC. 15. Be it further enacted, That at a meeting of the board, a quorum being present, said board may, in the absence of the president, name one of its members chairman, whose acts shall be as valid as the acts of the president, and all acts of the board, under such circumstances, shall be as regular and effectual as if the president had been present and presided over the meeting.

SEC. 16. Be it further enacted, That all the property belonging to said institution, or which may hereafter belong to it, be, and is hereby, exempt from taxation.

SEC. 17. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from its passage.

CHAPTER XXX.

AN ACT to incorporate the Cumberland Basin Petroleum and Mining Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That John T. Wilder, W. O. Osgood, W. Hunt, William E. Prall, J. H. Fessenden, S. A. Crittenden, James W. Clark, P. C. Leary, William McMustry, and Samuel Sawyer, and their associates, successors, and assigns, be, and they are hereby, constituted a body corporate, by the name and style of "The Cumberland Basin Petroleum and Mining Company" and by that name shall have ninety-nine years succession, and shall be competent to sue and be sued in any court of equity or law whatever; to have and use a common seal, and to alter the same at pleasure; to establish and change any by-laws for the government of said company not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of Tennessee: to purchase, hold, and dispose of such real estate, leases, mines, minerals, iron, coal, oil, salt, and personal property as may be necessary for the legitimate transaction of their business; to mine, forge, roll, smelt, transport, work, manufacture, refine, and vend said minerals, coal, iron, oil, salt, and products thereof, and issue such number of shares of the stock of said company, at the representative par value thereof, as may be ordered by a vote of said company; to determine the par value of shares, and have the right to pay in shares of stock of the corporation for such mining interest, or interest in real estate, as may be necessary to purchase or lease for the operation of the works of the company, and generally to have, enjoy, and exercise all rights and privileges incident to corporations, except the right to issue notes or engage in banking.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That whenever said company shall become possessed of mines or minerals, lands or leases, iron, coal, petroleum, or leases, situate in this State or elsewhere, a separate and distinct interest of each mine, bed, field, vein, or deposit, or lease, may be created under some name to distinguish the same, and in like manner may organize under and enjoy, as a distinct branch interest, all the rights and privileges named in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this corporation shall be subject to such taxes as may be imposed on similar corporations in this State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

CHAPTER XXXI.

AN ACT to incorporate the Cumberland Mining and Petroleum Company and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Bernard F. Mullins, Edward W. Metcalf, Julius C. Hart, Hugh Barns, Alexander J. Mullins, and their associates and successors be, and they are hereby, created a body politic and corporate by the name and style of "The Cumberland Mining and Petroleum Company," and by that name shall have succession for ninety-nine years, and shall be capable in law and equity to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all suits and proceedings whatever, in any of the courts of this State, and for the purpose of boring for oil and salt, and mining for iron, coal, copper, and other mineral or fossil substances in this State, and vending and selling the same, and for erecting buildings and fixtures, and other improvements, in order to carry on said mining operations, and said company may acquire and hold all needful machinery and apparatus, and may have a common seal, and the same may alter or change at pleasure; may take, hold, manage, convey or transfer any real or personal estate or property necessary for their business, or lease the same; and may make by-laws for the government of the company.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall be five hundred thousand dollars, ($500,000,) in shares of one hundred dollars each, and the corporators named in the first section of this act may act as directors in organizing the company, and act as such until the stockholders have a general meeting, when they shall elect a board of five directors, and thereafter they shall elect directors annually at the place they may designate for business, but a failure to elect annually shall not work a forfeiture of this charter, but the then existing directors shall act until others are elected. The directors shall elect one of their members president, and may appoint a secretary and treasurer, and such other officers, operatives, and agents as they may think proper, and fix their compensation and wages.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the company may sue any delinquent stockholder for default to pay in his stock, or any of it, according to the terms of the subscription or regulations of the company, or may, if they choose, declare forfeiture of such stock, and may make such by-laws and rules in relation thereto as are not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this State or of the United States.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to allow said company any banking privileges whatever, and a violation of this charter shall authorize the legislature to alter or repeal it.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That section 1 of an act to incorporate "The Raulston Oil and Salt Company," passed May 25, 1865, be so amended as to read thus: "That Albert G. Ransom, H. D. McKinney, R. S. Raulston, Hugh L. W. Raulston, W. W. Totten, and Charles Wescott, and their associates, successors, and assigns be, and they are hereby, constituted a body corporate and politic by the name and style of 'The Raulston Coal, Iron, Oil, and Salt Company,' and by that name and style shall have succession for ninety-nine years, with power to contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered unto, in all courts of law and equity in this State or elsewhere; to have and to use a common seal and change the same at will; also, to buy, lease, sell, grant, and convey lands in this State or elsewhere; to explore and drill for, mine, pump, and raise coal, iron, salt, oil, petroleum, naphtha, asphaltum, and all other minerals of every description, with the right to manufacture and refine said oils and minerals, and benzoin, burning fluids, dyes, and colors, and to such other purposes and uses as are now known or as science and chemistry may hereafter make known and discover; also, the right to erect in this State or elsewhere on any lands they may acquire by purchase, gift, or lease, such furnaces, rolling mills, machinery, and fixtures as they may think proper; to manufacture pig metal, rolled iron, and all other kinds of manufactured iron or other metals, as they may determine. Also the right to transport, sell, and dispose of all such oil, coal, iron, salt, and other minerals, together with all such manufactured articles, to vend at such places in this State, or elsewhere, as they may deem most profitable, and to have all other powers proper and needful for the successful prosecution of their business, and for the execution of the powers herein granted."

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That J. A. Stevens, F. Linck, and J. M. Wambough be, and they are hereby, constituted a body corporate and politic, under the name and style of "The Jackson Mining and Petroleum Company," and shall have the same perpetuation, powers, and privileges granted in the foregoing sections of this act, with the same succession, rights, and franchises; and, among other rights, to sue and be sued, to have and use a common seal, and to make such by-laws as shall not be inconsistent with this charter and the constitution and laws of the United States, or of the State of Tennessee; and with powers to issue and sell stock in shares of one hundred dollars each, and the capital stock of said company shall be two hundred thousand dollars, with the privilege of increasing it to five hundred thousand dollars.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That so much of an act passed March the 19th, 1860, as refers to the South Nashville Street Railroad Company, and that so much of said act passed February 29, 1860, as refers to the McGavock and Mount Vernon Horse Railroad Company be, and the same are hereby, respectively revived and amended as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the said South Nashville Street Railroad Company shall have the exclusive right of way, excepting as hereinafter provided; and by and with the consent of the mayor and aldermen and council, or the city authorities of Nashville, through Cherry and College streets in the city of Nashville, from the public square in said city, to any point or points two miles south of the southern and eastern boundary lines of said corporation, over which to construct two lines of street railroads; also, through and over Cedar, Union, and Church streets, from College to Cherry streets, and through Franklin street, or such other location as may be agreed upon, in the southern part of said city, from Cherry street to Maple street, and through Maple street to its southern terminus.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That said company may make a branch street railroad from their main stem or trunk to and through Carroll street eastwardly to the Lebanon turnpike road, and to extend the same at will southeastwardly along said turnpike road, not exceeding two miles from the corporation line.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That E. H. East, M. Burns, E. R. Glasscock, Robert Thompson, and G. H. Wessel be added to the other commissioners originally named in the McGavock and Mount Vernon Horse Railroad Company, and that they, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted said body politic and corporate, for the uses and purposes set forth in said original charter.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That said McGavock and Mount Vernon Horse Railroad Company and the South Nashville Street Railroad Company shall have the right of way in common over the railroad tracks in and along the public square in the city of Nashville, and over the tracks of said roads, or either of them, from said square through Cedar street to Cherry, through Cherry street to Church street, through Church street to College street, through College street from Church street to the public square, and along the south side of the public square to the suspension bridge piers, and along the west side to Cedar street, and to use, build, and occupy said railroad tracks in common, and upon such terms and conditions as may be fair and equitable.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That said two street railroad companies may hereafter, by and with the consent of the common council, mayor, and aldermen of the city of Nashville, build other branches to their respective roads over and through such other streets as may hereafter be selected, and that said companies may contract with other private companies for the right of way over their property, and lay down one or more tracks as arms or branches to said railroads to such point or points as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That said McGavock and Mount Vernon Horse Railroad Company shall have the exclusive right of way for a street railroad over such streets as may be selected by said company for their main lines and branches, excepting as hereinbefore declared in common for said two street railroads.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That said charters, hereby revived and amended, shall run for fifty years from and after its passage, and that all acts or parts of acts heretofore passed coming in conflict with this amended act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 15. Be it further enacted, That Samuel Watkins, Wm. R. Elliston, Joseph T. Elliston, John O. Ewing, Charles Bosley, John H. Williams, Benjamin Litton, Wm. H. Gordon, R. H. McEwen, and W. R. Cornelius, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate, under the name of the West Nashville Street Railroad Company, and by that name may have succession for the term of fifty years, may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, may have and use a common seal, may receive, purchase, and hold such personal and real estate or property as may be necessary for carrying on the business of said corporation, and the same to sell and dispose of at pleasure; may make all needful by-laws for the government of their said company, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of this State.

SEC. 16. Be it further enacted, That said company is incorporated for the purpose of constructing and using a street railroad in the city of Nashville, westwardly, not exceeding two miles from the corporation boundary, over any two of Gay, Cedar, Church, and Broad streets, together with such streets running at right angles and between such two streets as may be selected: Provided, The same shall in no way interfere with the rights and privileges hereinbefore granted to other companies, and that this charter is granted with the same rights, privileges, conditions, and restrictions as are granted and imposed, in every particular, upon the McGavock and Mount Vernon Horse Railroad Company, passed February 29, 1860.

SEC. 17. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 9, 1865.

CHAPTER XXXII.

AN ACT to incorporate the United Hebrew Brethren Benefit Society of Memphis.

SECTION 1. Be it further enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That J. M. Gaus, M. Skaller, M. Bren, L. Lyons, J. Helligers, S. Goldbaum, S. Marks, and others, and all who shall hereafter become members and officers of the benevolent association known by the name and style of the "United Hebrew Brethren Benefit Society of Memphis," in the city of Memphis, in the county of Shelby, and State of Tennessee, be, and they are hereby, constituted a body politic and corporate, under the name and style aforesaid, with full powers in their said corporate capacity to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and hold personal and real property, stock, and incorporated hereditaments, and may dispose of the same in such manner as the said association may deem most expedient.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said United Hebrew Brethren Benefit Society may use a common seal, and change the same at pleasure; and enact, from time to time, such by-laws and regulations as may be required for the good order and government of said society, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or the State of Tennessee; and do and perform all other acts for their benefit not inconsistent with the privileges herein granted.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the old German order of the Farugari, known as Jackson Lodge No. 111, be, and the same is hereby, incorporated, with the same powers and privileges as conferred by the other sections of this act, and not inconsistent with the laws of the State.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 10, 1865.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

AN ACT to encourage the planting, improvement, and other interests of the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Edward Yardly, Thomas B. McElwee, Peter D. Luther, Wm. D. Whipple, T. W. Yardly, J. W. Barker, and John A. Spooner, be, and are hereby, incorporated into a body politic and corporate, and their successors, under the corporate name and style of the "Tennessee Manufacturing and Improvement Company."

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of this company shall be two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, divided into twenty-five thousand shares of ten dollars each, with the privilege of increasing the capital stock to an amount not exceeding five million dollars.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That this company shall have a common seal, and by its corporate name and style shall have power to transact all its business in its corporate name, purchase and lease lands, raise and manufacture cotton, also oil from cotton seed, together with the mining and dealing in coal, iron, marble, and any or all other valuable minerals: Provided, This company shall not engage in the business of banking.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That this company shall have full power and authority to open and make roads, by rail or otherwise, necessary for ingress and egress in its operations in shipping their products to market; said company being at its own expense in the same, and rendering to owners of lands—provided said owners are willing to dispose of the lands—just compensation for the right of way and land so appropriated.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That this company shall have power to elect its own officers, and establish by-laws, rules, and regulations for the government of, the same in such manner as the company may think best; the same not being repugnant to this act.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That this corporation shall be subject to such taxes as may be imposed on similar institutions in this State.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That, with a view to the relief of the travelling community generally, and the incorporated turnpike companies of the State, permission is granted said turnpike companies to collect tolls at their several gates; the proceeds of the same, after paying the expense of collection, shall be appropriated to the repair of said roads till the same are made equal to the requirements of the original charter, when this section shall cease to have any further effect.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That, to enable the Lebanon and Nashville Turnpike Company to rebuild the bridges burned by General Forrest's command across Mill creek and Stone's river, said company shall be allowed to charge double tolls so soon as one or both of said bridges are completed, and so continue until the gross amount of the extra toll hereby allowed shall create a fund sufficient to discharge the debts incurred in rebuilding said bridges, and no longer, when the provisions of this section shall cease.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Passed June 9, 1865.

Briscoe, Edgar Hyke, Patrick Lavelle, Joseph Cochran, and C. J. Hall, (of whom the first five shall constitute the directors for the first year,) be, and they are, together with their associates, successors, and assigns, hereby constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The New York and Tennessee Petroleum and Mining Company," for the purpose of exploring for petroleum, rock oil, coal oil, salt, volatile substances, and all ores, minerals, and metals, and for mining, pumping, or obtaining by any other process, refining and vending the same, and for such purposes may have and hold in fee simple, or for a term of years, real or personal estate; may mortgage, transfer, or convey the same; may purchase, construct, or erect all necessary buildings, apparatus, roads, &c., for conducting their operations; may have a common seal, and alter or renew the same at pleasure; enjoy all the privileges and immunities of similar corporations, and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, appeal, prosecute, and defend in suits and actions, in any court of law or equity in this or any other State; may make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for accomplishing the objects of the corporation as may be deemed best from time to time by a majority of the board of directors: Provided, Such by-laws, rules, and regulations do not conflict with the spirit and letter of this charter, the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That at any time within five years from the passage of this act a majority of the above named persons may meet in the city of Nashville, and after accepting this charter may proceed to open books for the subscription of stock.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of said company shall consist of not less than fifty nor more than five hundred thousand dollars, to be divided into such number of shares as the board of directors may determine.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That when twenty per cent. of the stock shall be subscribed for, and as much as ten per cent. in cash, or real or personal estate in fee or leasehold (the value of the same to be determined and agreed upon by the board of directors) shall be paid into the treasury of the company, or be in its legal possession, the board shall proceed to elect a president, secretary, treasurer, and such other officers as they may see fit.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the directors shall require books to be kept containing the names of the stockholders, the amount of their subscription, payments, transfers of stock, and every fact relating to the stock, which, at all reasonable times, shall be subject to the inspection of any and every stockholder.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That each stockholder shall be entitled to a certificate, or certificates, of the stock he or she may own, which certificate shall be signed by the president and secretary of the company, and stamped with its seal.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That no transfers of stock shall be valid, until such transfer is registered on the books of the company by the prescribed officer or regular transferring agent.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That the chief office of the company shall be at Nashville, but the directors may establish a branch office at the field of operations, and elsewhere, if the interests of the company are deemed to require it.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the directors of the company shall not be less than five in number, and after the first year shall be chosen by the stockholders.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to allow banking privileges under this corporation.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That for any violation of this charter the legislature may alter, change, or repeal this act.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That C. Hamburgh, Thomas Hays, Sol. Barber, Jack Huffman, James Killeben, Moses Oldburn, and M. D. Davin, of the county of Montgomery, be, and they are hereby constituted, a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The Montgomery and Cumberland River Coal and Oil Company," with all the rights, powers, and privileges that are hereby granted to "The New York and Tennessee Petroleum and Mining Company."

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

CHAPTER XXXV.

AN ACT to re-charter the Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Joseph Vaulx, Wm. T. Berry, Samuel J. Carter, Joseph B. Knowles, Samuel Watkins, John M. Hill, James A. McAllister, or any three of them, be, and are hereby, authorized to open subscriptions in Nashville, for the capital stock of said company, on Monday, the 25th day of June next; and keep them open every day between the hours of 10 a. m. and 4 p. m., until Saturday, 4 o'clock p. m., the 30th day of the same month: Provided, The present stockholders in said company shall have the right to subscribe for stock not exceeding the amount now held by them in said company; and the subscribers to the stock of the company, and their successors, shall be, and they are hereby declared to be, a body politic and incorporate, by the name and style of the "Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company," and by that name shall so continue until the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, and be capable in law to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in all courts of law and equity, or elsewhere; and to make and use a common seal, and the same to alter or renew at their pleasure; and generally to do and perform all things relative to the objects of this institution which now is or shall be lawful for any individual or body politic or corporate to do.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That the capital stock of this company shall be one hundred thousand dollars, to be increased at the pleasure of the stockholders, not to exceed three hundred thousand dollars, divided into shares of fifty dollars each: fifteen dollars on each share shall be paid at the time of subscribing, and ten dollars on each share shall at the same time be secured by negotiable notes with security, to be approved by the president and directors, payable in one of the banks of Nashville, in ninety days from the date, to the president, directors and company of said "Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company:" the balance of said stock shall be secured by notes not having more than six months to run, with personal security, to be approved by the president and directors.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That so soon as five hundred shares are subscribed for and paid, or secured to be paid, the company shall be competent to transact all kinds of business for which it is established; and it shall be lawful for the stockholders to meet as hereafter directed and choose their directors.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to hold, possess, and acquire, and the same to sell and convey, all such real estate as may be necessary for the transaction of its business, or which may be conveyed to said company for the security of any debt which may become due or owing, or in satisfaction of any judgment or decree rendered in favor of said company, and may make such regulations as may be necessary and proper for the good government of said company.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the said Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Company shall have full power and authority to make insurances on ships and other sea vessels, and upon steamboats, flat-boats, and other river boats; upon freight, seamen's wages, wares, and merchandise, and gold and silver, bullion, or money, against all maritime risks of the rivers, seas, or lakes; and upon houses, stores, and other buildings, goods, wares, merchandise, furniture, and other articles against fire, and upon bottomry and respondentia, and fix a premium thereon. And the said company shall have power—first, to take insurance on lives; second, to receive and hold land under grants, with general or special covenants, so far as the same may be necessary for the transaction of their business; or when the same may be taken in payment of debts due the company, or purchased upon sale made under any law of this State, so far as the same may be necessary to protect the rights of said company, and the same again to sell, convey, and dispose of; and generally to do and perform all other things necessary to promote these objects.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for said company to invest any part of its capital stock, money, fund, or other property, in any public stock or funded debt, created or to be created, by or under any laws of the United States or this (or any other) State, or in the stocks of any chartered bank in this State or of the United States, and the same to sell or transfer at pleasure; and again, to invest the same whenever and so often as the exigencies of said company or a due regard for the safety of its funds shall require; or they may loan the same, or any part thereof, to individuals or public corporations, on real or personal security, for such periods of time as the directors for the time being shall deem prudent and best for the interests of said company.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That the real and personal estate, business, property, and fund of said company, and the administration of its affairs, shall be under the direction, management, and control of a board of eleven directors, each of whom shall be owners in their own names of not less than ten shares of the capital stock of said company, citizens of the United States and of this State.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That an election shall be held after the first election, for the board of directors for said company, at the office of said company in Nashville, on the first Monday in October in each year and every succeeding year, of which ten days' notice shall be given in at least two of the newspapers printed in Nashville, each shareholder giving one vote for each share of which he or she may be the owner, but no shareholder shall be entitled to more than thirty-five votes; and the persons so elected shall serve as directors for the next succeeding twelve months; and if at any time an election shall not be held as herein provided, the said company shall not be dissolved; but the board of directors for the time being shall serve until another election takes place, which may be at any time thereafter, the board for the time being giving at least ten days' notice thereof in two of the newspapers printed at Nashville; and the said directors are hereby authorized to fill any vacancy that may happen through death, resignation, or otherwise.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That the directors so elected shall elect one of their body president of said company, who shall serve until the next annual election; and in case of his death, resignation, or removal, the board shall appoint a president pro tempore; they shall fill all vacancies which may occur in their own body, and shall appoint a secretary, and all subordinate officers, clerks, agents, and servants of said company; fix their compensation, define their powers, and prescribe their duties; who shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the board.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, That the president and four directors, or five directors in the absence of the president, shall constitute a quorum to transact business for said company. The board of directors shall have full power and authority to establish agencies in this State, and any other State or States, appoint agents and other assistants for conducting the business of the same, and prescribe the mode and amount of their compensation; to appoint from their own body, risk and other committees, and establish by-laws and other regulations deemed necessary for the proper management of the business of said company.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, That the stock of said company shall be held and considered personal property, and it shall not be assigned or transferred, except on the books of the company, and with the assent of two-thirds of the directors, and in the manner and forms which shall be prescribed by the board of directors; yet such stock to be liable for the satisfaction of debts, as prescribed by law.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That on the first Mondays of October and April of each year half-yearly statements shall be made exhibiting a true statement of the condition of the company, which shall be laid before the stockholders, and such dividends may be made as the president and directors may deem advisable, but they shall in no case diminish the capital stock.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, That if at any time a stockholder shall fail to pay such instalments on his stock as may be called for at the time and in the manner prescribed, the board of directors, for the time being, shall have full power to declare such stock forfeited, and shall, after giving ten days' notice thereof, offer the same for sale, at public auction, to the highest bidder, for cash, and the number of shares so sold shall be transferred by the president of the board of directors to the highest bidder, who shall, by virtue of such transfer, become a member of said company, and if the sum bid be not equal to the amount paid and the call for which it is sold, the company may proceed to collect the residue from the original stockholder by suit in any court or tribunal of this State having jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, That the board of directors shall have the power at any time, when, in their opinion, the interest of the company requires it, to demand of any stockholder additional security for such part of his stock as may remain unpaid, and if such stockholder fail or refuse to give such additional security to the satisfaction of the board of directors, they may declare such stock forfeited, and sell the same as provided for in the preceding section.

SEC. 15. Be it further enacted, That so soon as the amount of stock mentioned in the third section of this act is subscribed for, and after five days' notice in two of the newspapers published in Nashville, signed by any three members of the company, the stockholders shall meet at such time and place as may be appointed within the city of Nashville, and elect, by ballot, the first board of directors—a plurality of votes given shall elect—and the persons so elected shall, at their first meeting, elect one of themselves president of the board, who, with said directors, shall serve until the first Monday in October, 1866, and until another board of directors is elected.

SEC. 16. Be it further enacted, That no stockholder or member of this company shall be answerable in his person or individual property for any contract or agreement of said company, or for any losses, deficiencies, or failures of the capital stock of this company, but the whole of said capital stock, together with all property, rights, and credits belonging thereto, and nothing more, shall, at any time, be answerable for the demands against said company: Provided, That any director, or directors, who shall sanction or aid in the continuance of said company after it shall become insolvent and unable to meet its liabilities, and said fact known to the directors, shall be held personally responsible for all deposits thereafter made, or liabilities thereafter incurred, by said company.

SEC. 17. Be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the company hereby created the power of issuing bills of credit or exercising banking privileges.

SEC. 18. Be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the legislature from granting similar powers and privileges to similar associations.

SEC. 19. Be it further enacted, That the company hereby created shall have all the rights and privileges that belong by existing laws or that may hereafter be granted to other insurance companies of this State.

SEC. 20. Be it further enacted, That should the requisite amount of stock not be subscribed by the time specified in section one, those appointed to open subscriptions, or any three of them may, from time to time, re-open books for the subscription of stock in this company, until the proper amount be taken: Provided, The time allowed for said subscriptions shall terminate on the first day of December next.

SEC. 21. Be it further enacted, That a bonus to the State of half of one per centum upon their capital be paid for the use of common schools in the State of Tennessee.

SEC. 22. Be it further enacted, That the law requiring the Union Insurance Company and the Life Insurance Company, called "The East Tennessee Mutual and Trust Company," to deposit with the comptroller of the State twenty thousand dollars of six per cent. bonds of the State be, and is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 10, 1865.

NUMBER XI.

JOINT RESOLUTION tendering the thanks of the loyal people of Tennessee to the legislature of Ohio.

Whereas the legislature of Ohio did, on the 31st day of March, 1864, pass a joint resolution instructing their senators and requesting their representatives in Congress to use their influence to have enacted proper laws to feed, clothe, and furnish transportation to the destitute people of East Tennessee, who by the ravages of war were compelled to leave their homes and seek homes in a strange land amongst strangers; and whereas said resolution was, in the opinion of the people of East Tennessee, one of the legitimate offsprings of the patriotism and love of country of the gallant and self-sacrificing people of Ohio, and strengthened the bonds of friendship and brotherly love existing between the loyal people of Tennessee and Ohio: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the thanks of the loyal people of the State of Tennessee are hereby tendered to the legislature of Ohio for this manifestation of their confidence and esteem, and for this Christian and patriotic offer to relieve the destitute of our State.

Resolved, That the secretary of State do, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit immediately a copy of this preamble and resolutions to the secretary of state of Ohio, with a request that he lay the same before the legislature of said State now in session.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 11, 1865.

NUMBER XII.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a joint committee be appointed on the State library, two on behalf of the senate and three on behalf of the house of representatives.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
 SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 12, 1865.

NUMBER XV.

JOINT RESOLUTION to appoint a joint committee of the two houses to report joint rules and regulations for the government of both houses.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the speaker of the senate appoint a committee of three, to act in conjunction with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the house of representatives, to report joint rules and regulations for the government of the two houses.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

NUMBER XVI.

JOINT RESOLUTION to raise a joint committee to redistrict the State.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a committee of five on the part of the senate, and such number as the house of representatives may appoint, shall constitute a joint committee, who shall report a bill redistricting the State for members of Congress, and senators and representatives to the State legislature, as required by law.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
 SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 12, 1865.

NUMBER XVII.

JOINT RESOLUTION to appoint a committee to investigate the past and present condition and management of the penitentiary.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the committee on the penitentiary be, and they are hereby, constituted a joint committee to investigate the past and present condition and management of the penitentiary, and that they be authorized to send for persons and papers.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
 SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 14, 1865.

NUMBER XVIII.

JOINT RESOLUTION appointing a committee to report what action should be had with reference to the death of President Abraham Lincoln.

Whereas the members of the general assembly have learned with sadness and sorrow of the melancholy death, by assassination, of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, therefore be it—

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That there be a joint committee of five in the senate and five in the house of representatives, to be appointed by the respective speakers, to take into consideration and report what action should be taken by the legislature on the mournful and sorrowful occasion.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 17, 1865.

NUMBER XIX.

JOINT RESOLUTION expressing the sense of the general assembly on the death of President Abraham Lincoln.

Whereas the death of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in the full vigor of his physical and mental faculties, by the hand of an assassin, is a bereavement that extends to all parts of the nation; and particularly does it affect the people of those States who have for years been suffering from the weight of military rule, made necessary by the rebellion, and who were endeavoring to restore their political relationship to the government of the United States;

Whereas, in his death, the nation mourns the loss of one of her most gifted and worthy sons—the highest officer, the President, and slain because he was the President of the United States, it is right and proper that the general assembly of the State of Tennessee should express, as such, in an appropriate manner, its sorrow at his death; its condemnation of the assassin who committed it, and the men who plotted the hellish deed; its appreciation of the high intellectual, moral, and social qualities which ever characterized his private life; and its approval of the large-hearted patriotism which marked his administration, showing that his course of action was impelled by humanity, rather than calculation;

Whereas the laborious duties of the executive office during the trying times of the great rebellion gave ample scope to a heart full of sympathy and warm affections. As President, he had a wide field for manly action. There was displayed his love of the right and his scorn for the wrong. Here his large-heartedness was made conspicuous, and his generosity and charity bore fruit. He was, as President, a model. The honors he coveted were honorable. With a wise and lofty patriotism, unsurpassed by any, he applied the powers of his great mind to work out the true principles upon which the union of the States could be preserved. The measures proposed were as nothing, unless they were calculated to accomplish the end so earnestly desired. His recommendations were always directed towards its maintenance, and were uniformly enforced with a facility and aptness of illustration which seemed inexhaustible;

Whereas Abraham Lincoln's originality of manner, his humor, wit, sarcasm, and wondrous powers of ridicule, were weapons particularly his own, which no one else could imitate. Add to these qualities courage, will, and indomitable persistency of purpose, which never flagged or faltered, and he was a power felt and acknowledged by the nation. Take him all in all, it will be long ere we look upon his like again;

Whereas he is dead; but the days of his pilgrimage, although in troublesome times, were full of honor, love, and troops of friends. The nation mourns. Peace be with him. Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That, in the death of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, we mourn in heart-felt sorrow the loss of the nation.

Resolved, That in token of his memory we wear the usual badge of mourning, and that our respective halls be draped in the habiliments of woe.

Resolved, That we cannot find language strong enough to express our condemnation of the assassin who performed, and the conspirators who plotted, the deed, and heartily desire that they meet a speedy and deserved punishment.

Resolved, That we deeply condole with the family of the deceased in this the hour of their great bereavement, and fully sympathize with them in their terrible affliction and overwhelming grief.

Resolved. That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased by the secretary of state.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 17, 1865.

NUMBER XX.

JOINT RESOLUTION to support the administration of President Johnson.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee; That confiding in the patriotism and integrity of Andrew Johnson, we will give his administration of the government the same cordial support accorded by the loyal people of the nation to his predecessor.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 17, 1865.

NUMBER XXI.

JOINT RESOLUTION requesting the governor of the State to communicate certain facts to the President of the United States.

Believing that the time has arrived in the political status of the State of Tennessee when the loyal people of said State are anxious and desirous that civil law and order should be restored and prevail throughout the borders of the whole State, and that they should once more be permitted to resume their political and social relations with the government of the United States of America—to accomplish this end, therefore, be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That his excellency, the governor of the State of Tennessee, is hereby requested to make known to the President of the United States the actions and proceedings of the late State convention, begun and held in Nashville on the 9th day of January, 1865, with regard to the amendments to the constitution of the State of Tennessee; also of the ratification of said amendments by the loyal people of said State, at the ballot-box, on the 22d day of February last.

Resolved, further, That his excellency, the governor, also make known to the President of the United States the action of the present legislature of the State of Tennessee upon the adoption of the amendment to the constitution of the United States; and that he respectfully request the President of the United States to make known to the loyal citizens of the State of Tennessee, by proclamation or otherwise, that the State of Tennessee be no longer considered in a state of insurrection, and that the loyal people of said State be granted all the rights and privileges that are granted or allowed to the loyal citizens of any of the sister States that are not considered in a state of rebellion against the government of the United States.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 21, 1865.

NUMBER XXII.

JOINT RESOLUTION allowing mileage to Messrs. Grantham and Tighe.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That Willis Grantham, the applicant for the seat of Furnoy Jones, from the county of Claiborne, and Samuel Tighe, the contestant for the seat of M. T. Ryder, from the county of Shelby, be allowed their mileage and per diem up to this day, and that the amount so appropriated be included in the general appropriation bill; it appearing to the satisfaction of the legislature that their claims were meritorious, if not legal.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 22, 1865.

NUMBER XXIII.

JOINT RESOLUTION to meet in convention to elect a comptroller.

Whereas a vacancy has occurred in the office of the comptroller of the treasury; Therefore be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the senate and house of representatives meet in convention on Tuesday, the 25th day of April, at 10 o'clock a. m., to fill said vacancy.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 22, 1865.

NUMBER XXIV.

NUMBER XXX.

JOINT RESOLUTION to meet in convention to elect Senators to the United States Congress.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the senate meet the house of representatives in the hall of the latter on Thursday, 4th of May next, at 10 o'clock, for the purpose of electing two Senators to the next Congress of the United States.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 24, 1865.

NUMBER XXXI.

A JOINT RESOLUTION to declare the office of comptroller of the treasury of the State of Tennessee vacant.

Whereas the two houses met in convention in the representative hall on the 25th of April and voted for a comptroller; and whereas a majority of the votes cast in said election was for Hon. J. R. Dillon for said office; and whereas part of the tenth section of the seventh article of the constitution of the State of Tennessee is as follows, viz: "No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be eligible to any office or place of trust, the appointment of which is vested in the executive or the general assembly, except to the office of trustee to a literary institution;" and whereas it appears from the said tenth clause of the State constitution that Mr. Dillon was not eligible to said office on account of his holding a seat in this legislature: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we now declare the office of comptroller of the treasury of the State of Tennessee now vacant and should be filled by the election of some competent and eligible person to fill said vacancy.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 29, 1865.

NUMBER XXXII.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the two houses meet in convention in the hall of the house of representatives on Tuesday, the second day of May, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of electing a State librarian.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted April 29, 1865.

NUMBER XXXIV.

JOINT RESOLUTION offering a reward of five thousand dollars for the apprehension of Isham G. Harris.

Whereas treason is the highest crime known to the laws of the land, and no one is presumed to understand the true meaning of the term better than governors of States, and certainly no one should be held to a more strict account for their treason; and

Whereas the State of Tennessee, before the rebellion, enjoyed a high social, moral, and political position, and had the well-earned reputation of the Volunteer State; and

Whereas by the treason of one Isham G. Harris, ex-governor of Tennessee, the State has lost millions of dollars, and thousands of the young men of the State have been killed in battle and died of disease, and thousands of the middle-aged and old men have been murdered and imprisoned, and defenceless women and children driven from the State, heart-broken and penniless; and

Whereas the voters of Tennessee did, in the month of February, 1861, by a majority of sixty thousand, repudiate treason and rebellion, but the aforesaid Isham G. Harris, well knowing the true sentiments of the State upon treason and rebellion, and wholly disregarding the overwhelming expression of popular sentiment, did use his position as governor as aforesaid, to put the State in rebellion and hostility to the government of the United States, and is guilty of treason, perjury, and theft, and is responsible to a great extent for the war, misery and death of thousands of the citizens of the State, and for the desolation of the same from east to west and from north to south; the cries of the wounded and dying, the wail of the widow, the weeping of the orphan, come to us upon every breeze, imploring us to punish the instigators of the rebellion: Therefore, for the reasons aforesaid, be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the governor of the State is hereby authorized and instructed to offer a reward of five thousand dollars for the apprehension and delivery to the civil authorities of the State the aforesaid Isham G. Harris; and he shall fully describe said fugitive from justice, and shall make publication for three months, or longer if he may think proper, in one newspaper in each of the grand divisions of the State, and a paper published in Richmond, Virginia; Raleigh, North Carolina; Savannah, Georgia; Little Rock, Arkansas; New Orleans, Louisiana; and shall publish the preamble with his proclamation.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 1, 1865.

NUMBER XXXV.

A JOINT RESOLUTION to meet the house in convention to elect a State comptroller.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the senate meet the house of representatives in joint convention on Thursday, the second day of May, at ten o'clock, to elect a State comptroller.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 1, 1865.

NUMBER XXXVI.

JOINT RESOLUTION to raise a joint committee to wait on the national banks of the State.

Resolved, by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a committee of three on the part of the senate, and such committee as the house of representatives may appoint, shall constitute a joint committee to ascertain what, if any, arrangements can be made with the national banks in each division of the State to receive the public funds of the State and disburse the same, as is now provided by law for the Bank of Tennessee and branches.

Resolved, That said committee report as early as possible.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 2, 1865.

NUMBER XXXVII.

JOINT RESOLUTION to meet in convention to elect an entry-taker for the Ocoee district.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the senate and house of representatives meet in the hall of the latter on Tuesday, the second day of May next, for the purpose of electing a register and entry-taker for the Ocoee district, in the State of Tennessee.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 2, 1865.

NUMBER XXXVIII.

JOINT RESOLUTION appointing commissioners to settle with the Louisville and Nashville railroad.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the comptroller, secretary of state, attorney general of the State, and commissioner of public roads of the State of Tennessee, be, and are hereby, constituted commissioners, on behalf of the State of Tennessee, to meet and make a settlement with the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and make a report thereof to this session of the general assembly, if practicable; if not, to the next session of the same.

Be it further resolved, That if such settlement cannot be made by said commissioners with said Louisville and Nashville railroad as shall be satisfactory to them, the fact shall be made known to the governor of the State, and he may direct the attorney general of the State to institute such legal proceedings against said company as may be necessary to protect the interests of the State.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 5, 1865.

NUMBER XXXIX.

JOINT RESOLUTION applying to the President for troops.

Whereas the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State of this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence; and

Whereas the State of Tennessee is one of the States of this Union, and is constantly invaded by armed bands of guerillas from the so-called Confederate States, and subject at all times to violence by domestic traitors, murdering and robbing the loyal citizens, stealing and carrying off their property, and hindering, delaying, and preventing the execution of the civil laws of the State; and

Whereas the greater portion of the young and middle-aged loyal men are in the United States army, and the old men have neither arms nor ammunition, consequently defenceless, and the financial condition of the State is such that it is impossible to create a fund to clothe, arm, feed, and pay troops for State defence, to meet the usual expenditure of the State, and provide for the payment of the interest accrued on the bonds of the State, together with Tennessee's portion of the twenty million apportioned amongst the States by an act of Congress of August, 1861, will be all, if not more than the people can possibly meet: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the legislature of the State aforesaid, by virtue of the authority of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States aforesaid, do make this application to his excellency Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and commander-in-chief of the army of the same, to place under the direction and control of the proper military authority, in pursuance of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and under the control and direction of such authority as in his opinion may be right and proper, a sufficient number of Tennessee troops now in the United States service to repel invasion, and drive the invader from the State, and suppress any and all violence by armed domestic traitors, to protect loyal citizens, and aid and assist the civil officers in executing the civil laws of the State.

Resolved, That the secretary of state shall, immediately after the passage of this resolution, transmit a copy of the same, together with the preamble, under the great seal of the State, to the President of the United States, asking him to notify the legislature now in session, at as early a day as convenient, what action he will take in the premises.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 9, 1865.

NUMBER XL.

A JOINT RESOLUTION appointing a committee to memorialize Congress.

Whereas, by the presence of the federal troops in the State of Tennessee, rendered necessary by the armed resistance to the laws of the United States of a portion of its citizens, many military supplies have been taken from the loyal citizens of the State in an irregular manner, and much damage has been done to the property of unconditionally loyal citizens; and

Whereas, by article five of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, it is declared that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation; and

Whereas the loyal citizens of Tennessee are entitled to the same consideration and protection as are the loyal citizens of any other State in the Union: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a committee of two on the part of the senate, and five on the part of the house, be appointed to prepare a memorial to the Congress of the United States, setting forth the obligations of the government of the United States to pay the loyal citizens of Tennessee for property taken from them by officers and soldiers of the United States, and paying that some legislation be had by Congress, making provisions to enable those loyal citizens who may have sustained losses in the manner already described to prove such losses, and that an appropriation be made by Congress to pay such loyal claimants.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 10, 1865.

NUMBER XLI.

RESOLUTION of inquiry in relation to the Hermitage property.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the senate all the information in his possession in reference to the present status of the Hermitage property, including an account of its purchase by the State, the amount paid for it, and all subsequent legislation in regard to it, and what acts of ownership have been exercised over it by the State, and all other information he may deem proper, as well as any recommendation he may have to offer regarding its future management.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 12, 1864.

NUMBER XLII.

JOINT RESOLUTION raising a joint committee on the elective franchise.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the judiciary committee of the senate and the judiciary committee of the house of representatives compose a joint committee on the subject of the elective franchise, and be instructed to bring in a bill on that subject to-morrow for action on that day.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 16, 1865.

NUMBER XLIII.

JOINT RESOLUTION requesting the governor to lay before the legislature certain correspondence.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the governor be, and is hereby, requested to lay before the legislature all correspondence, if any, he may have had with James T. Dunlap, late comptroller of the treasury, relative to a return of the archives of the State; also with Vernon K. Stevenson, president of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, relative to said road; also, with Granville C. Torbett, late president of the Bank of Tennessee, relative to a return of the assets of said bank, if, in the opinion of his excellency, the said information will not be detrimental to the public welfare.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 19, 1865.

NUMBER XLIV.

A JOINT RESOLUTION declaring certain civil offices vacant, and providing for filling of the same.

Whereas a war has existed in the State of Tennessee for four years, and during the greater part of that time all civil tribunals have been closed, and most of the officers holding offices have wilfully abandoned their offices, and neglected or refused to perform the duties incumbent upon them by the laws of the land, and in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Tennessee; and whereas many of the civil offices thus abandoned and vacated have been filled by appointments made by the acting governor of the State since the 7th day of March, 1862, which should be ratified and confirmed: Therefore,

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That all civil offices of the State of Tennessee, to which their respective incumbents were elected and qualified previous to the 6th day of May, 1861, and who, after such election and qualification, have voluntarily abandoned their offices and wilfully neglected and refused to perform the duties required of them by law, are hereby declared vacant.

Resolved further, That all of the offices in the State of Tennessee that have been filled by appointment and election under the authority of the usurped State government, after the declared independence of the State of Tennessee, and after the 6th day of May, 1861, are hereby declared vacant.

Resolved further, That all civil officers who have been appointed since the 7th day of May, 1862, by his excellency Andrew Johnson, acting governor of the State, or who have been elected and qualified under his various proclamations, are hereby ratified and confirmed, and they shall continue to hold and exercise the functions of their respective offices until successors shall be elected and qualified as prescribed by the laws and constitution of the State of Tennessee and of the United States.

Resolved further, That his excellency William G. Brownlow, governor of the State, be, and he is hereby, requested, as soon as in his opinion he deems it advisable, to issue his proclamation ordering elections to be held in the respective counties of the State where such vacancies have occurred, requiring the people of the State to fill such vacancies in pursuance of the laws of the State; and in the mean time, until such elections are held, that he proceed and fill the vacancies by the appointment of suitable and proper persons until their successors shall be elected and qualified; and the governor is clothed with full power to appoint special officers to hold said elections for each county, with full power to appoint deputies to perform all the duties as now required by law, where no regular officers are performing civil duties.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Approved May 20, 1865.

NUMBER XLV.

JOINT RESOLUTION to raise a joint committee to examine into the condition of the Bank of Tennessee and branches.

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee. That a joint committee of one from the senate and two from the house be appointed to examine the condition of the Bank of Tennessee and branches—a committee to the principal bank and one to each branch, with liberty to send for persons and papers, and that they report to the regular session in October.

NUMBER LIIL

A JOINT RESOLUTION in relation to a certain class of Tennessee Union soldiers who lost their lives in the army of the Union during the rebellion.

Whereas a large number of Tennessee soldiers have died and been killed in battle while serving the United States against a hostile rebel foe, without having been duly mustered into service, and there being great deficiency in the records of the State pertaining thereto: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the adjutant general of the State be, and he is hereby authorized to perfect—in a well-bound book to be kept for that purpose—a complete record of all Tennessee soldiers who have belonged to the United States service during the present rebellion, with such historical remarks as will enable them or their families to obtain such bounty, arrears of pay, &c., as may be due them, and that he be allowed such compensation for his services as may be determined by subsequent legislation.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAMUEL R. RODGERS,

Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted May 23, 1865.

NUMBER LIV.

JOINT RESOLUTION directory to the trustees of the Tennessee hospital for the insane.

Whereas William A. Cheatham, M. D., late superintendent and physician of Tennessee hospital for the insane, has been called upon, by a resolution of the Senate, to communicate a detailed statement of the financial operations of that institution from the first day of October, 1861, to the 31st day of July, 1862, during which period there is no report known to this general assembly of the institution, and there being other reasons why there should be an investigation of its affairs, and the late superintendent and physician having failed or refused to notice the resolution referred to above: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the board of trustees are hereby instructed to investigate the books and accounts and management of Tennessee hospital for the insane, during the administration of William A. Cheatham, late superintendent and physician, and power is hereby given to send for persons and papers, and report the result to the next session of this legislature.

NUMBER LV

JOINT RESOLUTION appointing a committee to wait on the major general commanding the department, and make inquiries in relation to certain assessments.

Whereas it appears from the orders issued by the various military commanders of the United States, at different places in this State, that they are levying on persons who are permitted to trade under privileges granted to them by the authorities of the United States, and of the State of Tennessee, and collecting considerable sums of money; and whereas it is desirable to know whether such action is in accordance with the wishes of the general commanding the department: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a committee of three on the part of the house, and two on the part of the senate, be appointed to call on the major general commanding the department, and ascertain whether such assessments are made under and by virtue of his orders, and if so, what action, if any, is necessary to be had in the premises.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SAMUEL R. RODGERS,
Speaker of the Senate.

Adopted June 3, 1865.

NUMBER LVI.

A JOINT RESOLUTION appointing a committee to settle with Hon. Joseph S. Fowler, late comptroller and acting treasurer of the State.

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Tennessee, That a joint committee of three on the part of the house, and two on the part of the senate, be appointed to settle with the Hon. Joseph S. Fowler, late comptroller and acting treasurer of the State.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Nashville, July 25, 1865.

I, ANDREW J. FLETCHER, secretary of state of the State of Tennessee, hereby certify that I have carefully collated the foregoing documents, with authentic copies on file in my office, and find them correctly printed.

A. J. FLETCHER, Secretary of State.

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 9, 1866.

At a meeting of the Union Central and German Union Central Committees of the State of Tennessee and the Union members of the Tennessee legislature the following memorial was unanimously approved and adopted.

A. LOVERING,

Chairman pro tem. of Central Committee.

EDWARD MAYNARD,

Secretary of Union Central Committee.

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 9, 1866.

To the honorable Congressional Committee on Reconstruction:

The undersigned, constituting a large majority of the State Central Committee of the Union party of Tennessee, being all who could be present, beg leave to communicate to you their views of the present political and social condition of this State, and their anticipations as to future results from that condition.

The vast powers conferred upon you, so vitally affecting ourselves and our posterity, we feel to be a sufficient warrant for this liberty on our part.

Our statistics show that, in the spring of 1861, about 40,000 of the voters of Tennessee made up their minds to adhere to the flag of their country in spite of the tornado of treason that swept the State and carried it into the vortex of rebellion. They constituted less than one-third of the voting population of the State, and far less of its wealth and political influence. Surrounded on all sides by rebel population; suffering every conceivable outrage in person and property; hanged on the gallows; shot by an infuriate soldiery; cast into many prisons; mercilessly conscripted, and hunted like wild beasts and murdered in our places of concealment, our numbers have been reduced, but the survivors of us have kept the vows made upon the altar of patriotism five years ago. More than twenty-five thousand of our number, leaving their homes and families to be pillaged and abused, travelling through mountains or swamps by night and hiding in thickets by day to evade a pursuing and murderous enemy, escaped to the federal lines, and, without bounty or other inducement, enrolled themselves as Union soldiers. They have returned to their homes from a gallant and bloody service to find, in many instances, their houses in ashes, their property gone, and their families abused, insulted, and outraged. And, it must be added, that in many instances these victorious heroes of the national cause are not permitted to remain at their homes in peace, or, if permitted, they are crippled in business and politically and socially outlawed.

The designs of the great secession majority of Tennessee may have been changed by the events of the war, and so may have been their opinions of their own strength and of the strength of the government, but, unless your memorialists greatly misunderstand them, their sentiments, sympathies, and passions remain unchanged. They welcome peace because they are disabled from making war; they submit because they can no longer resist; they accept results they cannot reject, and profess loyalty because they have a halter around their necks. They recognize the abolition of slavery because they see it before them as a fact; but they say it was accomplished by gross violations of the Constitution, that the negro is free only in fact, but not in law or of right.

Less than a year ago the provisional governor, representing the military power of the President, and recognizing the right of the loyal people to govern the State, set on foot a civil government, founded upon the basis of the loyal population—his favorite policy. The plan of a popular convention and a submission to a vote of the loyal people was adopted, and the former constitution and laws were restored without the institution of slavery. Whether we regard it as our former State government restored, or as a new government given to us by the power of the nation; is immaterial, as it has been compelled at every step to lean upon the strong arm of the national authority for support. The action of the convention was submitted to the vote of the loyal people, and, by means of the strong will of the military governor and a rigid test oath, and because the election was not recognized by the disloyal, it was nearly unanimously adopted, receiving over 20,000 votes, many of the Union men being within the rebel lines at the time.

Under the government thus adopted, and by means of the same test oath, a governor and legislature were elected by general ticket on the 3d of March last. The legislature assembled in April, and proceeded to inaugurate the governor, elect and to elect State officers, to establish a revenue, to provide for the election of members to Congress, and to legislate in general matters. Under authority conferred upon him, the new governor appointed a judiciary pro tempore, and reorganized the entire State by appointments. But one general election has been held, and that only for members of Congress, with what result will appear hereafter.

The convention of February, foreseeing the impossibility of carrying out the principle upon which they were acting, by keeping the political power of the State in loyal hands, if all those who had by acts of treason forfeited their right to participate in the State government, provided for a formal disfranchisement by conferring upon the first legislature the power to limit the elective franchise.

So far the legislation on this subject has been unsatisfactory and ineffectual. Indeed, many of the members are utterly unequal to the task, and, yielding to the influence and dreading the power of numbers, shrink from its performance. A suffrage law was passed at the spring session, the result of compromise, and doubtful in its terms, easily evaded, and practically defective. By means of repeated proclamations by the governor, telegraphic orders from the President, and the aid of the military, a partial execution only of the law was obtained. So defective was the execution of the law by the officers to whom it was intrusted, that the governor was constrained to declare the August election totally void in twenty-nine counties of the State. An attempt will be made at the present session to pass an amended suffrage law, but it is doubtful whether any effectual disfranchisement can pass, and still more doubtful whether, if passed, it can be executed even with the presence of the military. Certainly, such a law cannot be executed if the supervising power of the general government should be discontinued.

In short, your memorialists anticipate that, at the first general election, the entire civil and judicial power of the State must pass into the hands of those who have so long oppressed them, and made actual war upon them. The judicial election, which is the most important of all, must soon occur.

By a careful consideration of the passions, prejudices, and designs of those lately in rebellion, a correct idea of the course they will pursue, when once more installed into power, may be arrived at. Your memorialists are not driven to consult tourists nor correspondence for information. They are all citizens of the State; some of them are natives, and from official position are in daily intercourse or communication with all parts of the State, and with citizens of all parties and classes. They claim to speak not from hearsay or report, but as witnesses admissible in court.

The predominant feeling of those lately in rebellion is that of deep-seated hatred, amounting in many cases to a spirit of revenge towards the white Unionists of the State, and a haughty contempt for the negro, whom they cannot treat as a freeman. The hatred for the white loyalist is intensified by the accusation that he deserted the south in her extremity, and is, therefore, a traitor, and by the setting up a government of the minority. The spirit of revenge is called forth by the attempt to disfranchise them, and by the retaliatory acts of the returned Union soldiers for wrongs done them during the war. The negro is the Mordecai who constantly reminds them of their defeat, and of what they call a "just, but lost cause." And the sight of him in the enjoyment of freedom is a constant source of irritation.

The tourist would not be apt to detect the true state of the southern temper. Even the resident observer has to look beneath the surface of insincere protestations of loyalty. True, the traveller or visitor might observe a large number of daily rebel newspapers well sustained, while a single loyal paper is sustained with difficulty. He might discover that the rebel merchant or lawyer is full of business and growing rich, while the loyalist either fails, or is driven to pander and dissimulate. And he may find that the rebel chaplain preaches to overflowing houses, while the loyal minister is in truth a missionary in an unfriendly country. But he will hardly go into the social circle to learn that the Union man is not admitted into society, or into private families, to find that hatred of the Yankee and contempt for the government are inculcated by rebel ministers and teachers; nor will he visit the township election to learn that the bushwhacker and guerilla can defeat the most respectable Union man for constable or justice of the peace; or to the courts, to learn that the despised "Lincolnite" fails to get justice at the hands of a rebel jury, and that the putting of a negro on trial is equivalent to his conviction and sentence to the maximum penalty of the law. Yet these and many other manifestations betray to the resident observer the malignant temper of the majority of our people.

A party exists in the State, which is every day becoming more and more compact and powerful, which sympathizes with the men and principles of the rebellion. It commands every agency to operate upon public opinion. It has five well-sustained and ably-edited daily papers in Memphis, four in Nashville, one in Knoxville, and a weekly in each of the important villages. Their pardoned but talented and still popular leaders are with them. Hundreds of rebel ministers who glory in having led off in the rebellion, and who have been throughout the war the bloodiest-minded men in the south, are still in the confidence of their people. All these appliances acting in harmony mould public sentiment as they please, and command a party of over two-thirds of the white men of the State. Free from restrictions upon suffrage, they will probably cast 90,000 votes in the State.

It is a sad delusion and a dangerous mistake to suppose that this hatred of loyalty, contempt for the negro, and alienation from the government, are confined to the politicians, or leaders as they are termed, and that the common people have been all the time loyal. It is certainly true that a portion of the southern people went into the rebellion reluctantly, and that a few were actually forced into it. But it is equally true that nine-tenths of those who went in reluctantly came out the bitterest of rebels. The process of firing the southern heart and educating the southern mind for treason had been progressing for many years, and had reached all classes. Long before the war the common laborer had learned to curse the Yankees and abolitionists, and to talk about negro equality and his rights in the Territories. Filled with murderous hate, they have fought four years against their country. They have denounced and heard it denounced with every breath. They have suffered cold, hunger, and wounds in an effort to destroy it. They have slain its defenders, and seen their comrades fall in the same cause. The laws of human nature forbid the idea that they love their country. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether the capacity for patriotism is not extinguished in many of them.

Your memorialists regret to say that as yet the loyalists of East Tennessee, brave and noble as they are, have not kept pace with the spirit of the nation in extending civil rights to the negro, and consequently there exists a want of harmony among ourselves; but they do not doubt that that patriotic but rural people will soon take a position worthy their fame. But in any event, all legislation looking to the elevation of the freedman in a moral, civil, or political point of view must come from Congress, and not from the State legislature. It may be that the present body may pass some favorable laws—probably they will; but it is easy to see they will be swept away by the next general assembly.

Supposing the supervising power of the general government to be withdrawn from Tennessee, and assuming that to some extent at least the passions, prejudices, and resentments of the majority of the people will be reflected in their legislation, it is not difficult to anticipate her State policy and the character of her civil and judicial administration. It may be safely assumed—

1. That so far as possible in legislation, the bestowal of patronage, and the management of all public affairs, the late rebels will be the preferred class; and that all the acts of the rebel State government, including the removal and the destruction of the State banks and State treasury, the disarming and conscripting the people, and the impressment of their property, and all the acts of rebel officers, soldiers and guerillas, will be legalized. Those who have been robbed, wounded, and imprisoned will go unredressed, while those who have inflicted those injuries will be justified in law, as they now are in public sentiment.

2. As is even now the case in many localities, services rendered and wounds received in the confederate cause will be passports to preferment, while to have taken sides with the cause of the Union will be equal to a judgment of infamy, forever consigning the offender to obscurity and disgrace.

3. If the legislature does not vote thanks and medals to southern heroes, and unite with other southern States to pay the confederate debt, it will be from fear or policy, and not from want of sympathy or desire.

4. As far as possible, restrictions will be thrown around the freedom of the negro, and his elevation in the scale of being discountenanced, if not actually prohibited. He will be excluded from the courts, from common schools, and probably from all means of education, from business and privileged occupations, and, perhaps, from the acquisition of property.

Such, we apprehend, will be some of the results of well known laws of the public mind. And it requires but little speculation to anticipate still further and more ulterior results. It is very questionable whether East Tennessee will submit to a rebel government. Her people will not tamely succumb to those who have pursued them like bloodhounds for four years. If she does not resist by force, she will refuse her revenues, and scorn to send her representatives to take seats in a legislature composed of rebel officers and guerilla leaders. Union men will feel that they have lost and the rebels won, and that their martyrs have fallen in vain. Even now, in many localities they are crushed by the power of numbers, and actually afraid to speak like freemen.

Loyal emigrants will turn aside to more congenial parts, and the south will be left to herself, to resume her former rate of progress.

The negro will be forced to seek an asylum in other lands, or perhaps he will become a declining race, relapse into barbarism and disappear from the face of the earth; an effect confidently predicted, and, in fact, hoped for by secessionists.

Your memorialists do not presume to point out the means of preventing the direful results they have attempted to foreshadow. They simply ask protection. They pray that the government will not forsake them by withdrawing its direct agency in our affairs, thereby delivering them over to their tormentors.

Your memorialists will say, however, that they desire to be represented in Congress. The loyal people of Tennessee have not forfeited their civil rights by the misfortune of being surrounded by rebels. And if difficulties should occur hereafter, as is to be feared, in that event they desire to have a voice in the councils of the nation. But if our form of government is such that to admit our representatives to seats in Congress will compel the withdrawal of the supervising control of the national government over our internal affairs, thereby insuring the ascendancy of the rebel majority, your memorialists prefer, and they are sure the loyal people of the State would prefer, to live in a territorial condition, and even under a military government.

From the rebel yoke they pray to be saved. From such a fate we rely upon the power of the nation to rescue us. In behalf of ourselves, in behalf of the devoted loyalists of the State, of whatever color, and in behalf of our posterity, we appeal to that government we love and have served to save us and them from the power of those who have inflicted upon us every conceivable injury

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, FIRST DISTRICT, STATE OF TENNESSEE,

Memphis, Tennessee, January 30, 1866.

MY DEAR SIR: In consequence of the constant press of business in my office, I have procrastinated the delivery of the enclosed statement until this late day, for no other reason than that so much was on hand to be done that I did not like to set clerks at anything that was not strictly office-work. My only regret now is that I cannot give you so elaborate a statement of facts connected with the collection of over three millions of revenue (adding the stamp-sales to the enclosed) as I would wish, for want of time. You will recollect that our city was captured by the federal fleet on the 6th of June, 1862, previous to which large drafts were made on its inhabitants by the rebel leaders for the support of their army. When the federal flag was hoisted here it floated over a city of less than thirty thousand people, with no commerce, limited resources, and no trade from river or country. The government collected the larger portion of the rents during 1862 and 1863; besides, heavy taxes were paid on the demands of military commanders, and all shipments to and from the city were taxed by the Secretary of the Treasury; so that I think I am safe in saying that the internal revenue collected per the enclosed statement does not amount to more than one-third of the taxes paid by our people. The assessor commenced his labors some time in June, 1863, but he dated his assessments back to September, 1862,

I commenced collection about the 1st of November, 1863, at which time I had two annuals to collect for 1862 and 1863, and before these were closed up the annual for 1864 had been assessed and the special five per cent. tax on the incomes of 1863. You will remember that the civil courts were suspended during this time, and, in fact, have but recently been fully re-established, and this was the only office that did not exist by and depend on military sufferance and rule; yet I think I am safe in saying that our people have paid their revenues to the government collector as promptly and apparently as cheerfully as in any portion of the United States. I have never been obliged to levy upon any man's effects to secure his revenue due to the government, and though personally an austere man, I think the tax-collector is as much in the favor of the people at large as it is possible for any man to be in like circumstances anywhere in the land. I do not intend to convey the idea that the collector possesses qualities to make him popular notwithstanding his office, but that the people in this district, so far as they have been reached, respond as cheerfully to the demands of the government as they do in any State in the Union. A Boston merchant of some note lately said to me, "Tell me how your people pay their taxes, and I will myself judge of their loyalty." By this rule, I am inclined to the opinion that we should vie with Boston herself; but being a Bostonian originally, I don't like to make any comparisons.

Trusting that the enclosed will be of service to you, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. HOUGH, Collector.

Hon. JOHN W. LEFTWICH, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your inquiries, I have the honor to state:

I. That the loyal people of the State of Tennessee assembled in convention at Nashville on the 8th day of January, 1866, and proceeded to organize the government of the State. They adopted an amendment to the constitution abolishing slavery forever in the State. They adopted a schedule to the constitution, in which—

1. They repudiated the rebel debt contracted to carry on the war.

2. They declared the ordinance of secession void ab initio, and all the legislative acts passed by the legislature at its different sessions from the 6th of May, 1861, inoperative and void.

3. They provided that all the acts of Andrew Johnson as military governor, together with his appointments to office, valid and binding.

4. They provided for the election of a general assembly to be held on the 4th of March, 1866, as well as for the election of a governor.

5. They declared that the amendments so proposed should be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection on the 22d day of February, 1866.

II. On the 22d day of February, 1866, the amendment and schedule were submitted to the people, and adopted almost unanimously.

III. On the 4th day of March, 1866, the governor, William G. Brownlow, was elected, and the members of the legislature, gentlemen who for "unconditional Unionism" will compare favorably with the same number of gentlemen selected from any State in the Union.

IV. On the 3d day of April, 1866, the legislature met at Nashville, and in a few days thereafter the governor was inaugurated, and that civil government for the State has been in successful and peaceable operation ever since.

V. One of the first acts passed by the legislature was one ratifying the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. It passed unanimously.

VI. The legislature enacted a franchise law, disfranchising all rebels for the space of five years who had not participated in either one of the last elections, and by which a large number of the qualified voters were prohibited, because of their treason, from participation in the subsequent elections.

VII. The legislature provided for the congressional elections by dividing the State into eight congressional districts, and by electing two senators. Since that time the civil government of the State, under its present loyal organization, has been in uninterrupted and successful operation all over the State. No obstacles have been put in the way. I have in my possession, and which I will produce for the inspection of the committee, if desired, printed copies of the proceedings of the convention of January 8, 1865, as well as the acts and resolutions of the April session of the general assembly.

VIII. The election for Congress was held on the first Thursday in August, 1865, the regular day, and everything passed off harmoniously and quietly. This result was extremely gratifying to the loyal men of the State. The members elected are known to have been loyal to the government, and have all complied with the law of the land.

IX. I can say fearlessly, from an intimate personal acquaintance with the people of the fourth congressional district, composed of the counties of Rutherford, Cannon, Coffey, Franklin, Lincoln, Giles, Marshal, and Bedford, and which I have the honor to claim to represent, and where there are no federal soldiers, and have not been any, except in Rutherford county, since the 1st of July, 1865, that peace and quiet and complete obedience to law prevail. No difficulties of any kind; law and order are everywhere observed. The United States assessors and collectors visit every part of the district unguarded and alone; are promptly paid and kindly treated. The United States marshal needs no military force to enable him to do his duty. The white men and the freedmen live harmoniously together. Contracts are made between them, liberal, just, and satisfactory, and are faithfully performed by both parties. No complaints are being made. All recognize the government of the United States as the supreme law of the land. They most earnestly desire to be once more fully restored to the benefits of its protection, so that they can once more feel that they are American citizens.

I fully believe that the United States troops might be withdrawn any day, and the present State government would be protected and guarded until the expiration of its term without molestation or danger. It seems to me that the people feel the necessity of peace and law and order, and they intend to have it.

The legislature has passed all laws necessary for the protection of the freedmen, and there is but one single case in which the punishment of the white man differs from that of the freedman, and that is in the case of rape, or assault with intent to commit rape, on the person of a white woman.

The recognition of the present State government by the Congress of the United States, the admission of its senators and representatives, in the full restoration of the State to an equality with the other States in the government, will give confidence and happiness to those citizens of the State who, through all the horrors of this cruel and unjust rebellion, have maintained their integrity to the national flag, and who loved their country too well to betray it into the hands of traitors.

If Congress will recognize us as worthy of being admitted to our seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, thus giving to us the moral weight of their action, we can, without doubt, preserve and protect the loyal people of the State. If, on the contrary, we are treated as if we were rebels, as if we had sinned, when we have not, then, of course, our influence is gone, and we can no longer hope to be able to control the political destinies of the State.

Respectfully,

— COOPER.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1866.

To the honorable gentlemen of the "Reconstruction Committee:"

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with suggestions from the Hon. Senator Grimes, I respectfully submit these my opinions, with the reasons therefor, in relation to the loyalty and present feelings of the people whom I have the honor to represent.

Since the first occupation of Memphis by the national forces, in June, 1862, no spirit of discontent or insubordination has ever manifested itself; and though we have, in addition to the usual taxes, been compelled most of the time to pay from three to five per cent. tax on all merchandise shipped to Memphis, and twenty-five per cent. and four cents per pound on all cotton shipped from Memphis, and two dollars per bale military tax, and other military taxes ad infinitum—amounting, in the aggregate, to millions of dollars—it has been promptly paid without complaint.

Our "internal revenue tax collector" now proudly asserts that his collections have been made with a promptness above the average of northern cities, and that the disgraceful attempts to defraud the government, so prevalent elsewhere, are comparatively unknown in Memphis.

When our army was needed actively on other fields, and that portion remaining at Memphis was inadequate to protect the immense army stores there collected, our entire able-bodied male population, amounting to many thousands, was organized, armed, and equipped for active militia duty; many having to remain on duty all the time, and all compelled to suspend business for the purpose of drilling from one to two days in each week; and such was their conduct on several occasions of threatened attack, as to call forth the congratulatory orders of the commanding generals, to one of whom, the "Hon. R. P. Buckland," I respectfully refer.

We also furnished our quota in the last draft.

The crops of 1863, '64, and '65, in "West Tennessee," were not cultivated by involuntary servitude, but by compensated labor; and the result of the three years' experience is, that our colored population have learned the important lesson that a good and trusty laborer will command better wages than a bad one; and our white population, who own the land, have learned the equally important lesson that he who pays wages promptly, and fairly, and otherwise honestly redeems his obligations to the employé, will surely procure the best and most reliable laborers.

The prejudice that did at one time exist against the negroes as freedmen remaining in our State has been most effectually dispelled by a remembrance of their good qualities during the war; and, by self-interest, the most potent of all arguments, reminding us that the profitable cultivation of our rich and productive lands requires twice the number of laborers now there.

In view of this desire to retain these laborers in our State, I believe there is no disposition on the part of our citizens to impose illiberal terms on those they employ; and I know they have not the ability, to do so, as the demand for labor is so much in excess of the supply as to give all the advantage to the employé.

The only relic of slavery now seen in our midst is the frequent practice, by agents of the "Freedmen's Bureau," (generally understood to be for a consideration,) of compelling negroes to make unwilling contracts with parties with whom they do not desire to live.

I am fully persuaded that, if left to a vote of the former slave-owners of my district, they would now vote by a large majority against assuming the moral responsibility of re-enslaving the negroes.

I am sure that the colored laborers of this district will make more money this year than any equal number of white laborers in States north of the cotton producing region.

During my contest for my present position I travelled on horseback, alone much of the time, through the entire district; and though my Union sentiments, already notorious, were plainly and boldly proclaimed day after day, I did not hear a rude or impolite expression, though the country was full of returned rebel soldiers, who might be expected to have been smarting under a "franchise law" that was odious even to Union men.

I had four opponents, each trying to prove himself a better Union man than the rest, and all surpassing me in political ability, yet I was elected by a handsome majority, only because I was able to show a more consistent Union record than either.

One other opponent issued a circular claiming votes as an original sympathizer with the rebellion, but met such poor encouragement that he withdrew without completing the contest.

During December, hearing many reports in Washington prejudicial to the loyalty and good conduct of my constituents, I determined to take no hearsay, but go home and see for myself if such rumors had any foundation in fact. The result was, I found my people contented, hopeful, industrious, and happy, considering this as their only government, with no willingness to injure it, but an earnest desire to make it better and stronger than ever.

I heard no man of influence oppose allowing the negroes to testify in our courts, and to own and bequeath property, &c.

On the 28th of December two members to the State legislature were elected in Memphis and Shelby county, both of whom favored the above movement, and have since succeeded in making it the law of the State.

To learn the condition of a portion of my district to which I could not go, I wrote to a friend, (an appointee under Governor Brownlow, whom I knew to be loyal and truthful, and possessed of unusual facilities for knowing the real feelings of the people,) telling him of the reports coming to Washington, and asking if such were the facts.

I respectfully annex his reply as part of this statement.

In conversation with the deputy United States marshal, who had been through West Tennessee on official business, of such an unpopular nature as to induce him to have a military escort, he said, "I was met in such a friendly manner and treated with such cordial hospitality, that I was ashamed of having an escort, and made it convenient to be away from them most of the time."

I have just received a letter from "J. M. Hill, esq.," to whom every military commander at Memphis has awarded the first position in point of loyalty and reliability, and possessing general information, in which he takes occasion to say, "We need no troops at Memphis; but if the government desires to retain a few here, one company of white regulars would be an abundance."

From personal knowledge in many instances, and reliable information in others, I am able to say that most of the reports coming to Washington against the loyalty and good conduct of Tennesseans come from those who have been defeated for office, or who now hold positions by appointment, and know that their personal unpopularity will prevent them from retaining it when left to the people; and as our county elections ought legally to be held in March, it is the desire of this class to make excusable the filling of these positions by appointment instead of the ballot.

There are, no doubt, occasional local disturbances in our State, (that our civil officers are entirely able to subdue, however,) but these all grow out of old personal animosities engendered during the war, and not arising from any rebellious spirit towards the general government.

These disturbances are much less frequent in my part of the State than elsewhere, owing to the fact that the army maintained uninterrupted control there after its first occupation.

Instead of there existing an animosity against consistent Union men who have no used their influence to the unfair injury of those who have disagreed with them in politics, they are really the most popular men in the country; as it is through their influence, mainly, that all expect finally to be reinstated in the enjoyment of all their lost privileges and blessings.

It is the opinion of myself, as well as of most of the best informed with whom I have talked, (among them our lamented President Lincoln,) that, notwithstanding so many of our people were subsequently, by various influences, forced into the rebellion, the election in Tennessee in February, 1861, was, and is, the true criterion of the loyalty of our State; at which we gave a majority, as I remember, of 65,000 against "separation," (thought to be a more palatable term than "secession,") and nearly that number against even calling a convention to discuss it.

When Mr. Johnson assumed the presidential chair he was more odious to the southern people and more feared by them than any man now in the north; yet he is now by these same people as universally beloved and honored, just in return for evidencing a kind and forgiving spirit.

Like causes produce like results; and it is now in the power of the Congress of the United States to produce in the feelings of the masses of the southern people this same favorable change towards them.

Every kind word uttered here goes as a healing balm to the wounded spirit of our people, and is as welcome as the olive branch brought by the returning dove to the ark.

I have said much more than I intended. The assertions made are susceptible of proof. The opinions expressed are well-matured convictions, based on a thorough acquaintance with the facts from which they are deduced.

I regret that I cannot close without expressing the belief that the treatment our people are now receiving is well calculated to produce that state of feeling now falsely said to exist, though I have no fear of such a result in my immediate district, as such is the desire, and so favorable the opportunity, to mend their ruined fortunes, that they now look with much more interest to the fluctuations of the cotton market than to the proceedings of Congress, believing, correctly, that there is no surer way to obtain the good opinion of others than by industriously attending to their own business.

Hoping that nothing I have said will have an influence to secure my admission to a seat in Congress until my people can be trusted as I know they deserve to be,

I have the honor, gentlemen, to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN W. LEFTWICH,

Eighth District, Tennessee.

The undersigned beg leave, in compliance with the request of the congressional Committee on Reconstruction, to submit the following in relation to the present State government of Tennessee:

1. The government was organized by a convention of the loyal citizens January 8, 1865, ratified by popular vote February 22, 1865; governor and legislature elected March 4, 1865; inducted into office April 3, 1865. So that the government has been in practical operation nearly ten months.

2. When the organization began, the rebel army under Hood had just been defeated and routed before Nashville; the hostile forces were still in the field; guerillas overran some portions of the State; our Union soldiers were, some of them, in service on the Atlantic seaboard. There was no mail communication; heavy rains had swollen our numerous streams; so that, in many places, the single ballot-box for a whole county was inaccessible, and the vote failed to develop the whole loyal strength. Yet it is believed, and confidently asserted, that the result met the entire approval of every loyal citizen, and the acquiescence of many who had been disloyal.

3. From the meeting of the legislature, the 3d of April, 1865, and the induction into office of the governor, the government, so organized, has had entire and unresisted control of the whole State, in every department of administration, executive, legislative, and judicial, including the conservation of the public peace. The legislature continued in session until into June; adjourned to the 1st of October; again assembled, and is still in session. The governor and other executive officers have discharged the functions usual to their respective offices. The courts of every grade, up to that of last resort, the supreme court, have held their regular terms all over the State, and have been open for the hearing of all pleas, civil and criminal.

4. The first act of the legislature, by unanimous vote, ratified the recent amendment of the national Constitution in accordance with an amendment of similar import made to the State constitution. The election of senators followed, and legislative provision for the election of members of Congress. A law of franchise was passed, adding one qualification to the elector, additional to the pre-existing loyalty, and providing for the registration of the voters.

5. The election was held at the usual time in August, and persons elected whose loyalty has been unequivocal, and will abide the test of the official oath. The number of votes cast was sixty-one thousand nine hundred and seventy, not far from the number usually cast by each of the two parties into which the State was almost equally divided before the war. The governor, deeming it his duty, under the act of Congress of 3d March, 1863, to certify whether the election was regularly held according to the laws of the State, and also to be informed as to the practical working of the late registry laws, instituted an inquiry, and rejected the votes of several of the counties for informality and a failure to comply with the recent law, on the part of officers intrusted with the novel duty of registration.

At this election there was no military force present anywhere at the ballot-box; nor was there, so far as known, the slightest disturbance or disorder. A military force has remained in the State, under Major General Thomas, to support and sustain the civil government. One prominent arrest was made on the charge of sedition and scurrilous libel against the President of the United States; but in general the military has been felt only in the moral effect of its presence as a power which the civil authority might at any time invoke.

6. No general election has since been held in the State. On the first Saturday of March next elections will be held for sheriffs and other county officers in the several counties of the State.

7. The general legislation so far has looked to the restoration of our State credit and the re-establishment of our financial prosperity. A revenue system, (the public debt increased twenty-five per cent. by the accumulation of interest during the war, the rebel debt having been repudiated by the people,) the banks, the railroads, the public schools, and the squandered school fund, the eleemosynary institutions, have received, as they demanded, prime attention. It is not strange that the novelty and importance of the questions arising in such connexion should occasion honest, even obstinate, diversity of opinion.

8. The two subjects, however, occasioning the most declared and unyielding difference, are the rebels and the freedmen. It becomes necessary in various ways to define their respective privileges, both having been to a certain extent outlawed—the former by reason of their conduct, the latter by reason of their slavery. What some insist upon as a wise and politic liberality towards the rebels is branded by others as copperheadism, if not downright treason. What some regard as but sheer justice to the freedmen, and a necessary safeguard against the reassertion of the rebel sentiment, is denounced by others as radicalism. This division is aggravated and intensified by an admixture of prejudice and interested motive. The so-called radical element prevails in the present organization of the government. Public sentiment, as represented by the press, possibly, if expressed by the voice of the entire population, irrespective of antecedent relations, favors the self-styled conservative element.

9. Whether, upon a submission to the ballot-box, the government would be continued in the same hands, or those of men with similar views, is necessarily matter of speculation and conjecture. Such a submission will occur in August, 1867. Much will depend upon the wisdom, good conduct, and practical success of the State administration meanwhile; much upon the turn of affairs throughout the country, and much upon the issues, personal and other, that happen to be submitted to the people, as friends of the national government, who have stood close to it, defending its policy and maintaining its honor all the way through the recent conflict. We see no cause for discouragement, provided that the government will stand by us and give us the moral effect of its support. If, on the other hand, we are unrecognized and unsustained; if we are practically declared usurpers, and our effort at restoring our deserted and inanimate State government a usurpation, then we are necessarily overborne and swept away.

10. The unenlightened and narrow-minded rebel sentiment is bitterer and more rancorous possibly than during the war, under the humiliation of defeat and disgrace. It is expressed less towards the federal than to the State government, and is especially strong towards persons of northern origin, those Union men who took an active part for the government against the rebellion, and the freedmen. The intelligent rebels, on the other hand, see and accept the situation, and endeavor to make the best of it. Their political aspirations would naturally tend to the control first of local affairs, then of the State, and lastly of the national government. They hope for much from a division between the executive and legislative powers.

11. The situation of the freedmen is much more satisfactory to themselves, however it may appear to others, than when in slavery. There is suffering, oppression, injustice, wrong. In the economy of society the world over, poverty, ignorance, and weakness entail inevitable hardships. The case of the freedman is no exception. In addition, the prejudice of race is a burden. His freedom is an idea too proximate to the calamitous overthrow of the rebellion to be welcomed by those who took part in that foolish and iniquitous enterprise; while the loyal Union man has too long felt his progress in life obstructed by him as a slave to relish his presence even in freedom, and his labor no longer organized by the intelligence and capital of his master.

The pre-existing laws applicable to free persons of color were at once applied to the freedmen. These allowed him nearly all the civil rights accorded to white persons, except to bear testimony in courts against white persons, and to peddle, and to traffic in spirituous liquors. It subjected him to the same criminal code, except in some offences against white females and in the measure of punishment. He was accorded no political rights, and was subjected to various political disabilities. He has been admitted to testify as a white person. It is not known that he has received any political enfranchisement.

12. If it be urged that our Union element, in the beginning, through weakness and want of support, succumbed to rebellion; that even now, if left unsupported and alone, it may once more be overborne; that the sharp animosities of the war do not entirely subside with the cessation of arms, we respectfully submit that these are considerations imperative why the national authority should rally to us and sustain our effort of self-government by its moral influence, and, if need be, by the assertion of its physical power.

JOSEPH S. FOWLER.
W. B. STOKES.
HORACE MAYNARD.

TESTIMONY.

WASHINGTON, January 25, 1866.

Brevet Major General Edward Hatch sworn and examined:

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Where is your residence, and how have you been employed for the last five years?

Answer. My residence is in Muscatine, Iowa; prior to the war I was engaged in the lumber business; I entered the military service of the United States in 1861, and have been through the various grades in the army to that of brevet major general of volunteers.

Question. Have you, during the time you have been in the military service of the United States, been stationed in the State of Tennessee, or been connected with the military operations in that State?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Were you so employed during any portion of the year 1865; and if so, during what portion of that year?

Answer. The troops under my command were on the confines of the State of Tennessee the first of the year, and I occupied a portion of West Tennessee, having command of a division of cavalry and a post. During September, October, and November, I was stationed at Knoxville, Tennessee, as chief of cavalry of that department.

Question. How recently have you been in Tennessee?

Answer. I left in December last.

Question. During the time you were in that State were you much among the people of the State; and do you regard yourself as familiar with the sentiments of the people there?

Answer. Yes, sir; in portions of the State. I was often at Nashville, and also in other parts of the State a great deal.

Question. What conclusions did you reach as to the sentiments of the people of that State, so far as loyalty to the federal government is concerned?

Answer. Leaving the people of East Tennessee out of consideration, I should think that the people of the balance of the State were largely opposed to the general government; that is, that there was no good feeling toward the government. There is very little good feeling towards the United States government, except in East Tennessee.

Question. You regard the public sentiment in East Tennessee as, in the main, loyal?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And do I understand you to mean that in Middle and West Tennessee public sentiment is, in the main, disloyal?

Answer. Yes, sir; West Tennessee I consider as disloyal as Mississippi.

Question. Is it your opinion that the troops of the United States could safely be withdrawn from any portion of Tennessee?

Answer. Do you mean with safety to the people of the State?

Question. Yes, safety to the Union people of the State.

Answer. They could be safely withdrawn from East Tennessee, for there the people could protect themselves. That is the only portion of the State from which they could be withdrawn in safety.

Question. What, in your opinion, would be the condition of affairs in Middle and West Tennessee, should our military force be withdrawn from those portions of the State?

Answer. The loyal portion of the people would be subject to certain ostracism which would drive them out of the country. They would legislate against them in every way—at least, I have often heard them openly say so.

Question. Do I understand you to say that the disloyal people there say that they would legislate against the loyal white people?

Answer. Yes, sir; they say that those people who opposed them in this war shall not hold office there; that is, that they will not vote for any of them, and that all civil offices shall be held by their own men. That is the way they have always talked to me.

Question. Is anything else threatened besides depriving them of office?

Answer. They say the two people cannot live together. There is no more popular man in West Tennessee to-day than the late rebel General Forrest. The quartermaster of my old regiment is partner with Forrest on a plantation; he said he took the plantation because Forrest is popular, and will take care of him and his interests.

Question. Is this feeling of hostility towards the federal government in Middle and West Tennessee quite general?

Answer. I think it is. Perhaps much of the hostility towards the government has accrued from the personal animosities of the people; they have been fighting among themselves for four or five years, and now have an intense hatred for each other, and that feeling, I think, has extended to the government in some measure. There are some men in the State—men of large views and landholders—who are willing to accept the state of affairs as it is, and to do almost anything in order to farm their lands; they wish to retain their old labor, but they constitute a very small portion of the people.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. How long were you stationed in Tennessee?

Answer. I had troops in West Tennessee, and was at Eastport, just on the confines of the State.

Question. On the border of Mississippi?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was at that post from January until July, 1865.

Question. State whether the rest of your intercourse with the citizens of Tennessee was not of a rather cursory nature, when the army was passing from point to point.

Answer. No, sir; for I have done a great deal of business for them and been among them a great deal. I have been in Tennessee more or less since 1862.

Question. Did you know Colonel Hobson, of Kentucky, a very young man, who was with the army at Knoxville?

Answer. I may have seen him, but I am not personally acquainted with him.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. I understand you to say that you have been in Tennessee more or less for the last three or four years?

Answer. Yes, sir; since 1862.

Question. And most of that time in that State?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have been stationed at Memphis, Lagrange, Collierville, and Eastport. I was stationed at Lagrange in the summer of 1863. I know West and Middle Tennessee better than my own State; that is, the roads and thoroughfares.

Question. While travelling about in Tennessee were you always known as an officer of the federal army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. You did not always wear the insignia of your office and rank?

Answer. No, sir; not all the time.

Question. Were communications made to you as freely when you wore the insignia of your office as when you did not; that is, communications showing the sentiments entertained by the people towards the government and towards each other?

Answer. No, sir; not always. Sometimes people would speak in a very braggadocio way towards officers. As I have already said, men of large views, those who understand the question and admit the state of affairs as it is now, those men are willing to do anything to sustain the government; but they are in a very small minority, and cannot control these fellows. There is everywhere an intense hostility towards the negro, and I suppose there always will be in that State.

Question. What is the condition of the freedmen in the State of Tennessee?

Answer. They can find employment now; but they have the opposition of the poor whites, or of the men who own very little property, and that is a very intense opposition.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. A great many of the original owners of the slaves desire to employ their old slaves?

Answer. Yes, sir; the reasonable men, the men of education, understand this question.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Is there any public sentiment there in any instance to prevent the original owners from employing their former servants?

Answer. Where the original owner has been a liberal, good-hearted man, the negro is inclined to work for him cheerfully; but if he has been a severe master they are afraid of him. Some of the negroes have the idea that they may be run off further south, to Mexico or Cuba, into slavery. The negro has strong local attachments, and if his former master was a generous, good man, his former servants will work for him cheaper than for any one else. But there are not very many liberal men; they worked their servants very hard on their plantations.

Question. What is the general condition of the freedmen in Tennessee, so far as your observation extends?

Answer. The negro is perfectly willing to work, but he wants a guarantee that he will be secured in his rights under his contract. I have always found them willing to work, since the close of the war, at any rate; but they want their contracts guaranteed to them. They desire to have the government guarantee them for them, and take care of them in that way. They are willing to work. But the negro knows that without his rights are secured, and his life and property secured, he is not safe from the poor whites. He understands their antipathies towards him as well as any one does.

We have always issued less rations to the negroes there than we have to the poor whites. We did not issue one-tenth the rations to the negroes that we did to the poor whites.

The men there who dislike the present state of things do not like to give up the negro. They think that by some kind of legislation they can establish a kind of peonage; not absolute slavery, but that they can enact such laws as will enable them to manage the negro as they please—to fix the prices to be paid for his labor. That is a very general idea among that class of men. But those men of broad views who know that labor will find its level, are in favor of hiring the negro and paying him fairly. But they are in the minority.

Question. Do you know anything about the security of the negro's life in Tennessee?

Answer. You cannot call his life secure there. They are liable to be shot by the poor whites; and no doubt it is done every day.

Question. What do you mean by "poor whites?"

Answer. Men on both sides who have been in the army and are not willing to work, and wish to get along the best way they can.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. Did you or not find among the servants a great disposition to aggregate together, a desire to work together, and a dislike to being separated?

Answer. Yes, sir; as I said before, the local attachment of the negro is great. I think the negro is anxious to accumulate property. I think that the people down there are mistaken in supposing that the negro does not desire to accumulate property. In my opinion the negro does not desire governing; he wants to be acknowledged as a part of the population. Say to him what his labor is really worth and pay him for it, and you will have no trouble with him.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. They need government for their protection?

Answer. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1866.

Major General George H. Thomas sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Where are you stationed at present, and what are the duties which you now have to perform?

Answer. I am in command of the military division of the Tennessee; my headquarters are at Nashville, Tennessee.

Question. Of how many States is your division composed?

Answer. The division is composed of the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi.

Question. How many troops are now under your command in the State of Tennessee?

Answer. I cannot state precisely, but I think about six thousand; principally required to take care of public property.

Question. Where are they stationed for the most part?

Answer. At Nashville, Chattanooga, and Memphis.

Question. So far as your knowledge and observation extend, what is the condition of the popular sentiment in the State of Tennessee, so far as it relates to the federal government and the rights of the Union people, and of the freedmen?

Answer. I have studied the condition of affairs in Tennessee pretty carefully, and have had practical demonstration of the condition of affairs there; having, in addition to the information I have derived from personal observation, such information as I have received from other sources. The Union sentiment in Tennessee, of course, has been sufficient to place the State in its present favorable condition towards the government, and, if protected and encouraged by the presence of a small Union force, it will gain the complete ascendancy in the State in the course of a year or two. I do not think it would be safe at this time to remove the national troops from Tennessee, or to withdraw martial law, or to restore the writ of habeas corpus to its full extent.

Question. What is the condition of East Tennessee, as compared with that of Middle and West Tennessee?

Answer. East Tennessee is perfectly safe, because the Union element predominates there very largely. Middle Tennessee is disturbed by personal animosities and hatreds, much more than it is by the disloyalty of persons towards the government of the United States. Those personal animosities would break out and overawe the civil authorities, but for the presence there of the troops of the United States. In West Tennessee these personal animosities exist even more strongly than they do in Middle Tennessee, and there is less loyalty in West Tennessee than there is in Middle Tennessee. But the people of Tennessee desire very much, it is their strongest desire, to be back in the government of the United States. Still, while they wish to enjoy the rights of citizenship, they are not friendly towards Union men, particularly men from Tennessee who have been in the Union army. They are more unfriendly to Union men, natives of the State of Tennessee, or of the south, who have been in the Union army, than they are to men of northern birth.

Question. What is the condition of the Union people in West Tennessee?

Answer. The Union people of West Tennessee are in a minority; but public sentiment there is gradually approaching a good loyal standard.

Question. Do you think there is an improvement going on generally in the sentiment of the State?

Answer. Yes, sir. I can probably express my idea better in this way: I think the people of Tennessee will go on improving in their Union sentiment, provided they are prevented from running to extremes against their personal enemies in the Union ranks, and the presence of troops there is necessary simply to prevent them from committing excesses and being led astray in their private animosities.

Question. You believe, then, that it would be dangerous either to remove the national troops, or to restore the writ of habeas corpus, or to abolish martial law in Tennessee?

Answer. I do, for the present.

Question. What is the condition of the freedmen in Tennessee?

Answer. The condition of the freedmen in Tennessee is very favorable at this time. A very great improvement has taken place in their condition; and if the affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau can be administered for another year in the way they have been administered for the last six months, mutual confidence would be restored between the whites and the blacks; and I am very much in hopes that the freedmen could then be left to the protection of the civil authorities of the State.

Question. Then the administration of the Freedmen's Bureau has met with your approval?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Under General Fisk?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do the freedmen generally find employment in Tennessee?

Answer. I do not know of any difficulty in their finding employment.

Question. And at fair wages?

Answer. Yes, sir; and there is a general understanding among the negroes and among the whites that each is to comply with his part of the contract, so that there is no difficulty and no dissatisfaction.

Question. Has General Fisk the charge of the freedmen in the whole of the State of Tennessee?

Answer. Yes, sir; and he has charge of the freedmen in the State of Kentucky, in addition.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. You say you believe that there is a gradual improvement going on in Tennessee as to loyalty?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Will you give your opinion as to whether the admission into Congress of the representatives from Tennessee would tend to encourage the loyal people of Tennessee, and strengthen the feeling of loyalty in that State?

Answer. I think it would very much. It would not only encourage the loyal people to exert themselves, but it would encourage the rebels to return to their loyalty, because they would see that their chances and hopes for another outbreak were passing away from them. If you will permit me to give additional reasons why I think the delegation from Tennessee should be admitted I will do so.

Question. Certainly; state any reasons you may desire to state.

Answer. I think the delegation from the State of Tennessee should be admitted into Congress for the reason that that State, of her own accord, has complied with every instruction of the President, and has done all that it was believed it would be necessary for her to do in order to gain admission into Congress. All that they have done of their own accord in Tennessee. They have repudiated the rebel debt; they have abolished slavery, and also adopted the constitutional amendment upon that subject; they have passed a franchise law prohibiting from voting every man who has been engaged in the rebellion; and I believe they have now passed a bill giving the negro the right to testify in the courts; and all the members elected to Congress can take the test oath, both senators and representatives; and if their representatives shall be admitted into Congress it will be a precedent for all the southern States; they can see at once the reasons why the Tennessee members are admitted, and that if they expect their members to be admitted they must do as she has done.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. You have answered the inquiry of Mr. Grider in regard to the propriety of admitting into Congress the delegation from Tennessee; state, if you please, whether, if her delegation should be admitted into Congress, it would be safe for martial law to be then abrogated in the State of Tennessee.

Answer. I would not abrogate it just yet.

Question. Would you recommend the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau in that State?

Answer. Not yet.

Question. Even if the Tennessee delegation should be admitted into Congress?

Answer. No, sir; I would admit the delegation from Tennessee simply to encourage the people of Tennessee to return to their loyalty, and also as an example for the other southern States, because you have it in your power to show them plainly and clearly why they are admitted at once and the rest are not; that is, because none of the other States have complied with the same conditions that the people of Tennessee have complied with.

Question. You also stated as a reason why, in your opinion, the State of Tennessee ought to be represented in Congress, that, in case that was done, the rebel people there would abandon their hopes of another outbreak. Have you any reason to believe that they still entertain the opinion, or that any considerable portion of them do, that there may be another outbreak?

Answer. I have received communications from various persons in the south that there was an understanding among the rebels, and perhaps organizations formed or forming, for the purpose of gaining as many advantages for themselves as possible; and I have heard it also intimated that these men are very anxious and would do all in their power to involve the United States in a foreign war, so that, if a favorable opportunity should offer, they might turn against the government of the United States again. I do not think they will ever again attempt an outbreak on their own account, because they all admit that they had a fair trial in the late rebellion and got thoroughly worsted. There is no doubt but what there is a universal disposition among the rebels in the south to embarrass the government in its administration, if they can, so as to gain as many advantages for themselves as possible.

Question. In what could those advantages consist, in breaking up the government?

Answer. They wish to be recognized as citizens of the United States, with the same rights that they had before the war.

Question. How can they do that—by involving us in a war with England or France, in which they would take part against us?

Answer. In that event their desire is to re-establish the southern confederacy. They have not yet given up their desire for a separate government, and if they have an opportunity to strike for it again they will do so.

Question. Does the intelligence in regard to these organizations reach you from such authentic sources as to command your belief of their existence?

Answer. Yes, sir; it comes from very reliable men.

Question. What is the industrial condition of the people of Tennessee? Are they taking steps to put in crops and employ such labor as is within their reach?

Answer. The industrial condition of the State has improved so much that by the end of this year I think the people will be more interested in their private operations and pursuits than they will in political affairs, and be very much quieted down. They are very much encouraged now, and almost every plantation in the State is being put in operation again. The Union people of Tennessee, particularly, wish to be quiet.

Question. How about the rebels?

Answer. A great many of the rebels are going to work, quietly, to cultivate their farms. A great many of them say that they failed in their attempt to gain their independence of the United States, and that they now wish to be quiet citizens of the country, and are going to turn their attention to farming again.

GEO. H. THOMAS,

Major General United States Army.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1866.

Brevet Major General Clinton B. Fisk sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. What is your present rank, and what is the duty you now have to perform?

Answer. I am brevet major general of the United States volunteers and assistant commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands, for the States of Kentucky and Tennessee.

Question. How long have you been employed in that capacity?

Answer. About eight months.

Question. How many freedmen have you under your charge?

Answer. About 500,000, according to census of 1860. During the greater portion of the eight months I have been assistant commissioner, northern Alabama has been attached to my district.

Question. You have about half a million of freedmen under your charge now?

Answer. Yes, sir; for the two States of Kentucky and Tennessee.

Question. What is the condition of those freedmen, especially in the State of Tennessee?

Answer. The great mass of the freedmen in the State of Tennessee are in what might be called a good condition, and they are constantly improving in their condition, both as to industry and elevation. They need the protection of the government very much in the State of Tennessee.

Question. Why do they need it?

Answer. On account of the opposition of the people to freedmen and justice to the negro.

Question. Is that sentiment of opposition to the freedmen general through the State?

Answer. It is not.

Question. To what parts of the State, or what classes of people, is it confined?

Answer. Tennessee is peculiar. In no other State do you find the same sort of opposition as in Tennessee. My duties, within the last eight months, have called me through the five States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi. I made an inspection tour through the three States below Tennessee, in addition to my own regular duties. It is a melancholy fact that among the bitterest opponents of the negro in Tennessee are the intensely radical loyalists of the mountain district—the men who have been in our armies. Take East Tennessee, for instance. The great opposition to the measure in the Tennessee legislature, giving the negro the right to testify and an equality before the law, has come from that section, chiefly. In Middle Tennessee and in West Tennessee the largest and the wealthiest planters of the old slaveholding population have more cordially co-operated with me in my duties than the people of East Tennessee.

Question. In what way does their opposition manifest itself?

Answer. In a desire that he should be entirely removed from the State; opposing his education, and right to justice before the law.

Question. Do the freedmen manifest a disposition to be industrious and secure a livelihood for themselves?

Answer. They do, and to elevate themselves. They literally hunger and thirst for knowledge.

Question. What proportion of them are able to find employment?

Answer. All of them in Tennessee who can do any work. I could furnish employers for 25,000 more laborers from my district than I have, such is the demand for labor in the valley of the Mississippi. During the first twenty days of this month we made contracts at the Memphis agency of the Freedmen's Bureau covering 7,280 persons, and at good remunerative wages.

Question. Do the freedmen recognize you and your bureau as a means of protection to them?

Answer. They do.

Question. And they have confidence in your administration of the bureau?

Answer. They appear to have the fullest confidence, as also in the military administration of that division. The Freedmen's Bureau has received the most hearty and cordial co-operation of General Thomas, the commandant of that division. The freedman has no better friend in the country than Major General George H. Thomas.

I do not want to be understood as saying that in Middle and West Tennessee there is no opposition to the freedmen, for there is. There are slaveholders and returned rebel soldiers there who persecute them bitterly, and pursue them with vengeance, and treat them with brutality, and burn down their dwellings and school-houses. But it is not the rule; such conduct is exceptional. It may not be best for me to speak of Kentucky in this connection. But comparing the two States, I can say that the freedmen in Tennessee are treated with more favor than they are in Kentucky. There is more brutality to negroes, and more wicked, malicious persecution of loyalists in the State of Kentucky to-day than in the State of Tennessee. I have travelled over both States and observed carefully. I have travelled incog. in portions of those States I have mentioned, going as a Missourian, talking with the people on their plantations, and the negroes in their quarters, reaching the real sentiment of the people in that way. The opposition to the freedmen in Kentucky, in many localities, is very great—in fact, to freedom itself.

Question. How large is the pecuniary support that you are obliged to extend to the freedmen in Tennessee?

Answer. I am not to-day issuing a single ration to freedmen in Tennessee, except to about one hundred orphan children, and thirty old people at Memphis, and about sixty orphan children and twenty-five old people at Nashville—that is all.

Question. Do you issue rations to white people in Tennessee?

Answer. During the last year the rations issued to white people in Tennessee have been much in excess of those issued to freedmen. When I took charge of my district the government was feeding 25,000 people; in round numbers, about 17,500 white persons, and 7,500 black. The month preceding the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau, for rations alone for that class of people, the sum of $97,000. My first efforts were to reduce the number of these beneficiaries of the government; to withhold the rations, and make the people self-supporting as far as possible; and in the course of four months, I reduced the monthly expenses from $97,000 to $5,000; saving within that time, on subsistence, ten times as much money as the whole Freedmen's Bureau cost in the entire district, including all salaries paid to officers and agents for the government.

Question. Is the military support of the government required now in the State of Tennessee in aid of your bureau?

Answer. It is.

Question. Do you believe the affairs of the bureau could be safely administered there without the military support of the government?

Answer. I do not. My subordinates are chiefly civilians. I select the best man for the position I can find in a county. For instance, I select the county judge at the county-seat, and give him the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau in that county, and under our regulations and instructions he administers our affairs. If he needs it, he requests any district or post commandant to give him assistance, and he gets it.

Question. Are they frequently compelled to require such aid and assistance?

Answer. They are.

Question. And you do not think that at this time the military could be safely withdrawn from Tennessee?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you think that martial law could be safely abolished there at this time?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you think it would be safe at this time to restore the writ of habeas corpus there?

Answer. I do not.

Question. What is the general sentiment of the white population in the State of Tennessee at this time in respect to loyalty to the federal Union?

Answer. I should think that the majority of the people of Tennessee, counting them right through, are opposed to the government. I think the vote at the polls to-day, if every man were allowed to vote as he pleased and according to his own judgment, would show a majority against the general government.

Question. Is there any difference in that respect in different parts of the State?

Answer. Yes, sir; there is more loyalty in East Tennessee than in any other portion of the State, and there is more in Middle Tennessee than there is in West Tennessee.

Question. Is there now safety to the Union people of the State of Tennessee?

Answer. But little opposition to the Union people has come within my observation. A large delegation of the citizens of Memphis waited on me not long ago and stated that they were cruelly oppressed by the rebel element of the population in that section, and that they feared the military protection was to be withdrawn from the State; and they stated to me that if the military was withdrawn, those persons in most portions of West Tennessee who had been early and consistent friends of the government, and loyal to it, would be compelled to withdraw with the military. That was their opinion as expressed to me.

Question. Is it your belief that within two or three years there will be a mutual understanding arrived at between the white and colored populations of Tennessee, so that the Freedmen's Bureau could be dispensed with?

Answer. Yes, sir; I believe that with the enactment of just laws, laws securing impartial justice to all men, and their enforcement in that State by the civil authorities, it would not take that length of time to properly adjust the new relations.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. Where are your headquarters?

Answer. At Nashville, Tennessee.

Question. How long have you been in Kentucky? Have you been at Frankfort lately?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have been in Kentucky the most of the time for the last six weeks. I was there often during the summer months and made tours through the State.

Question. When you speak of the vote of the majority of the people of Tennessee being in opposition to the general government, do you mean that the majority would vote to overthrow the government, or do you mean that they are opposed to the present policy of the government?

Answer. I mean this—that I believe a majority of the people of Tennessee to-day would prefer that the rebellion should have been a success; that is my meaning.

Question. Is there, or not, an increasing loyalty—a disposition gradually growing up to take position under the federal government and do their duty?

Answer. I will tell you just what my observation in that particular has been. When I went to that district in June last there seemed to be a general disposition on the part of the majority of the people to cordially support the government—to return to industrial pursuits, and to let bygones be bygones. In the course of three or four months there seemed to be an increase of disaffection; I heard more of complaint against the government, more expressions of regret that the rebellion had failed, more open and unjust criticisms of the government; then again that spirit subsided, and I believe the feeling to-day in Tennessee is growing better.

Question. As the legislature of Tennessee has adopted the principal measures, if not all of the measures, recommended by the President of the United States, and they have elected members of Congress, will you state whether or not you believe their admission into seats in Congress would tend to encourage and increase the spirit of loyalty in Tennessee, and of attachment to the general government?

Answer. My own opinion about that is this: The State of Tennessee occupies altogether a different position from that of any State below. In the first place, Tennessee abolished slavery by her own actions; she elected a governor by the people; she repudiated the rebel debt; she ratified the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and did all that without Executive indication or inauguration. Tennessee furnished thousands for the defence of the Union. All this is to her advantage; and were I a member of the Senate or House of Representatives of Congress I would vote most cheerfully to admit the delegation from Tennessee, believing that in so doing I would be taking a step that would increase the loyal sentiment of the State, and which would promote the tranquillity and prosperity of the State. I speak now of Tennessee.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. You discriminate between Tennessee and the more southern States?

Answer. I do.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

David T. Patterson sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Greeneville, Greene county, East Tennessee.

Question. State, if you please, so far as you may know, the condition of the public sentiment in Tennessee so far as regards the whole of the State, as well as the different sections of it; the condition of the Union people and the freedmen in those different sections; and what you know in regard to the changed condition of the industrial pursuits of the freedmen.

Answer. I can speak from my own personal knowledge of the condition of the loyal people of East Tennessee. In regard to the condition of loyal people in Middle and in Western Tennessee, I can only speak from information derived from correspondence and conversations with people who live there. In Eastern Tennessee the loyal people have an overwhelming majority; they are the dominant party now. But during the war they were subjected to the bitterest persecution; they were driven from their homes; they were conscripted and sent into the rebel armies; they were persecuted like wild beasts by the rebel authorities, and hunted down in the mountains; they were hanged on the gallows, shot down and robbed; every imaginable wrong was inflicted upon them. From 20,000 to 25,000 loyal men of East Tennessee left their homes, went through the mountains into Kentucky, there joined the federal forces, and fought their way back home under General Burnside in 1863. Perhaps no people on the face of the earth were ever more persecuted than were the loyal people of East Tennessee in 1862 and 1863; the persecution commenced just after the burning of bridges in 1861. The first conscript law passed by the rebel congress, I believe, was passed in April, 1862, and as soon as they got their machinery at work they commenced attempting to conscript the Union men of East Tennessee. As soon as they organized their bureaus of conscription and appointed their enrolling officers, a great many Union men in East Tennessee escaped from the country, while others concealed themselves in the mountains and in houses.

At the June election in 1861, on the question of separation from the Union and representation in the rebel congress, we had in East Tennessee a majority of about 20,000 against those issues. Both questions were presented together.

Those who opposed them voted "no separation," "no representation;" those who were in favor voted "separation," "representation."

Upon the occupation of East Tennessee by General Burnside, in September, 1863, the rebels themselves, those who had made themselves obnoxious, fled from East Tennessee, and but few have returned. We have now but few rebels in East Tennessee. The Union men, when they were enabled to return, were not very amiable, and they resorted to retaliation; and executed a great many rebels—paid them back in the some sort of coin they had received at their hands. The Union men were guilty of a great many excesses, and can only be excused upon the ground that they had themselves been made to suffer terribly by those rebels.

Really, so far as East Tennessee is concerned, we have now very few rebels there. We have nothing to fear from rebel votes or from rebel influence in my section of the State. I doubt very much whether there are more than three counties in Eastern Tennessee where a rebel would present himself for any office of any character. East Tennessee can take care of itself. The trouble is in Middle Tennessee and in Western Tennessee.

Question. In West Tennessee, especially?

Answer. I suppose there is more disloyalty there; but I know but little about public sentiment there. All the information I have I obtain from correspondence and conversation with gentlemen living in that section of the State. I have been in Tennessee but little since the capitulation of General Lee and the surrender of the rebel armies. Since last July I have been here.

So far as the Freedmen's Bureau is concerned, I know very little of its practical operation in East Tennessee. We have very few freedmen there. In fact, I know nothing of the practical operation of the bureau in any part of the State. And in East Tennessee, before the war, slavery existed in its mildest form.

Question. What is your opinion in regard to the propriety of admitting into Congress the delegation from Tennessee at this time?

Answer. Situated as I am, it is very natural I should entertain the opinions I do upon that subject. I really think it would be advantageous to the loyal sentiment of Tennessee to be represented in Congress. I think the moral influence of a representation in Congress would do us good at home.

It is very difficult to judge of men's motives and their real sentiments; but those who were rebels, and who have corresponded or conversed with me upon the subject, profess now to be loyal to the government of the United States—to accept the results of the war in good faith.

I have read pretty carefully the address of the central committee of the State, and must say that I was surprised to see it. If we have not succeeded in making any impression upon the rebel organization in the State, and they were to combine together, they could certainly defeat us in a general election; that is to say, they could defeat us in an election for governor. They could not defeat us, so far as East Tennessee is concerned, in an election for members of Congress, or for members of the legislature, or for county officers. We have no trouble there about that; we carry all those elections our own way.

But if, as some of our prominent Union men think, we have made no impression upon the rebel organization in that State, then, if they were to combine and cast their full vote for candidates of their own, they could certainly defeat us in a general election.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

Col. William Spence sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Where do you reside, and what is your occupation?

Answer. I reside three miles from the city of Murfreesboro', Rutherford county, Tennessee. My business now is farming.

Question. Are you a native of Tennessee?

Answer. No, sir; I have been there ever since I was five years old; but I was born in Ireland.

Question. Are you in any public employment at this time?

Answer. I was elected to the senate of the legislature of Tennessee, and am at present a member of that body.

Question. Have you been in Tennessee during the last five years?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have been there all the time, and at home, when I could stay there.

Question. Were you the owner of slave property when the rebellion broke out?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What is the condition of public sentiment in the State of Tennessee, or in the different portions of the State, as regards loyalty to the federal government; and what is the condition of the freedmen, and the condition of the loyal Union men—those who have adhered to the government during the last five years?

Answer. First, with regard to the Union feeling in the State. Among those who have been in the rebellion, and have been pardoned, if the question was in reference to obeying the law, I think the most of them would be inclined to obey the law. Still, according to my judgment, they would have no very kind feeling towards the government. But I think they would obey the law as near as you could get any body of men to do it. I think the poorer classes who have been in the rebellion could be made truly loyal if proper efforts were made. They are ignorant and need education.

In the county where I live the condition of the freedman is very good. There is an agency of the Freedmen's Bureau there, but there have been very few cases that have to be taken before it for adjustment. The freedmen have behaved exceedingly well, and have obtained fair wages. When their time was out this year they commenced hiring out again on farms for $15 a month and board. I think everything with the freedmen is working well. The poorer classes of whites are not getting along so well. They have no schools, and where they have no land they cannot get employment as readily as the colored men can. The richer men will not employ them, for the truth is, they are not as valuable for laboring as the negroes are. According to my judgment the poorer classes of white people, not only in Tennessee, but all over the south, are scarcely able to take care of themselves. They are inclined to be idle and lazy, and think it degrading to work.

I only know from report about other parts of Tennessee. The eastern portion of the State, where about three-fourths of all the loyal people of the State live, is in a peculiar condition in regard to politics. The Union people in my section, Middle Tennessee, consider it absolutely necessary for the good of the country that the negro should have his rights in court; and not only that, but that we should at least inaugurate the principle that those who have fought in the army should have the right to vote as well as those who pay taxes and those who can read and write. But our Union friends in the eastern portion of the State, as we understand it, almost to a man, although the best Union men in the land, are opposed to any such thing.

I think the disloyal sentiment is much greater in West Tennessee than in Middle Tennessee; but how far that disloyal sentiment would be carried out if opportunity presented I have no means of knowing; whether it would go so far as disobedience to the law I do not know. I think it probable that in some portions of the State there might be some lawless fellows who would disobey the laws.

Question. You speak of the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau in your county. Do you think it is working advantageously to the planters and to the freedmen in that county?

Answer. There must be some tribunal before which, if there is any dispute, it can be settled. But we really have had no use for it of any consequence, because we were organized and getting along very well before there was any bureau established there, and I endeavored to have a law passed by the legislature which would have prevented our having any use for it in our section, but we failed to get it. I think the Freedmen's Bureau operates very well.

Question. How does this new system of paid labor seem to satisfy the intelligent people of Tennessee?

Answer. In my judgment it satisfies them remarkably well. I know it satisfies me. I have made the experiment; I allowed the freedmen I employed to have pretty much their own way, and they made as much as they ever made when slaves. I made as much as any of my neighbors made the past year; in fact, I think I made more. I do not hold at all to the idea that negroes will not work for compensation.

Question. What, in your opinion, would be the effect at the next election in Tennessee of admitting her representatives into Congress now? Would it result to the advantage of the Union men of the State to admit the Tennessee representatives at this time?

Answer. I think it would have a good effect. It would set the whole machinery of the State in motion, and the people would become identified with and better satisfied with the government of the United States, even those who have been in the rebellion. My judgment would be that different candidates would come out at another election, and in some sections what we term radical men would be elected; in other sections what we call conservatives would be elected. But I think that in hardly any case—at least not in Middle Tennessee—would they elect what would be called rebels, men who have been in the rebel army and taken an active part in favor of the rebellion. They would be afraid, if they should put up such men, that the poorer classes would be arrayed against them by the Union people, which I think can be done in every district in Middle and West Tennessee; and if they do that, we will have a civil war at home. I really think it would have a very beneficial effect to admit our representatives now. I live in as bad a rebel district as any in the State of Tennessee; not originally any worse than others, but they all got into it at last. The rich men had influence, and made the poor people go into the rebellion; but I do not think they have that influence any longer.

W. SPENCE.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1866.

Lieutenant Colonel John H. Cochran sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Are you connected with the army?

Answer. I have been; I was mustered out of service last week.

Question. With what regiment have you been connected?

Answer. With the 101st United States colored infantry. I was acting assistant adjutant general for General Fisk, of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. Have you been on General Fisk's staff until recently?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How long have you been stationed in Tennessee, and at what place?

Answer. Since the 5th of September, 1863, at Nashville.

Question. Have you had occasion to travel much through the State?

Answer. Yes, sir; considerable, at various times.

Question. Have you been brought in contact with the people of Tennessee to any considerable extent?

Answer. Yes, sir; my official position brought me in contact with a great many people.

Question. So far as you have been able to form an opinion, what is the present condition of public sentiment in Tennessee as regards loyalty to the federal government?

Answer. I do not think there is much loyalty there. I think the Union people are in a very decided minority; and I think it would be still worse if our troops were withdrawn. That has been shown, I think, in the sections from which the troops have been withdrawn.

Question. Is there, in any portion of the State, much dissatisfaction with the restoration of the federal government?

Answer. Yes, sir; there is a great deal of it in Middle Tennessee and some in East Tennessee.

Question. How is it in West Tennessee?

Answer. West Tennessee is bad, too, in some portions of it.

Question. How tolerable is the condition of those men who have been loyal to the government of the United States throughout the rebellion?

Answer. In reference to what?

Question. How are they treated and regarded by those who have been disloyal?

Answer. The feeling now is subsiding a great deal; but there was a great deal of opposition by disloyal men to Union men. They seem to harmonize now better than they did a year ago. There does not appear to be so much trouble between them. Still the Union men are in the minority, as was demonstrated at the election of mayor of Nashville; but there is not much open hostility between them.

Question. Are the lives, and is the property, of Union men of the State who have borne arms in the federal cause safe and protected at this time?

Answer. Yes, sir. I do not know how it would be if the troops were taken away from the State.

Question. Do you believe the troops could be safely withdrawn at this time?

Answer. I do not; not from the whole State. They might be safely withdrawn from some portions of the State; but in other parts of the State I do not think it would be safe for northern men who have emigrated there, or for the Union men of the State who have served in our army, if our troops were withdrawn.

Question. Would it be safe for the freedmen?

Answer. No, sir, it would not.

Question. What is the condition of the freedmen there now?

Answer. It is very good; they are making contracts for labor. At General Fisk's office the demand for laborers was five or six thousand more than we could supply.

Question. Do the freedmen receive remunerative wages for their labor?

Answer. I think they do.

Question. Are the labor contracts generally observed on both sides?

Answer. Yes, sir, in most instances. We have had but very little trouble in consequence of their contracts being violated.

Question. So far as you know, has the Freedmen's Bureau operated advantageously for all parties in Tennessee?

Answer. Yes, sir, I think so. There has been some complaint about it; but I guess the great cause of the complaint, the freedmen's court, has been removed now. The admission of negroes to testify in the courts will do away with the necessity for a freedmen's court.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. You say the people of Tennessee are becoming more quiet?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What is your opinion as to the effect of the admission of the delegation from Tennessee into Congress? Would it increase the spirit of loyalty or quietude, or would it do otherwise?

Answer. I think it would increase it. They feel there now as though they were not represented, as though they were a Territory, and it was hardly worth while being loyal.

Question. Do the men who were in the federal army and those who were in the confederate army treat each other with more courtesy than the citizens do?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And more generously?

Answer. We have but little trouble with the men who were in the confederate army. I found it so in Tennessee and Kentucky.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1866.

Lieutenant Colonel R. W. Barnard sworn and examined.

By Mr. GRIMES:

Question. Are you an officer of the United States army?

Answer. Yes, sir; a brevet lieutenant colonel of the United States army.

Question. Where have you been last stationed?

Answer. In Tennessee.

Question. How long have you been there?

Answer. I have been stationed permanently there since the last of June, 1864.

Question. At what place have you been stationed?

Answer. At Nashville.

Question. What has been your duty there?

Answer. From the 21st of June, 1864, until about the 1st of August, 1865, I was superintendent of contrabands for the department of the Cumberland.

Question. Is Nashville still your headquarters?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What is the condition of public sentiment in the State of Tennessee in regard to loyalty to the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not think there are many citizens of Tennessee who are favorable to the government of the United States.

Question. What do you mean by that? Do you mean that there is a general spirit of disloyalty throughout the State, or merely that they are dissatisfied with the condition of things?

Answer. Rather that they are dissatisfied with the condition of things. It is not disloyalty sufficient to produce an outbreak, but it is a spirit of disaffection.

Question. What is the condition of the Union people of the State, those who have been loyal during the last four or five years?

Answer. Do you mean as regards their treatment by the citizens?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Answer. I do not think they are molested by the southern sympathizers.

Question. Is it your opinion that they are thoroughly protected in all their rights and privileges?

Answer. I think they have their rights and privileges by sufferance; that they are simply not interfered with.

Question. What is the condition of the freedmen in Tennessee?

Answer. I think that it is improving. I think that self-interest on the part of the employers will protect the freedmen in their rights in a great measure.

Question. So far as you know, are they now protected in their rights of persons and property?

Answer. As a general thing, I think they are by their employers.

Question. How are they treated by those who are not their employers?

Answer. I do not think they are treated with much cruelty; but they are not treated with much favor. There is a dislike to the negro since he is free, but I do not think he is treated with much cruelty in Tennessee. Still, I ascribe that in a great measure to the presence of the military in Tennessee, and the decided policy of General Thomas.

Question. Do you know whether measures are being taken generally throughout the State to put in crops?

Answer. Yes, sir; and there is a great demand for labor from all parts of Tennessee by northern men who have emigrated there and citizens of the State who have always lived there.

Question. Is it your opinion that the military could be safely removed from Tennessee at this time?

Answer. I hardly know how to express myself on that subject. I have not been in favor of removing the military. I can tell you what an old citizen, a Union man, said to me. Said he, "I tell you what, if you take away the military from Tennessee, the buzzards can't eat up the niggers as fast as we'll kill 'em." I do not think it would be as bad as that; but I know there are plenty of bad men there who would maltreat the negro.

Question. What is your opinion, if you have any upon the subject, in regard to the effect upon the public sentiment in Tennessee of admitting into Congress the delegation from that State?

Answer. I think the effect would probably be beneficial. But I am not a politician; I have never meddled with politics; I have never voted in my life. Still, there is such a universal desire there to have their delegation admitted that I think it would probably have a beneficial effect.

Question. From what does that desire arise?

Answer. Simply a desire to be represented in Congress, to be recognized as a State again. It is a natural desire for a people to have. I do not think there is any particular political meaning in it.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. Is the inclination or disposition to be severe on the freedmen most common with those who formerly owned slaves, or with those who never owned any?

Answer. There are very few persons of any standing in Tennessee who did not formerly own slaves; therefore, any maltreatment of freedmen would be by those who formerly owned slaves.

Question. Do not a large majority of the people in Tennessee who formerly owned slaves, so far as they can, seek to retain them by hiring them?

Answer. I think they are more anxious to hire their own former slaves than to go abroad for laborers—that is, as a general thing; but there are some instances where men positively refuse to let a negro come near them who was ever owned by them.

Question. But the general rule is the other way?

Answer. I rather think it is.

Question. Portions of slaves that belonged to particular men went off with the army, and some remained at home. Are not the owners of those who remained at home peculiarly kind and attentive to their interests?

Answer. I cannot say how that is in a general way. When I was superintendent of contrabands there were so many instances of cruelty brought before me, and at the same time so much evidence of kindness, that I thought it was about equally divided; it depended a great deal upon the natural heart and condition of the former owner.

Question. You speak now of contrabands?

Answer. I say my official title was "superintendent of contrabands."

Question. They were not freedmen then?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. The constitutional amendment had not then been ratified?

Answer. No, sir; but the President's proclamation had freed all slaves in insurrectionary districts. That is the way I always decided, that the slaves in the insurrectionary districts had been all freed by the President's proclamation. I decided that the slaves in Kentucky were not freed, but that in Tennessee and the other insurrectionary States they were free.

Question. You speak of your experience as the officer in charge of that interest before the constitutional amendment was ratified?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have had nothing to do with it since. I have been commanding my own regiment since August last.

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1866.

Oliver P. Temple sworn and examined.

By Mr. BINGHAM:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Knoxville, East Tennessee.

Question. How long have you resided in Tennessee?

Answer. All my life; I was born in Tennessee.

Question. Will you state what is the present condition of affairs in Tennessee touching the good order of the community, and what it has been for the past six or twelve months?

Answer. During the last three or four months a large portion of East Tennessee has been very quiet, considering the condition of the country previous to that time. Of course, previous to that time all was disorder and confusion and war. At the present time I know of but very little disorder there except such acts of personal lawlessness as always grow out of the demoralization resulting from some years of war.

Question. How is it in Middle and in West Tennessee?

Answer. Personally I know very little about those parts of the State, for I have not been there for some time.

Question. Do you know by general report?

Answer. Yes, sir; I hear a great deal of complaint from there through the newspapers and from other sources of information; but I have not been out of my section of the State in that direction for four years.

Question. According to your observation, does there still exist in the State of Tennessee a disunion party?

Answer. That is a question very hard to answer. In one sense of the term, and probably in most senses of the term, there does exist a disunion party there; in another sense of the term there does not. In my section of the State the Union party was very largely in the ascendancy during the war and up to the present time. The rebels were very hostile, very bitter, and very proscriptive until the surrender of General Lee and General Johnston. Since that time the large majority of the rebels in my section of the State with whom I have come in contact have expressed a determination to submit to the laws and government of the United States, and although I know some original secessionists who still would desire the overthrow of the government of the United States if they had it in their power, I think the majority of the original disunionists in my section of the State are so overwhelmed by the public sentiment around them, and the disasters that have befallen their cause, that they utterly despair of accomplishing anything of the kind.

Now, while I apprehend that that state of acquiescence does not exist to the same extent in Middle Tennessee and in West Tennessee as in East Tennessee, yet public opinion has a great effect upon the sentiment of men, and hence I think that a large majority of the original secessionists are disposed to acquiesce in the result of the war. I do not think they will ever go to war again against the government of the United States, unless there was a much better prospect of success than has yet presented itself. In other words, I think they are inclined to submit to the existing state of affairs. They complain, it is true; but I do not think they have any intention of rebelling again; at least they say they have not in their conversations with me. I have had some conversations with them, though I am not so intimate with them as a great many others are, because I am known throughout my region of country as a very decided Union man, and by some regarded as an ultra man.

Question. Have all the secessionists been disfranchised under the new State organization of Tennessee?

Answer. They have not all been disfranchised—only those who cannot take a certain oath; certain persons who did not vote at certain elections that are specified in our laws are permitted to vote.

Question. What proportion of the former voting population of Tennessee have been disfranchised by the existing State organization?

Answer. I do not know; I have never made the calculation. I have seen a great many statements made by politicians, but I have never seen any statement that I had reason to believe was accurate. I should suppose that from 40,000 to 60,000, perhaps more, voters have been disfranchised.

Question. Is not that a majority of the whole voting population of the State?

Answer. I think our voting population before the war was about 145,000. I do not know how that number has been affected by the war.

Question. What is the highest vote given at any election under the present organization?

Answer. I think that some 40,000 votes were given in the election for governor of the State.

Question. Is it or not your opinion that if the white people of the state were all put on an equality in regard to the franchise, a majority of secessionists and sympathizers with the secessionists would secure the control of the affairs of the State, and elect its officers?

Answer. I very much fear they would; but I am by no means certain about that; I think that would depend somewhat upon the policy adopted by our party at the north. If a very ultra and extreme policy is adopted at the north it will in all probability, supposing the secessionists should have the privileges of the ballot-box, have a tendency to increase their numbers. If a milder policy is adopted, it will have a tendency to strengthen the Union element. Party combinations are shifting so in our State, and I suppose everywhere now, that it is very difficult to predict in advance what the relative strength of parties will be in the future. I should have some fears that if the franchise laws of our State were repealed and a free election were allowed, the rebels permitted to vote, the control of the State would pass into the hands of the rebels; indeed I believe it would.

Question. Do you think it would be safe for the Union men of Tennessee to allow the whole voting population of the State as it formerly existed to control the affairs of that State without any federal interference at all?

Answer. The Union people in our section of the State would unquestionably be safe. I cannot answer positively in reference to the other divisions of the State. East Tennessee is able to take care of itself beyond any question in the world; no doubt about that. With the present franchise act of our State in operation, I have but very little doubt but what the Union men would be able to take care of themselves there.

Question. Excluding the rebels from voting?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. But my question was, supposing the right of suffrage was restored to all the people?

Answer. I should apprehend that in certain sections of the State the Union men would be in very great danger; that is, from what I hear, not from what I know, because I live in a section of the State where we have no apprehensions whatever.

Question. Suppose the whole body of the white population of Tennessee was admitted to the exercise of the franchise, what in your opinion would be the security of the freedmen in Tennessee without federal intervention?

Answer. I am inclined to the opinion that there would be individual instances, and probably a considerable number of them, where the freedmen would be very badly treated; but, on the other hand, I am inclined to the opinion that a majority of the people of the State would be disposed to respect their rights even if all restraints were removed. I am very well satisfied of one fact—that the attempt on the part of our friends to protect the freedmen there, (as a necessary consequence there have been some unwarranted acts, not intentional, upon the part of persons who were superintending that freedmen's department,) has had a tendency to create a feeling of ill will towards the freedmen that would not naturally and of itself have existed. I myself think that a majority of the southern people entertain a feeling of kindness for those who were formerly their slaves. I have always felt that, although I have never in my life been an ultra-man upon the subject of slavery, and have always preferred my government to the institution of slavery, as is very well known in my section of the State, I was perfectly willing to give up the institution of slavery. I do not think that there is the same enmity towards the blacks upon the part of the southern people, even if extraneous influences were removed, as is commonly supposed in the north. But possibly I judge more from my own feelings towards those I formerly controlled than from other reasons; it may be that has too much influence upon my opinion upon the subject.

Question. You mentioned forty thousand votes as having been given at one election in Tennessee; were they given for the same candidates, or were they divided among opposing candidates?

Answer. My recollection is that about forty thousand votes were given for the Union ticket. I am not sure that any at all were given for the opposite ticket, but I may be mistaken about that. I have been very busily engaged in other pursuits, and am not a regular professed politician in any way, though I take an interest in such matters.

Question. Was there a military force present at the last election in the State, in any manner controlling it?

Answer. So far as I know, and so far as I have ever been authentically informed, there was not. There was a military force in the State; but if the military interfered at all in the elections there, I have no authentic information about it.

By Mr. GRIDER :

Question. What is your opinion and your conviction as to the effect of admitting the present delegation of representatives now elected from the State of Tennessee? Would it increase the loyalty and gratify the feelings of the people of the State, and would it decrease it to exclude them?

Answer. I think to admit the representatives would unquestionably strengthen the loyal men there very much, and to reject them would unquestionably strengthen the disloyal element. I think that rejecting them would have a tendency to make a great many Union men discontented, and when men become discontented it is a very easy matter to drive them off into the opposite extreme. I desire to state one thing more definitely and distinctly than I have stated in my former answer with reference to the disunionists. I do not pretend to say, nor do I mean to be understood in anything I have said to say, that the original secessionists in our State have changed their hearts. I think their hearts are just where they were four years ago; but a great many of them are acquiescing in the present condition of things, and I think a great many of them intend to continue to acquiesce in the supremacy of the government of the United States. But I think their hearts are just where they were before; or, at least, that is the case with a majority of them.

Question. I will ask you whether those gentlemen who are acquiescing, and who say they are willing to submit to the general government, are not generally men of capacity and influence and consideration?

Answer. Yes, sir; they are generally, so far as I know, because those are the persons I generally come in contact with. I have not come in contact with many of the common refugees, and I know very little about their sentiments. It is generally persons of position with whom I have come in contact, or with whom I have had conversation. I have had conversation with a great many of them, and they are men generally of standing and respectability, or were so before the war. A great many of them have fallen off very much, in my estimation, since that.

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1866.

John Williams sworn and examined.

By Mr. BINGHAM :

Question. In what part of Tennessee do you reside, and how long have you resided in that State?

Answer. I reside in Knox county, East Tennessee, and have resided there all my life.

Question. Have you the means of knowing the general state of public feeling in Tennessee?

Answer. I think I have.

Question. What is the feeling of the majority of the people of Tennessee towards the government of the United States?

Answer. So far as I am advised, it is my opinion that the feeling of not only the majority, but almost the entire mass of the people of Tennessee, is friendly towards the government of the United States. I know of no opposition there, and hear of none except through the newspapers. You can hear contradictory statements upon that subject almost every day. Some contend that there is opposition to the government. But my observation is that there is none anywhere in the State, so far as I am advised. The rebels have been thoroughly whipped, and I think they are disposed to acquiesce in the supremacy of the authority of the United States.

Question. Are the rebels disposed to take the possession and control of the government of Tennessee, if they get the chance to do so?

Answer. I suppose if you were to give them the privilege of voting, as a matter of course they will go to the polls like everybody else, and they will vote; and in that event, there being a majority in Tennessee of those who were rebels, they would get the control of the State. But I am one of those who do not believe there is much opposition in the State of Tennessee to the government of the United States. If you permit them to go to the polls, of course they would be in the majority, because there are more of them than of the other party in Tennessee.

Question. What is the relative strength of the rebel population in Tennessee, compared with the white Union population?

Answer. I think that upon the question of separation from the Union, which was the last real test we had there, there were from 40,000 to 45,000 for the Union, and about 100,000 for secession. That was about the vote, as well as I now recollect.

Question. Is it your opinion that the two parties sustain about that relative relation now?

Answer. I do not think they do.

Question. What do you think is now the difference between the whole number of Union voters and rebel sympathizers in Tennessee?

Answer. That I cannot tell. We can only judge of that from the test of an election, and we have had no election which was anything like a test since the 8th of June, 1861, and therefore it would be impossible for me to form any exact idea as to what would be their relative strength at this time. I do not think, however, the proposition to secede again would now get a single vote in Tennessee.

Question. I do not mean whether they would vote for secession now, but whether the rebels would vote to give themselves the control of the State.

Answer. My observation and experience for the last twelve months in Tennessee would lead me to believe that some of those who have been the worst rebels have now got to be some of the most noisy Union men; they are the most clamorous and make the most noise. The great body of the Union men in my section of the country have not been to an election for some time. They refused to vote at any of the elections under the secession government; and a great many of them have not gone back to the polls since they have been under federal rule.

Question. What is the reason of that?

Answer. I suppose it is for various reasons. There is a state government in Tennessee now which a great many of the Union men do not indorse.

Question. Why do they not indorse it?

Answer. Because they do not think it was organized in accordance with principles laid down in the constitution of the State of Tennessee; that is all.

Question. Do they still have that opinion?

Answer. I think a great many of them have. Still they acquiesce in the government; they offer no resistance to it. You are asking me for my opinion.

Question. Undoubtedly; and a great deal of this testimony which you are giving is merely your opinion. Do these Union men of whom you speak intend to remain away from the polls under the existing State organization?

Answer. I do not think they do. I think, as time rolls on, they will all go back to the polls. But men in a high state of excitement will not do a great many things which otherwise they will do.

Question. Do you know anything about any agreement or organization among the rebels to acquiesce for the present, and after restoration to take control of the State?

Answer. I have no knowledge of any such organization.

Question. Neither from rumor nor otherwise?

Answer. None, except what I have seen published in the Nashville papers, as coming from some gentlemen there. A Mr. Fletcher, and others who are on a committee there, say that such is the fact. But I have no knowledge of the existence of any such organization.

Question. Those men to whom you refer have made that statement public?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is contained in an address to Congress, which I suppose you have all seen.

Question. Do you think with the State of Tennessee under the control of rebels, without any restraint upon them from federal intervention, justice would be done to the freedmen in that State?

Answer. I do not think there is any disposition upon the part of anybody in Tennessee, rebel or Union, to inflict any injury upon the colored man.

Question. That is not exactly an answer to my question?

Answer. Well, I will endeavor to answer as well as I can.

Question. My question is whether you think, if the control of the State should pass into the hands of the rebel majority, justice would be done to the freedmen in Tennessee?

Answer. I think it would; because I know personally a great many rebels who are as kind to the negro as any one else is, and therefore I think it is fair to infer that they would continue to be so.

By Mr. GRIDEN:

Question. What effect do you think the admission into Congress would have upon the spirit and temper of the people of Tennessee? Would it gratify them and make them more loyal, or would it tend to encourage the rebel feeling there?

Answer. I think it would have a very beneficial influence; I think it would go a great way towards bringing about a better state of feeling than perhaps exists there now. There are some of our people there, good Union people, who are disposed to complain of the action of Congress in not admitting our representatives. I think their admission would put them in good humor and make them feel better disposed towards the government.

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1866.

Abner G. Jackson sworn and examined.

By Mr. BINGHAM:

Question. In what part of Tennessee do you reside, and how long have you resided there?

Answer. I reside in Knox county, East Tennessee, and I have resided there for fifty-seven years. I was born in the neighborhood of Petersburg, Virginia.

Question. What is your opinion of the present feeling of the majority of the people of Tennessee towards the friends and defenders of the Union in the State of Tennessee?

Answer. So far as my observation goes, the feeling of the secession party is nothing like as bitter as it was some time ago. Until within the last two or three months there has been a great deal of bitterness and a great deal of trouble. But it is now much more quiet, so far as my observation goes.

Question. Is it your opinion that the active Union men of Tennessee would be safe if the control of the government of the State was transferred to the hands of the majority, that majority being understood to have been rebel?

Answer. I really think they would. I should be perfectly willing to risk it if it were thought practicable and advisable to do so. But just in that connexion, speaking of rebels, perhaps you and I would differ as to who were rebels. My neighbor, for instance, has been a rebel; but he is an honest man, and comes up and takes the oath. I do not now look upon him as a rebel, because by taking the oath he has wiped out his sin of rebellion. In regard to honest men, I take a different view of that subject from some others. An honest man before the war will be an honest man after the war.

Question. In what majority are those persons in Tennessee who have been in favor of the rebellion?

Answer. I am not as well posted in that respect as some others are.

Question. Do you think they would be as about two to one to the Union men in Tennessee?

Answer. I think, taking the whole State, perhaps they would be, or that they have been.

Question. Are they now?

Answer. I do not think they are.

Question. Are they in the majority in the State now?

Answer. I think it very likely that they have a decided majority.

Question. Do you think the vote of the State now would be in the proportion that Mr. Temple has stated, whose testimony you have heard?

Answer. I form my opinion more from what Mr. Temple and Mr. Jackson have stated than from my own observation, for they have bestowed more pains upon this subject than I have.

Question. Do you know about what was the vote of Tennessee for governor at the last election for that office?

Answer. I do not; I was absent from Tennessee at that time.

By Mr. GRIDER:

Question. You have spoken of the bitterness that existed between the rebels and the Union men some months ago. Will you not state whether that was not rather a personal difference, rather than a feeling of opposition towards the United States government?

Answer. It was a personal difference, and confined to very low people, as a general thing.

Question. What effect, in your opinion, would the admission of the delegation from Tennessee into Congress have upon the people of the State? Would it have a good effect?

Answer. I think it would have a very decided effect to harmonize the people of Tennessee.

Question. Will you state whether the rebel officers and the Union officers who have met in your neighborhood since the war ceased have not got along harmoniously together and like gentlemen?

Answer. Officers and soldiers both have done so; that is true, with the exception, as I stated before, of low fellows.

PART II.

VIRGINIA, NORTH CAROLINA, SOUTH CAROLINA.

SUB-COMMITTEE.

Mr. JACOB M. HOWARD, (of Michigan,) United States Senate.

Mr. ROSCOE CONKLING, (of New York,) House of Representatives.

Mr. HENRY T. BLOW, (of Missouri,) House of Representatives.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Select Joint Committee on Reconstruction, reported the following evidence.

TESTIMONY

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1866.

Brevet Major General John W. Turner sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Of what State are you a citizen?

Answer. The State of Illinois.

Question. Are you now in the public service? If so, in what capacity, and where are you stationed?

Answer. I am in the military service of the United States, in command of the district of Henrico, including the city of Richmond, Virginia; I have been in command there since the middle of June last.

Question. Does your district include any other city than Richmond?

Answer. It does not; it includes the county of Henrico and the town of Manchester, opposite Richmond, on the opposite side of the James river.

Question. Were you in the Union army at the time of the evacuation of Richmond?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Serving under whom?

Answer. I was commanding a division in the 24th army corps, under General Gibbon.

Question. State, generally, the nature of your duties at Richmond at the present time.

Answer. Perhaps I had better go back a little and state what my duties have been, as they have been circumscribed somewhat lately.

Question. Please do so.

Answer. On assuming command there I took the entire control and charge of the city of Richmond, exercising all the power and authority ordinarily vested in the municipal authorities of a city. The civil courts were suspended—all the ordinary tribunals before which the citizens of a community resort for the redress of their grievances.

Question. Was the district under martial law?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Has it been ever since?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And is now?

Answer. Yes, sir. From time to time I have turned over to the regularly constituted civil authorities which have been established all actions in civil cases. During the summer, and until October, I took cognizance, as a sort of equity court, of all civil cases that I could adjudicate upon. I was consequently brought in contact with a great many citizens, who necessarily came to me for relief of their wants of various kinds.

At present my duties are confined almost exclusively to affairs in which freedmen are involved. The State civil courts all having been established, a mayor having been elected and his police court established, they have taken from me all jurisdiction over matters tending to the peace and quiet of the community. At present, therefore, I take cognizance only of those matters in which freedmen are involved; and of those I take action only in criminal cases; all civil cases go to the Freedmen's Bureau. But Richmond being a large city, and there being a large congregation of negroes there, there is required a court constantly in session to dispose of criminal cases of daily occurrence. I have from ten to twenty cases every day to dispose of; mostly for petty misdemeanors.

Question. Is there in your district any interruption of the courts of justice by mobs or violence?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Are juries regularly assembled in the State courts for the trial of causes?

Answer. The courts were established only late in the fall, and the only court that has been going on is what is called the hustings court. Of that court there are two branches—the one composed of a judge, the other of fifteen magistrates. That court does not have a jury. I think that in the circuit court and in Judge Meredith's court there is a jury.

Question. How are the sheriffs of those courts appointed?

Answer. They are all elected.

Question. Have you been present in Richmond or in any other place in Virginia on any day of election?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What do you know in regard to ex-rebels voting

Answer. The first election in Richmond was for mayor, aldermen, members of the council, sheriff, high constable, commonwealth's attorney, &c. So far as tumultuous proceedings were concerned, that election was conducted very quietly; there was no disturbance. I took every precaution that the soldiers should not interfere with the voting; that they should keep away from the polls. The people had free scope to do and say just what they pleased. I only took the precaution, in case of a riot or disturbance, to have the means at hand to suppress it. I know that at that election the people of Richmond electioneered on the streets and made harangues and speeches in favor of ex-rebel officers.

Question. Was this done within your own hearing?

Answer. I cannot say I heard it; it was so reported to me.

Question. Was the information you received so direct and authentic as to leave no doubt upon your mind as to its correctness?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did you, at that election, hear any outcries or shouts, indicating that the people were generally more in favor of those candidates who had been rebels than of those who had not been?

Answer. I did not, personally, for I took the precaution to keep out of sight of anything of the kind that day; but my officers, whom I had on duty, reported to me that such things did occur, and I am fully confident they did.

Question. Have you mingled freely with the people of Richmond and of other portions of your district since you have been in command there, so as to be able to ascertain the state of their feelings towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I have been thrown in contact with a great many of them; but when you ask me if I have mingled with them—gone into their society—I must say that I have not, because they will not permit me to do it.

Question. Why not?

Answer. Because I am a "Yankee," and they will not permit me to go inside their houses.

Question. Can you give an instance of any exclusion of that sort?

Answer. No, sir; not of any direct exclusion; only that none of them have ever invited me to visit their houses. I know of only one instance where I was invited to the house of a citizen of Richmond who was, and has been during the war, a secessionist. I judge from the manner in which they avoid me; the nature of their conversation when they are in my presence, when they are obliged to approach me on matters of business; their deportment and their acts on the streets indicating—all these things satisfy me that I am not welcome among them. On the contrary, that they have towards me, and I am constantly reminded of it, a deep-abiding hate. I am filled with the consciousness of it every day. I have not been on the streets of Richmond scarcely a day for the last four months that I have not seen some indication from man or woman making his or her contempt for me because I am a "Yankee;" by a shrug of the shoulders, by walking across the street to avoid meeting me, by their turning their backs on me, or leaving a store when I enter it, turning their noses up at me. I do not suppose a day has passed in any week for the last four months that that has not been done.

Question. Are you aware that any of those citizens have any cause of personal dislike towards you?

Answer. They have not.

Question. Have you had any personal altercation with any of them?

Answer. Not with a single person in the city of Richmond. When I have been brought in contact with them, in the exercise of my official duties, I have always treated them kindly; I have spoken pleasantly to them; I have avoided in every way the giving any offence by word or act.

Question. Have you received any instructions from your superiors in relation to your demeanor towards them?

Answer. No, sir; I have never received any instruction on that point.

Question. I do not mean any official instructions; but have you not been informed of the desire of the President of the United States on that point?

Answer. I conceived it to be my duty, when I was assigned to the command there, to do all in my power to conciliate and harmonize the people; and I did it conscientiously. I have forced down many a time against my inclination the indignation that arose in me, feeling that it was my duty to do so; that perhaps I ought to forbear showing my feelings. I think it probable that if you should ask the citizens of Richmond, they would speak of my course there as having been charitable and kind. At any rate, such are the reports that are brought to me; that they have nothing to gainsay of what I have done. Of course, in the proper discharge of my official duties there, I have been obliged to take some measures that were not very pleasant to some of them.

Question. It was your uniform and firm intention and inclination to treat them fairly and kindly?

Answer. Yes, sir; as much so as I ever attempted to perform any duty in my life.

Question. And you are not conscious of ever having acted differently?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What is your conviction of the general sentiment of the people in your district, or in Virginia generally, so far as you know, towards the government of the United States; as a general thing, as a prevalent feeling, do they like it or do they hate it?

Answer. It is my conviction that they hate it.

Question. And you derive this conviction from what?

Answer. From a long intercourse with them; from watching them as carefully as I could and judging them as dispassionately as I could; and I think I am able to judge them dispassionately. I do not think they love the country or the government. It is their belief, or their expression of belief, that they cannot live with the north; that they are a different people. I do not think that their oath of allegiance conveys to them any binding force or obligation whatever to support and defend the government. I do not believe that they, for an instant, think it does.

Question. As a general thing?

Answer. As a general thing.

Question. Why not; in what sort of casuistry do they indulge in that regard; in other words, how does it happen that a man, honorable and honest in his private relations, can reconcile it to his conscience to violate and disregard his oath?

Answer. That is a matter entirely beyond my comprehension. I can only attribute it to the fact that they are an impulsive people, and speak and act from their impulses more than from their reason and judgment. I have had related to me scores, and I may say hundreds of times, instances of men who have taken the oath of allegiance, asserting that they would never fight for the old flag.

Question. Does this information come to you from authentic sources?

Answer. Yes, sir. I call to mind distinctly now one instance where a man told me that he was sitting at the breakfast table in a private boarding-house, when the conversation turned upon the probability of a war with France or England. One man present at the table remarked, "Well, if we get into a war with England, I am going on that side."

Question. On the side of England?

Answer. Yes, sir. "I am going to fight for England; I will not fight for this country."

Question. Was that man one of position in society there?

Answer. That I cannot say. He was certainly living at a genteel boarding-house.

Question. Was he an educated and well-bred man?

Answer. He was boarding with the gentleman who related the circumstance to me, and who goes in the first society there. I have heard these things so often that I have ceased to pay attention to them; they pass in one ear and out of the other. It is from hearing these remarks, and from their deportment towards me, that I have been brought to the conviction that their oath of allegiance does not bear with any force or obligation upon them.

Question. In case of the actual occurrence of a war between the United States and any foreign power, say England or France, suppose there should be an opportunity offered for the southern rebels to join the enemy; in your opinion, what would they do?

Answer. I cannot help but think they would go against us. If a foreign fleet should land on the coast of any of the southern States, the people, as a community, might not organize into an armed band or an armed force and re-enforce the enemy; but I believe they would assist them by giving them information and furnishing them with supplies, and open their country to them as a base of operations. Such is my conviction. I think if we should get into war with a foreign power, and that power should make offers to the leading military men of the rebellion, the generals, colonels, majors, &c., the most of them would accept the offers. I think that is their spirit now.

Question. What is your idea as to the decrease or increase of this spirit since the close of the war; so far as your observation extends, has it decreased or increased?

Answer. There is vastly more demonstration of it now than there was in the months of May and June last; whether their feeling of hate has increased since that time or not I will not say. They certainly give more demonstration of it now than they did then.

Question. In your judgment what has been the effect of the pardons and amnesties which have been granted to rebels in Virginia, especially in your district; what has been the moral effect upon the minds and hearts of the recipients of those favors?

Answer. I cannot help thinking that it has gone far to depress the hopes of the few Union men there, and to raise the hopes of the secessionists. The secessionists receiving pardons seem to have assumed an authority and political control, and to exercise an influence upon society that they did not before they received those pardons; and, of course, their control and influence are antagonistic to the Union people and Union sentiment. The Union people were in the minority after these secessionists got their pardons; and had to take back seats. I have been deeply grieved for the Union men there whom I saw their utter want of hope. I am confident that, as they all tell me, they have no hope now.

Question. Have the Union people there any effectual strength, politically or socially?

Answer. No, sir, neither politically nor socially. Union men who have lived in Virginia all their lives tell me they will have to leave as soon as our troops are withdrawn.

Question. Is such the state of things now?

Answer. Yes, sir. There are men there who remained there during the four years of the war, who were Union men; but whose feelings and opinions were not generally known through the war, by keeping quiet and out of the way of the crowd they were lost to the public view generally. Since our advent there they have come forth and made known what were their feelings and sentiments all through the four years of the war. These people are now persecuted to death, one might say, by the rebels, who accuse them of having been false to their flag and their country.

Question. I will suppose this case: that the military power and control of the government is entirely withdrawn from Virginia, and from the other rebel States, so that there shall be no longer the restraining influence of the government of the United States upon them; but these States would apparently have perfect liberty to again attempt to secede from the Union; would they or not again attempt to set up the so-called confederate government, or something like it?

Answer. I think this: that if they thought they could succeed, by tearing down the United States flag to-morrow, they would do it.

Question. Suppose this case: that the government of the United States should not exercise or threaten to exercise its military power and restraint in opposition to secession again; or, in other words, suppose there was no immediate prospect of the use of military force for that purpose, would they again undertake to go out of the Union and form a confederate government and take the chances?

Answer. There are so many contingencies involved that one can hardly give a direct answer to that question. I am confident they would fire on the United States flag to-morrow if they thought that by so doing they would effect a separation. But there are many chances against them, and it is a question of how many chances they would take against themselves. My theory of the matter is this: they are determined, I think, to effect a separation from the north socially and commercially; they failed to effect one politically, and they are determined to effect a social and commercial separation if they can. They will make themselves a separate people in every way; make it unpleasant for northerners to be among them; be aggressive, and a northerner will be unable to obtain redress. They will do that for the purpose of effecting a social separation; and making themselves a distinct people, so far as they can, while living under the same government; biding their time when they may effect a political separation.

Question. Ever entertaining the hope of an ultimate separation?

Answer. Yes, sir, that is my opinion; and if we cannot overcome those people, socially and commercially; if we cannot make them homogeneous with us at the north, by introducing among them enough of us, I think it is only a question of time when we shall be separated. They say they cannot mix with us; that they do not mean to mix with us; that they cannot live with the north.

Question. Why?

Answer. Because they say they are above the north. They look upon a man from the north as a mean and despicable wretch, a Yankee. There is nothing so contemptuous or opprobrious, in their estimation, as the term "Yankee." It is the concentration of everything mean and despicable; and if we cannot overcome that feeling by sending capital, and brains, and muscle down there, we will yet be a divided country. At present there is considerable northern capital in Richmond; and men will come up and cringe and fawn for the purpose of borrowing money. A president of a bank there told me himself that they would come up and cringe for the purpose of borrowing money, and then would not speak to the man on the street of whom they got it. Capital has not yet begun to exercise much influence there. A great deal of capital which had been taken there has been withdrawn, owing to the animosity exhibited on the part of the people there. Those who took it there have left, feeling that they could not get along.

Question. Among capitalists who have thus attempted to take their money into Virginia, what is the feeling in regard to their obtaining justice from the courts as they are administered there?

Answer. As the courts have been established very recently there, I do not know that I ought to give an opinion upon that subject. But knowing what the feelings of the people are, I can readily anticipate what the result will be; it cannot be otherwise. But as they have had little or no opportunity as yet to show what their course will be in that respect, I, perhaps, had better not express an opinion.

Question. What is your impression as regards the conviction of rebels for treason by a Virginia jury? Could a jury be found in Virginia that would convict a man of treason?

Answer. I have not the slightest idea in the world that it could be done; it would be a farce to attempt any such thing.

Question. How do the people of Virginia treat the emancipated negroes?

Answer. I do not think there is a general feeling of aggression towards the negroes. The more intelligent people there, those who have landed estates, need their labor. Being dependent upon them for labor, they see the necessity of employing them, and are disposed to get along with them. All of the people, however, are extremely reluctant to grant to the negro his civil rights—those privileges that pertain to freedom, the protection of life, liberty, and property before the laws, the right to testify in the courts, &c. They are all very reluctant to concede that; and if it is ever done, it will be because they are forced to do it. They are reluctant even to consider and treat the negro as a free man, to let him have his half of the sidewalk or the street crossing. They cannot get over their prejudices against him, or have not as yet. Among the lower classes of the whites there is a spirit of aggression against the negro; they are disposed to ban the negro, to kick him and cuff him, and threaten him with what they will do as soon as the Yankees go away.

Question. Is this feeling of dislike of the negro more intense and bitter with the lower classes of whites than with the upper?

Answer. I think that, as a rule, even the more intelligent classes cannot look upon the negro in any other light than a negro. Their feeling may, perhaps, be more deep; and while they are willing to treat him well—not to abuse him physically—they do not accord to him civil rights. The very question of according civil rights to a negro is something very repugnant to them, something at which they revolt from the very bottom of their souls. With the lower classes—I speak now more particularly of the city of Richmond—probably the feeling does not exist to such an extent in the rural districts—there is an impulsive feeling of aggression—a desire to hit the negro out of the way. They do not think about his rights; they do not appear to know what it means; only they feel that the negro has something now that he did not have before; that he is putting on airs. And a great many of the negroes are inclined to take the thing in their own hands; they are not disposed to be imposed upon by those people, if they can have half a show to defend themselves.

Question. Can you think of any motive which would induce the white population of that region to permit the negro to have the right of suffrage?

Answer. No, sir; they will not do it, unless they are compelled to do so—at least not for years. I do not know what motive would induce them to do it now; it must be some great compulsion. I have seen the proposed amendment to the Constitution introduced by the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. My present impression is, that should that amendment be adopted, they would lose a portion of their representation before they would allow the negro to vote.

Question. State, in general terms, what is the condition of the colored population in your district and its vicinity in respect to good order, industry, and willingness to labor and earn a living, if treated fairly and paid reasonably.

Answer. They are getting along there fully as well as could be expected. The affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau have been very well managed, so far as it has come under my observation. I have no doubt of the disposition of the freedmen to work. Of course, take any class of slaves as numerous as were those of the south and remove from them the restraints under which they have always lived, and there will be a great many lawless, idle people among them who will be inclined to prey upon the community; but I have no doubt at all that the mass of the freedmen will soon learn what it is to take care of themselves. I have talked with a great many men down there who have employed a large number of negroes, and I have yet to come across the first case, where the negro has been impressed with the confidence that his employer was willing to accord to him all his civil rights as a free man, that there was any difficulty at all. In those instances where there has been trouble, and the negro has gone off and left the place, I have found the employers to be impracticable men. As I said before, they could not forget that the negro had been a slave. They might not be disposed to punish them or beat them; but there was something in their conduct which excited in the mind of the negro that he had not accorded to him all the privileges of his new status, and the consequence was that the negro was discontented, was not so controllable, and was disposed to wander off and leave his work.

Question. Owing to his want of faith in his employer?

Answer. Yes, sir. And then I think there is another cause which may, perhaps, tend to create some discontentedness. No man likes to labor for a contingency. The negroes were necessarily compelled to do so, because the farmers were poor and had no money to pay them. They were consequently employed upon the contingency of receiving a portion of the crop; that was in the future, and the negro could not see it. That, combined with a distrust of his employer, tended to make the negro discontented; but in every instance where he has been paid his wages at the end of every month he has been contented.

Question. Are there many negroes who own property, real or personal?

Answer. There are a great many; I cannot say what per centage.

Question. Do any of them own farms?

Answer. I think very few of them own farms; it was not permitted much under the old system.

Question. Are you aware of any combination among the white proprietors by which the negroes are prevented from becoming the purchasers of land?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Do you know of any combination in regard to the employment and wages of negroes?

Answer. Not in my district. I understood there was in the lower part of the State; but, being outside of my district, it was a matter about which I did not inquire.

Question. Will you state any other facts which occur to you as being important in this connexion?

Answer. I do not know but I have been over the whole ground pretty nearly.

Question. What military force have you now in Richmond?

Answer. They have just taken away a part of my force, and that is one reason why I desire to go back immediately. My force now has probably been reduced to about five hundred troops.

Question. Stationed in Richmond?

Answer. Yes, sir. Just in proportion as we have withdrawn from the control of civil affairs have the people expressed their discontent and contempt publicly. It has got so now that actually as disloyal speeches are made, and as disloyal articles published in the papers, as ever there was at any time; and that is increasing just in proportion as we relax our control and authority.

Question. Do you not perceive among the whites of the section where you are, a deep sense of mortification and chagrin at the fact of their having been overcome in war? Is it not a deep-seated and very bitter feeling of disappointment?

Answer. Yes, sir, undoubtedly.

Question. And of mortified pride?

Answer. They have a very deep feeling of disappointment, a very deep feeling. But it never struck me that they felt it as we would, because they have so often confessed to me what was unpleasant for me to hear, what I did not wish to hear, and what I tried to repress them from saying. They would say to me, "Well, you have conquered us; we are whipped." Now, I think if a man of generous soul felt deep mortification he would keep quiet on the subject. I have always thought that their feeling of mortification was more superficial than otherwise. But I think their disappointment was very great in not attaining success. Their admissions six months ago were much more general and much more candid than they are now.

Question. Much more frank?

Answer. Yes, sir. Immediately after the surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox I was sent to Lynchburg to take possession of that city; and I came all the way with my troops from there to Richmond, and I talked with a great many people in the country and in the city, and it was my conviction at that time that the people were disposed to accept the results of the war, but that they were not very clear as to what those results were, or all that they involved. If some of their own people had stepped forward then and told them what they would have to do, they would have yielded a ready acquiescence to almost anything.

Question. What is your profession?

Answer. I have never had any profession but that of a soldier.

Question. Were you educated at West Point?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How long have you been in the service?

Answer. Ten years last June.

Question. What is your age?

Answer. I am thirty-three years of age.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Judge John C. Underwood sworn and examined:

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. At Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of that State?

Answer. I am not.

Question. How long have you resided in the State of Virginia?

Answer. About twenty years.

Question. What official position, if any, do you now occupy?

Answer. I am the United States district judge for Virginia.

Question. How long have you held that office?

Answer. About three years.

Question. During that time in what portion of Virginia have you resided?

Answer. In Alexandria, or near there.

Question. Will you state how the war has left matters in Virginia?

Answer. It has left great bitterness of feeling between those who are loyal and those who adhered to the confederacy; and I think that bitterness has increased within the last two months. It certainly has in Alexandria, and in those parts of the State with which I am most acquainted.

Question. Can you state any incident that has occurred within your district as evidence of disloyal feeling, or of the feeling of bitterness to which you have referred?

Answer. I will mention a fact that came under my official observation last week. A Mr. Minor F. Davis acted as a guide and scout for the Union army during a long period of the war, and was and is a thoroughly loyal man. He was imprisoned in Prince William county jail, under the charge of larceny. The sheriff who held him was a rebel, and has been recently elected sheriff of that county. Application was made to me for a writ of habeas corpus, the affidavit setting forth that Davis had been imprisoned for guiding some Union forces, so that they succeeded in capturing a band of guerillas in that county, some fifteen or twenty in number, and from these guerillas their horses were taken. That was the only act of which Davis was accused. The affidavit also averred that the sheriff who held him in custody was, at the time Davis rendered this assistance to the Union forces, in open armed hostility to the government; that he had since been elected sheriff of the county. I issued the writ, and Davis has been discharged from custody. About the time my marshal got there the provost marshal got there, and I think Davis was really discharged by the provost marshal.

I will mention this fact also: under decrees of confiscation rendered in my court, sales of property have been made. Several of the persons who became purchasers have recently been proceeded against in the State courts—the circuit and county courts—by way of ejectment, in order to put the old parties in possession of the property thus sold. The purchasers have been prosecuted in several instances. They are annoyed in that way, and in one or two instances they have actually been ejected by the local authority from their purchases.

Question. During the lifetime of the original owner?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. That is, the judgments of the State courts have overruled the judgments of your court under the confiscation act of Congress?

Answer. I think it has been done generally by some evasion. I do not think they have done it in direct terms. There are a number of prosecutions of that kind now pending, and one or two I understand have been decided. But I do not know the precise grounds on which the decisions have been rendered.

Question. Do you find it practicable to get a jury of loyal men in your court?

Answer. Not unless it is what might be called a packed jury. I do not believe, from what I have seen, that a Union man could expect to obtain justice in the courts of the State at this time; certainly not if his opponent was a rebel. The bitterness of feeling is very great, and I think the jury would be at least nine-tenths rebel, and the influence of the court would be the same.

Question. Do you think it practicable to call a jury in Virginia that would convict a man of treason?

Answer. It would be perfectly idle to think of such a thing. They boast of their treason, and ten or eleven out of the twelve on any jury, I think, would say that Lee was almost equal to Washington, and was the noblest man in the State, and they regard every man who has committed treason with more favor than any man in the State who has remained loyal to the government.

Question. Do you refer to the whole State?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Would those prejudices against a Union man, and particularly a northern man, operate so far with a Virginia jury as to lead them to deny him ordinary justice in a matter of private right?

Answer. I think they might. I will mention this fact: there was a native of Virginia who was a paymaster in our army. In 1860 he was the only man in his county who voted for Mr. Lincoln. When he left the service he settled his accounts in a most satisfactory manner. In November last he was shot down and killed by a returned rebel surgeon in the streets of Alexandria. Believing that it would be utterly impossible to prosecute him successfully in the State courts, I applied to General Angur to take cognizance of the case, and bring the offender to trial. But the general told me that the State having been so recently turned over to the civil authorities he did not feel that it would be proper for him to take cognizance of the case; and the murderer of Major Dixon has not yet been punished, but is still at large.

On Christmas day there was a riot in Alexandria, in which one negro was killed, and a number of others were seriously wounded. In that case General Angur thought it proper to institute a trial of the offenders by military commission, and they are now undergoing trial.

I mention these facts to show, what, in my judgment, is the truth of the matter, that the condition of the loyal white man in Virginia at this time is worse even than the condition of the colored man, inasmuch as the colored man is protected by military authority, while the white man is not. Therefore the condition of the colored man is much more endurable than that of the loyal white man.

Question. What is the feeling among the people of Virginia toward the freedmen? State any example that may occur to your mind to illustrate that feeling.

Answer. I think the feeling was well expressed by one of the most intelligent, and, I may say, one of the most candid rebel gentlemen of Alexandria. We were engaged in friendly conversation in my office one day, in the course of which conversation he remarked, "Sooner than see the colored people raised to a legal and political equality, the southern people would prefer their total annihilation." I had regarded him as well informed, and almost as candid a man as we have among the rebels.

Question. Have you heard similar expressions from white persons of lower condition?

Answer. Soon after the Christmas riot in Alexandria, one man remarked to me that he "would kill a nigger as soon as he could see him." I think the first man expressed the sentiment of the educated; the last expressed the sentiment of the vulgar and uneducated, especially of the returned rebel soldiers.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there has been and still is any concert or conspiracy among the freedmen to produce disturbances in the State of Virginia, to seize the lands of their masters, or do any other illegal act to the prejudice of society or of individuals?

Answer. I am confident there is no such design. I certainly know the sentiment of the leading colored men there. I am president of the Freedmen's Relief Association of Alexandria, and I have had intercourse with the leading colored men upon various subjects, churches, schools, &c., and I have contributed as liberally as I could to the building of school-houses and churches for the colored people, and I think I have their confidence.

Question. Have you any ground to suppose that any such concert or conspiracy exists or has existed?

Answer. I am satisfied no such conspiracy has ever existed; on the contrary, I have found those people very peaceful and law-abiding.

Question. Do you suppose this disposition on the part of the whites pervades the State of Virginia generally?

Answer. I think it does. And I think the principal reason for it is the assistance the negroes rendered the Union cause during the rebellion. When I was holding court at Richmond recently, I had a conversation with one of the leading men in that city, and he said to me that the enlistment of negro troops by the United States was the turning-point of the rebellion; that it was the heaviest blow they ever received. He remarked that when the negroes deserted their masters, and showed a general disposition to do so and join the forces of the United States, intelligent men everywhere saw that the matter was ended. I have often heard a similar expression of opinion from others, and I am satisfied that the origin of this bitterness towards the negro is this belief among leading men that their weight thrown into the scale decided the contest against them. However the fact may be, I think that such is a pretty well settled conclusion among leading rebels in Virginia.

Question. Have you any knowledge of, or any reason to suspect the existence of, a conspiracy or plan in Virginia or elsewhere in the rebel States to reopen the war or to set up another rebellion?

Answer. I have not. On the contrary, although they are now quite as rebellious in spirit as they have been at any time, I believe their present design is to attempt to accomplish their purpose through the ballot-box.

Question. What is their scheme? What is their idea?

Answer. I think I understand their scheme. I think it is their expectation that there will be some split in the Union party; which will enable them, in concert with the democratic party of the north, to succeed by voting better than by fighting.

Question. Let me put a hypothetical case to you. Suppose that by means of a combination with the so-called democratic party, alias copperhead party, alias conservative party, they should again obtain political power in Congress, and in the executive department; suppose this to be the result of a combination between the ex-rebel party in the south and this so-called democratic party in the north; what would be the effect of that ascendancy upon the rebel States? What measures would they resort to?

Answer. They would attempt either to accomplish a repudiation of the national debt, or an acknowledgment of the confederate debt, and compensation for their negroes. I think these would be their leading measures, their leading demands; and I think if either the rebel debt could be placed upon an equality with the national debt, or both could be alike repudiated, they would be satisfied. But the leading spirits would claim compensation for their negroes, and would expect to get it by such a combination.

Question. Suppose they should not succeed in their scheme of repudiating the national debt, or in their other scheme of the assumption of the rebel debt; what would they finally do, provided they had the power?

Answer. If they had the power they would undoubtedly again go out of the Union, because being aristocratic and not republican in their tastes and feelings, they would greatly prefer some other form of government. I have for twenty years past known that that was the feeling among the leading men. I think they always would have preferred an aristocratic government to any other.

Question. What degree of cordiality exists generally among the people of Virginia towards northern men and loyal people?

Answer. There seems to be an almost total separation, socially, politically, religiously, and educationally. For instance, we have five Union churches and five churches which are recognized as rebel churches in the city of Alexandria—all white churches; and then we have six colored churches there, that are intensely loyal; and there is hardly ever an instance where a man of one political feeling goes to a church of a different political belief. I do not know of half a dozen instances in Alexandria.

Question. How are well-bred northern men treated by the rebels when they visit Alexandria or other parts of Virginia?

Answer. I do not know that they are treated at all; they are simply let alone, according to my impression. I do not think they are treated offensively. The Union element is very considerable in Alexandria—enough so to be respected.

Question. There is no disposition to form social alliances or acquaintance with them on the part of the rebels?

Answer. The separation is very pronounced indeed.

Question. They are rather disposed to be a separate people?

Answer. It would seem so, at all events. Past recollections seem to be very controlling in their social relations.

Question. What, in your judgment, has been the effect of the liberality exercised by the President of the United States in granting pardons and amnesties to the rebels of Virginia?

Answer. Well, to say the least, they have in most instances been ungrateful.

Question. Has that liberality and kindness of the President rather increased than diminished the respect and regard of the rebel community for the government of the United States?

Answer. I think it has encouraged their hopes of ultimate success in obtaining power in this government, and that or some other cause has increased their vindictiveness towards Union men, and their ill treatment of them. I think that has been the cause.

Question. Do you think that has been one of the causes of the increased malignity of the rebels towards Union men?

Answer. I think it has been.

The examination of the witness was here suspended; but subsequently resumed on the same day, and concluded as follows:

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. State whether you are a member elect of the Senate of the United States?

Answer. I have been elected by the legislature of Virginia to the long term in the Senate.

Question. When were you elected?

Answer. I was elected about a year ago to fill the vacancy about to occur in the Senate by the retirement of Mr. Carlile, for six years.

Question. State what is your own feeling in regard to the readmission of the rebel States into the Union; I wish you to make a clean breast of it.

Answer. Of course I have a strong personal interest in the admission, at least, of members of Congress elect; but that is entirely overpowered by the conviction that the immediate admission of the southern States would produce unpleasant consequences. I fear that it would be fatal to the peace of the country.

Question. What is the general feeling among the Virginians in regard to negro suffrage in that State?

Answer. I think the loyal men, who I suppose do not amount to anything like one-fourth of the white people, are in favor of it. The loyal men are, so far as I know, almost invariably in favor of equal suffrage.

Question. Would they limit the right of suffrage by any qualification?

Answer. I think there is some difference of opinion on that subject among the loyalists. Some would prefer to see it limited, either by educational or property qualifications, or by service in the army of the United States; I have heard that opinion expressed frequently.

Question. Would they generally prescribe a property qualification?

Answer. I think that is not so generally favored as either of the others—either education or military service. But I have heard some say that they would like a property qualification; that, however, they would like to see applied as well to whites as to blacks. At present we have no property qualification.

Question. The mode of voting in Virginia—has it not been, under her law, for ages, vir voce?

Answer. It has been.

Question. Not by ballot?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How do the rebels feel in regard to negroes voting—I mean those who have been rebels?

Answer. Well, sir, I think they are nearly unanimous in their opposition to it.

Question. In case the right of suffrage should be given to the negroes there, is it likely that there will be outrages and disturbances of the public peace, scenes of violence and riot?

Answer. I think that some bad men might perhaps assault negroes when they come to the polls; I think it probable that there would be instances of that kind, but I do not apprehend anything very serious.

Question. Would the rebels themselves, if in authority as municipal officers, preserve the peace with alacrity and defend the negro?

Answer. Well, sir, prejudice is strong against the negro, because they regard him as having turned the scale against them; I think that is a very prevailing notion now, that the negro turned the scale against the rebels. His adherence to the Union cause, and his desertion of the master, naturally produce an unkind feeling against him. That feeling is not universal. I must do some of my rebel acquaintances the justice to say that they consider that the negro was justified in the course he took; that it was human nature to strike for freedom.

Question. In case of hostilities between the United States and one of the first-rate European powers, is it your opinion that the masses of the people of Virginia would stand firmly by the government of the United States and defend it against foreign invaders and foreign hostilities?

Answer. I think their hostility to the conquerors, as they call them, the Yankees—which means everybody from the north—is greater than it is to almost any foreign power, and they would prefer to be associated with any respectable European power, rather than have their present compulsory association with their conquerors.

Question. I infer from your answer that there would be danger of their adhering to the enemies of the country?

Answer. I fear there would be danger of that if they felt it would be safe.

Question. If they thought that it would give them an occasion to escape from the government of the United States, would they or not avail themselves of it?

Answer. I think most of them would; I think their tastes and habits and feelings are all aristocratic, and that they would prefer an aristocracy, or even a monarchy, to a republican government. I speak of the leaders—those who took the States, as they say, out of the Union.

Question. During the civil war has there been any considerable feeling among the Virginians in favor of establishing a monarchy in the confederacy?

Answer. I of course had no association with the leaders during the rebellion; we were separated by two lines of bayonets, and I could not speak as to that.

Question. Speak according to the best information you have derived at that time or since.

Answer. I know that many of them would prefer what they would call a strong government—an aristocracy, a government of the wisest, of the property-holders, of the intelligent, as they would say—to a government of the rabble of the people. I know that that is a very prevailing opinion; I have conversed with leading men on the subject.

Question. What is the standing at present among Virginians of Jefferson Davis, in point of popularity?

Answer. He is not as popular a man as General Lee by any means. He is regarded as their representative man, but I know that he is not really as highly esteemed as some others at the south. There are those who are strongly opposed to him at Richmond; some of the newspapers there were very hostile, particularly the Richmond Examiner.

Question. What are some of the principal defects in his administrative career?

Answer. I think they have complained of his want of firmness, as they called it, and his leniency towards prisoners, more than anything else. I have heard that spoken of; I have heard them accuse him of selfishness; and a variety of defects are alleged against him by his opponents. He certainly is not as popular as General Lee.

Question. Could either be convicted of treason in Virginia?

Answer. Oh, no; unless you had a packed jury.

Question. Could you manage to pack a jury there?

Answer. I think it would be very difficult, but it could be done; I could pack a jury to convict him; I know very earnest, ardent Union men in Virginia.

Question. Do you think of any other matters that you deem it necessary to mention on this examination?

Answer. I do not know that I do. I know a man named Joseph Stiles who acted as a scout in Virginia, and who has since been indicted for assisting the forces of the United States in taking horses belonging to guerillas. That is treated as horse-stealing in the State courts of Virginia.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Lewis McKenzie sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. You reside in Alexandria?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was born there, and have always lived there.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am a merchant, and I was a representative in the general assembly of Virginia for three sessions. I was in the assembly that called the convention of 1861. I have been elected to Congress twice; but they never gave me a seat.

Question. You were not a member of the insurgent legislature of Virginia?

Answer. I was a member of the legislature that called the convention of 1861.

Question. That was a loyal legislature?

Answer. A majority of the body were not loyal.

Question. Have you served in any legislatures of Virginia since 1861?

Answer. Oh, no, sir; I left the general assembly on the 4th of April, 1861. We adjourned that day sine die.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance throughout the commonwealth of old Virginia?

Answer. I am pretty well acquainted throughout the commonwealth. I am president of the London and Hampshire railroad, and if abuse of me in the disloyal papers is evidence of acquaintance with the people, there can be very little doubt of it.

Question. In general terms, what is the state of feeling among the rebel people of Virginia towards the government of the United States ?

Answer. I will tell you. President Lincoln sent me a pass to go to Richmond two or three days before his unfortunate murder. I went down to Richmond, and was in Richmond when the news of the massacre came. I thought the temper of the people was really humble. They seemed to be humble and rather kindly disposed, and when the news came of the death of Mr. Lincoln it created a very great sympathy. Although they were whipped, still they were trembling in their shoes from an apprehension that Mr. Johnson, whom they despised as a southern Union man, would execute his purpose, so often indicated before, during, and since the war, in reference to the punishment due to traitors. I thought that the people were getting kindly disposed towards the government, and had made up their minds that Mr. Lincoln was a much better man, more kindly disposed towards them than they ought to have expected under the circumstances, and were satisfied that their State government would be restored; still I know there was a great deal of bitterness towards the government of the United States. I stayed there a week, (this was in April, 1865.) I was anxious for Governor Peirpoint's government to be sustained, and I did all I could to open the door for him. I went down partly for that purpose. I found a very great unwillingness on the part of the people; but still, before I left, they found there was no hope of anything else, and they finally concluded that it would be better for Peirpoint to come there. He did not come for some time after; he stayed in Alexandria waiting for movements on the part of the President and others. I went to Richmond shortly after Governor Peirpoint, and I found the former enemies of the government coming in crowds to the governor to advise him that, under the Alexandria constitution, it would be impossible to organize a legislature. They were anxious for rapid reconstruction, and for the removal of the test oath and other restrictions upon the eligibility to office contained in the Alexandria constitution, which were great stumbling-blocks to the former enemies of the government: and I thought the best thing he could do was to call the legislature together if he could only get ten loyal men, and if he could get even one or two or three more every year, so as to organize a State government, but at any rate that it should be organized upon a Union basis. After leaving Richmond I heard, when going down the James river, that Governor Peirpoint had called the members of the general assembly together, and when I got to Alexandria I found the call in the hands of some of the people. It struck me with great surprise. When that legislature went to Richmond they altered the constitutional provisions in such a manner that I found that the loyal men of the State were to be totally sacrificed and turned over to the power of the secessionists. Still I had some hope that the people would be favorably inclined towards the government, and that the kindness shown to them by the Executive would probably have a good effect. A great many people called upon me to recommend their pardons, and I, having been somewhat of a prominent man in that part of the State, recommended a great many for pardon, and the pardons were obtained; but I am sorry to say, from my experience of things, that this policy has not had a good effect. I am satisfied that the indiscriminate pardoning system adopted by the President has produced a very bad effect, and that the State of Virginia is in a worse condition now than it was last April. That has grown out of two facts which were the cause of all our troubles during the war. One is this: start from Alexandria or Washington or Baltimore, and go down the bay, and through the south, and you find the New York Daily News and the Baltimore Daily Gazette—rabid secession papers—in circulation at every point, and all over the State. There is scarcely a secessionist in Alexandria or along the line down to Tennessee who does not have these papers. Then we have the disloyal sheets of Virginia; and the minds of the people are poisoned and disaffected in that way. It was so during the war, and it is still kept up. In Alexandria one of the newspaper sellers tells me that he sells ten copies of the Tribune, five copies of the Times, one hundred and fifty copies of the Herald, and two hundred and fifty copies of the News, and the numbers run all along in that way.

Question. These two papers, the New York News and Baltimore Daily Gazette, are understood to be what kind of papers ?

Answer. The meanest, awfulest secession papers, unfriendly to the government, and the people are constantly pilled with that kind of fuel. It seems to me that there are twice as many papers in the State since the war as there were before; so that under such influences I do not wonder that the people are unfriendly to the government. Then they have been spoiled and ruined also by the policy of the President of the United States.

Question. What, in your judgment, has been the effect of the so-called liberal policy of the President of the United States in extending pardons and amnesty to rebels ?

Answer. Decidedly unfavorable.

Question. Unfavorable to what ?

Answer. Unfavorable to the cause of the Union and to the restoration of the Union sentiment in the State. I have no doubt about it. I am sorry to say it, because these people were friends of mine.

Question. What opinion or feeling does that liberality seem to create among the people there ?

Answer. A feeling of contempt. It grows out of the fact that these people have been treated better than they expected; that has had its effect. Then they are constantly influenced by the hope that their disloyal members will get into Congress, and they expect to form a coalition with the northern democrats and copperheads.

Question. Suppose they get the ascendancy; what will they do?

Answer. They will repudiate the public debt; that is what they will do; that is what they want to do. In Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina, when the people sell their cotton for greenbacks, they go right to the broker's office and buy gold for the greenbacks, paying four per cent. more than gold is worth in the New York market; they do this because they have no confidence in the United States government; they say it will be the same again as it has been, and after they will have saved two or three cotton crops you will find that two-thirds of the specie of the country will be in the cotton States. My own opinion is that they are waiting and hoping for a restoration of the Bourbons in 1863.

Question. By the Bourbons you mean the copperhead party?

Answer. Yes, sir; I mean the copperhead party of the north and the secession party of the south, who are brethren; of course they always were brethren; I have a perfect horror of them myself; but I would not do any injustice to the people; still, that is God's truth.

Question. Suppose they succeed in reaching that point of ascendancy in the government of the United States; what do those men in Virginia propose to do now—go out of the Union, or to have another civil war?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What are they going to do?

Answer. They expect to take possession of the government of the United States. Let them have a majority to-day and they will soon let you see what they will do. They will join with Fernando Wood and those gentlemen of the north, and will form a party to repudiate the national debt; they will not pay the interest on the public debt; and suppose there should be a war between the United States and Mexico, you would get but few men to assist you from Virginia to the Texas line.

Question. You are speaking now from your own observation?

Answer. From what I see going on now; and what you see in Virginia is pretty much the same everywhere else. You might meet occasionally a gentleman who feels kindly disposed towards the government, but there are very few Union men in the south.

Question. In your opinion what proportion of truly loyal men are there in Virginia?

Answer. The district where I was a candidate runs from Frederick down to Prince William, and embraces the counties of Frederick, Warren, Shenandoah, Fauquier, Alexandria, Fairfax, Prince William, &c., I think eleven counties in all. I had supposed from the kindness I had exhibited to that people all along that they would have given me a tolerably decent vote. I was born in the State and have always lived in the State. I used to beat everybody in my district for the legislature; and before the war, I was a tolerably popular fellow, because I was an industrious man and worked pretty hard. I got about 1,900 votes in the district, and I was beaten about 3,000 by a secessionist. The county of Frederick did very well, giving me, perhaps, 600 votes. I got a tolerably decent vote in Loudon county, 400 perhaps, and about 400 in Alexandria. I think that in the county of Fauquier, Billy Smith's county, I got only nineteen votes; that is the South Carolina of Virginia. These people would not vote for me because I was a Union man; of course they would not; they told me openly at the polls that they did not intend to vote for anybody who was a Union man. There are some very good Union men in the State, but they were to be found among the masses of the people chiefly; mostly hard-working Union men; for instance, in the town of Winchester there are very respectable, sensible, hard-working men, who are Union men, and you will find that pretty much all the Union men are of the middle class of people; but there is no hope in the Union men of Virginia. I had hoped myself that the rebels would have left the State, would have gone to Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, or to Mexico, and that their places would be supplied with honest, industrious northern settlers; but the rebels are coming right back, and I do not see any hope in the world for the Union men without the immediate aid of Congress or the President. I do not know what is to become of them. We had a meeting at Alexandria the night before last, and we are going to memorialize Congress to put Virginia in a territorial condition. I do not know whether Congress will have the power to do that, and I suppose the President will be opposed to it. The proposition is pretty radical, but the evil requires a radical cure. The difficulty about the provisional government is simply this: We have had experience of it in Governor Peirpoint; that gentleman did as well as he could under the circumstances. If you put a provisional governor there, the same people who control Governor Peirpoint will have the control. You have got to commence at the foundation and build up. This is my opinion about it; it is the unanimous opinion of pretty much all the Union men of Alexandria, and it is going to be the opinion of the Union men throughout Virginia.

Question. How do the rebels in the neighborhood feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. The Union whites treat them remarkably well; they are paying them fair wages. In 1860 and 1861 I was a large merchant in Alexandria, shipping a very large amount of goods, and I have had to do with negroes all my life. The price of labor in Virginia then for field-hands was $120 to $130 a year, and $70 a year for a woman. In addition to that the master, who hired them, furnished them with clothes, provisions, house, and fuel, and at Christmas the bond was paid for his wages. That was after the price of cotton had advanced, and when the negroes had advanced in South Carolina to $1,000 and $1,500. Now, at the close of the war, employers are only willing to pay these people from six to seven or eight dollars a month, or a hundred dollars a year, out of which these laboring people have to buy their clothes and pay their doctors' bills, while the price of clothing is double what it was in 1860. I employed, three months ago, from eighty to a hundred of these freedmen to work on land I have got this side of Drainesville. They came in at Christmas, when I paid them their wages. I give them seventy-five cents a cord for cutting pine wood, and supply them with a month's provisions in advance. They all work cheerfully and pleasantly. They went back after Christmas, and have remained there ever since. There is no difficulty about the freedmen working, but they work better for gentlemen who treat them kindly than they work for rough people. If you pay them and treat them kindly there is no difficulty about the negro working. The only difficulty about it is with overseers who become proprietors, and between whom and the colored race there is a natural antagonism. That is the trouble I apprehend about all this affair. These people and the miserable newspapers will destroy the colored people finally. My own opinion is, that whenever the day comes for colored men to vote, they will vote for nobody but gentlemen. They are not going to vote for pot house politicians. It will be the most conservative vote ever given.

Question. What is the disposition of the freedmen in your neighborhood in regard to education?

Answer. They are very smart; very anxious for education.

Question. Eager for education?

Answer. Very much so.

Question. Are there any facilities for going to school?

Answer. Oh, yes; there are a good many free schools in Alexandria.

Question. What is the feeling of the whites generally in regard to the education of the colored people?

Answer. The rebels are not in favor of it; they are opposed to it.

Question. What is the feeling of that class of people in regard to negroes voting?

Answer. They are very much opposed to it. They think it a very great outrage.

Question. In case the negro should be allowed to vote, how would he be treated at the polls in voting?

Answer. I reckon if the darkies ever get to vote some of these fellows will want their votes, but they will not get them. I reckon there will be no difficulty on that head; but I do not think it would do to remove the Freedmen's Bureau from Virginia at present.

Question. What would be the effect of that removal?

Answer. It would be very disastrous to the colored people.

Question. Would it not have the effect of reducing them to a condition worse even than slavery itself?

Answer. I do not know about that. I am not prepared to say. The effect would be very injurious, and I think it would be very unsafe to do so.

Question. Has not a bill passed the senate of Virginia requiring a five years' residence in the State before a person can vote?

Answer. The bill has not passed. It was reported by committees of both houses; but I think the legislature got alarmed about it, and has put back the provision of the old law requiring a two years' residence. The object of the five years' limitation was to prevent northern people from voting there, and to keep the power in their own hands. They have taken our Alexandria charter away pretty much, merely to get power in their hands; and that is the fear I have about this Congress.

Question. They do not intend to permit any immigration from the north?

Answer. They do not want northern immigrants to vote there anyhow, and do not want them there at all, if they can help it.

Question. How are their commercial relations with the northern people? Are they friendly?

Answer. I do not know. The secessionists or disloyal people hold very little intercourse with the loyal people after their pardons are obtained. They all worship in the same church.

Question. The rebels go to rebel churches, and the Union men to Union churches?

Answer. Yes, sir. It is a great misfortune. I do not know how it is to be settled. I think you will find that Alexandria is a very fair exponent of Virginia.

Question. You think that these disloyal newspapers do a great deal of mischief?

Answer. I think they are the cause of all our present difficulties. I think the war was prolonged two years by them. During the time that General McClellan was in command in Virginia the proportion of newspapers sold in the camp was one thousand Heralds, five hundred copies of the Daily News, ten copies of the Tribune, and five copies of the Times. What could you expect? You could not get the government to say that these copperhead papers should not be sold in the army. If it had stopped their circulation I think the war would have been closed long ago, unless it was that God did not intend it to be closed sooner.

Question. If the rebels had the opportunity, would they assume the payment of the rebel debt?

Answer. Why of course. All the rebel States would if they could do it. And I do not know what constitutional amendment can be devised to prevent them. The difficulty to be apprehended is, that if these people are permitted to come in and effect a coalition with the democrats of the north they will finally control the government, and will certainly never pay the federal debt. That is my opinion. The government ought to take care of the public debt.

Question. Would they not also overturn the whole system of emancipation if they could?

Answer. I really cannot say about that; but they hate the government of the United States bitterly. There is no question about that. They have no love for the government of the United States. It is a great misfortune.

Question. To them?

Answer. Yes, and to the government.

Question. Do you think the rebel people in Virginia and elsewhere respect the power of the United States?

Answer. No, sir; but they are afraid of it.

Question. Is there anything about the United States which they respect?

Answer. I do not know that there is. They will give the government trouble some of these days. They will try to get into power before 1868.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

George S. Smith sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I am now residing in Maryland. I am a citizen of Virginia, but am temporarily residing in Maryland.

Question. In what part of Virginia have you been residing?

Answer. In Culpeper county.

Question. What is your business?

Answer. Farming.

Question. How long did you reside in Culpeper county?

Answer. I moved into Culpeper county in 1846 from Spottsylvania county.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; I am a native of the State of New Hampshire.

Question. You must, of course, be pretty well acquainted with the condition of affairs in Culpeper county, and the state of public feeling there towards the United States?

Answer. I have had very good opportunities of becoming so. I am very well acquainted throughout the State.

Question. According to your observation, what is the state of feeling among the disloyal portion of the people of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I think it is hostile.

Question. In what sense is it hostile?

Answer. I do not think that they will yield obedience to the government of the United States any further than they are compelled to do. None whatever willingly.

Question. To what particular classes does this feeling attach itself?

Answer. I think to the leading classes; what we call representative men. I think the common class of people could be handled very easily. The trouble is with our leading men, and with the newspapers.

Question. Among the leading classes is there, properly speaking, any attachment to the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not know of an instance—not an instance.

Question. If they could have their own way, what would they do?

Answer. If they could have their own way, they would certainly separate. There is nothing that would induce the south to live with the north if they could have their own way. That is a settled fact.

Question. You mean to be understood as saying that there is a hatred on the part of the southern people to the north?

Answer. Yes, sir; a perfect hatred.

Question. What do you regard as the principal cause of that hatred?

Answer. Education. They have been educated up to it. I have lived among them nearly thirty years, and it was not so when I first went there. The people on the stage of action now have been educated up to it. They believe in themselves as a superior class of people, and that northern people are a low-lived, degraded class of people.

Question. In what respect do they regard themselves as superior?

Answer. Intellectually.

Question. Morally?

Answer. I do not know that I can say that.

Question. Physically?

Answer. They did believe physically.

Question. Has that feeling become, in any degree, changed or modified as a result of the war?

Answer. I do not know that I am capable of answering that question properly. I went into Richmond with our army. There I met with a great many gentlemen of my former acquaintance—influential, leading men. They then gave up everything. They were very plastic indeed; you could have moulded them in any way. I have since met with them repeatedly, and they have gone back again to their first notions. They now say that they do not regret anything they did; that if they had to do it over again they would do the same thing. They only regret their want of success. Their object in going into it is just as strong now as it was.

Question. What effect has the President's liberal policy toward the rebels and rebel States had, with reference to the increase or diminution of loyal feeling towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I think it has brought forward a class of men as representative men, who would not otherwise have come forward. I think it has brought forward the original leaders of the rebellion, who would not have sought position if they had not thought they could get it through this policy.

Question. Has that policy of the President increased or diminished the respect of the slaveholding class of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not know, for I do not think they ever had any respect for it.

Question. Then I am to infer that it has not increased that respect?

Answer. Certainly it has not.

Question. Speaking of that policy, has it, or has it not, made that class more contemptuous towards the United States than they were before?

Answer. I should think it has.

Question. I mean in their expression?

Answer. Yes, I think it has.

Question. How has that result arisen?

Answer. From the leniency of the government. They did not expect it. The representative men of the south have had power and are ambitious of power. When the rebellion was first brought to a close, they did not expect that they could reckon upon that power any more. They thought that they had lost it, and that they would have to step aside. But when a mild policy was resorted to, and inducements were held out to them to come back, they thought there was an opportunity for them again to step back and regain what they thought they had lost; and they took that opportunity. It has brought in a different class of men, who would not have come in if that policy had not been resorted to.

Question. What, in general, are the schemes which that class of southern people now have in view?

Answer. To overthrow the general government and to repudiate the national debt.

Question. And to assume the payment of the rebel debt, think you?

Answer. I do not know that I can venture to say that because I have different views from most people respecting that rebel debt. I do not think that the masses of the people at the south could be induced to vote to pay that debt. The men who have been in the army receiving $13 a month could not be degraded so low as to make them tax themselves to pay at the rate of sixty or seventy dollars for one, for the benefit of a few speculators.

Question. You think they have in view still the overthrow of the government of the United States. What are the means by which they propose to accomplish it?

Answer. By political combinations. I talked with a great many of the leading politicians, and they say they want to try to accomplish by stratagem what they failed to accomplish by war.

Question. Let us hear what their plan is.

Answer. I think that they have a great many friends among the democracy of the north, if I may use plain language.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, use plain language.

WITNESS. They say that the large proportion of the national debt is owned at the east, and that the west, when they are taxed to pay it, will begin to squirm—will be dissatisfied; and they think that with their peculiar ingenuity they can influence the west to go with them and assist them in repudiating the federal debt and establishing their independence, perhaps.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there are combinations in Virginia or elsewhere in the south, any secret associations, having such an object in view?

Answer. I do not know of any. I believe, however, that is the fixed determination of every one of the leading men.

Question. And you think that their general purpose is to get rid of the authority of the United States?

Answer. I do.

Question. What, in brief terms, have been your means of knowledge?

Answer. I have been connected with the internal improvements of Virginia before the war. I have been a contractor on some internal improvements and have become well acquainted with some of the leading men of the State in that way. The first year or year and a half of the war I was inside the rebel lines. General Pope let me out when he came to Culpeper. Since then I have been with the federal army in Virginia. Wherever the army has been

I have been. I have met with a great many Virginians, men of influence. Not being subject to military control, I would drift around, and these people would talk more freely with me than with an officer, and I could get their opinions in that respect. I have not met with a gentleman of influence or position who is not just as determined in his purpose now as when he first entered the rebellion, that is, to have a separate government if they possibly can get it.

Question. Do you think that the policy of Mr. Johnson has encouraged that purpose?

Answer. I really do, sir.

Question. Do you think that his establishment of State governments under military orders and decrees has had the effect of encouraging that hope of the ultimate independence of the rebel States?

Answer. I think the encouragement held out to them in allowing them to elect their own officers has had a tendency to make them think that they can in time carry out what they failed to carry out by the sword.

Question. What effect has that policy had on the Union men?

Answer. It has diminished them in this way: it has made a great many men who were Union men cloak it over; they dare not say anything. I do not know that the cases are innumerable, but they are very common. Union men who have been speaking to me have said, "Mr. Smith, please to say nothing about what has passed between you and me as to politics. My property is here, my life is here, my associations are here, my business is here, and I do not want to have it known that I ever said anything in favor of the federal government." They want to cloak it up. They dare not at this day have it known that they are Union men.

Question. Do you think, then, that that policy has brought upon the Union element a feeling of despair rather than of courage and hope?

Answer. That is my experience, sir. It has suppressed among the common people a good deal of the Union feeling which was growing up.

Question. Suppose the question was now put in the proper form to the people of Virginia whether they would secede—whether they would go out of the Union; and suppose that there should be no danger of military interference to prevent it, or any effort on the part of the United States to prevent it; what would probably be the result of the vote?

Answer. More than ninety-nine out of every hundred would vote to secede.

Question. Suppose the question should be submitted in the same way to the people of Virginia whether they would pay their just share of the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war: what would be the result of that vote?

Answer. They would vote against it.

Question. Why?

Answer. They think it is unjust. They think it is forced upon them.

Question. Suppose the United States should be engaged in a war with a first-rate foreign power, such as England or France: what would be the conduct of the people and the government of Virginia on such an occasion?

Answer. I think they would study policy in regard to it. I think the leaders, if they thought it was for their interest—that they could gain anything by doing it—would sustain the government; otherwise they would go against it.

Question. Suppose that, at such a moment, there should be a combination and concert between the rebel States, and suppose that that combination should assume, apparently, strength enough to assure success in case they joined the enemies of the United States: what, then, would be their conduct?

Answer. I think they would join them; I am sure they would.

Question. Have you ever talked with any men of influence and position in Virginia, or elsewhere in the slaveholding States, on that subject?

Answer. Not bearing so strongly as that; but, from such conversation as I have had with them, I should certainly think that that would be the course they would pursue. I do not think that there is any loyalty at all in the leading men of the State of Virginia.

Question. In the event of such a war, would you regard these ex-rebel States as elements of strength to the United States, or of weakness?

Answer. Of weakness.

Question. How do they feel generally towards the freedmen?

Answer. Hatred. Their hate, first, is to the citizen Union men; their next hate is to the negro; and their last is to the Yankees, as they call them.

Question. If left to themselves, what would they do with the negro?

Answer. They would entirely extirpate him from the face of the earth. They would first commence with the Union men, and then they would take the negro.

Question. Do you think they would murder the negro?

Answer. I do; and they are doing it every day.

Question. Why should they murder the negro?

Answer. I cannot answer that in any other way than by supposing it owing to human depravity.

Question. They need the negro's labor?

Answer. Yes, sir; but a man's passions go beyond his interests. They always have been the negro's masters; they controlled him; they never acknowledged that he had any rights; he had no rights more than a beast had; I was a slaveholder myself, and I know it. When you come to give the negro his rights, it is very galling to men educated in that way. They cannot yield to the negro those rights that they can to the white man.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the freedmen?

Answer. I never discussed that question with them.

Question. How do they feel in regard to negroes voting and exercising political rights?

Answer. Prejudiced against it. I know of no men, except strong Union men, who are in favor of it.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. They are prejudiced against it. They think that it is a thing forced upon them, and that there is no constitutional law for it.

Question. They raise the constitutional point upon it?

Answer. Certainly, on every question, as though they were interested in the Constitution which they were trying to overthrow.

Question. Have you noticed a disposition generally among them to maltreat the negro?

Answer. I have.

Question. To deprive him of the fruits of his labor?

Answer. Yes, sir; they maltreat them every day they can. I have been in the provost marshal's department, under General Patrick, almost ever since he has been provost marshal, and have had great opportunities of seeing the cases that are brought before him. Although I am prejudiced against the negro myself, still I must tell the truth, and must acknowledge that he has rights. In more than nine cases out of ten that have come up in General Patrick's office the negro has been right and the white man has been wrong, and I think that that will be found to be the case if you examine the different provost marshals.

Question. What chance does the negro stand to obtain justice in the civil courts of Virginia?

Answer. Not a particle—no more than a rabbit would in a den of lions; nor a Union man, either.

Question. Do you regard it as safe for people of the free States to settle in Virginia and other rebel States?

Answer. Yes, sir, I do. The prejudice against the northern man is not so strong as to jeopardize his life. It is only the Union man who has lived among them and taken an active part against them whose life is in jeopardy. I think that, if I had never lived among them, and were as strong a Union man as I could be, I would not hesitate to go and live among them.

Question. What chance would a Union man have of obtaining justice in a Virginia State court?

Answer. I do not think he would have justice done him.

Question. Do you think it practicable to obtain a jury in Virginia that would convict a man of treason for being engaged in the late civil war against the government?

Answer. I do not think such a jury could be summoned outside of the element that is known to be Union.

Question. How large is that element?

Answer. Very small, sir, at the present time. There are a good many Union men in Virginia who dare not let it be known.

Question. Is their influence increasing or diminishing?

Answer. I have not seen any increase. I do not know of any change from a rebel to a Union man, or from a Union man to a rebel.

Question. Are the ex-rebels as bitter at present in their proscriptions of Union men as they were during the war?

Answer. I think they are worse to-day than they were, except during the first year of the war.

Question. Have you had any acquaintance in North Carolina or South Carolina?

Answer. No, sir, not outside of Virginia.

Question. Are you a man of competent education?

Answer. Yes, sir, in English education; I am not a graduate.

Question. You have mingled a good deal with the people of Virginia, both previous to, and during, and since the war?

Answer. Yes, sir; there were very few men who knew more of Virginia than I did.

Question. Arising from what?

Answer. From my business. I raised my family in Virginia. If I should write out my own experience I could not for my life do it as well as it has been written out for me in different reports. Take for instance that report of Major General Carl Schurz; it is the experience of every Union man in the south. Take Governor Brownlow's letter; take the two letters from North Carolina that were published in the Chronicle yesterday—there is not an honest man in the south who will not say that they describe the true sentiments and the true feelings of the whole south. You may summon before your committee every man in the southern States, and you cannot get anything more than you have got there. They embody the whole of it. No man can express himself better than they have expressed it for him. I have been driven from the State of Virginia away from my property; and such is the state of feeling in the neighborhood where I resided, that I dare not go back for fear of personal violence.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Dr. G. F. Watson sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Accomac county, Virginia, when at home—Wise's old district.

Question. What is your profession?

Answer. A doctor of medicine. I am at this time, and have been for nearly three years, one of the board of United States direct tax commissioners for the State of Virginia.

Question. Do you know the feelings of the people of the State toward the government of the United States?

Answer. I think I do pretty well.

Question. What is the loyalty of Accomac and Northampton counties?

Answer. When I visited Accomac and Northampton counties in October last the citizens were then disloyal; and from reliable information since, I have no reason to believe that they are better disposed toward the government at this time. I think I have had as good an opportunity to know the sentiments of the people of the State as almost any other man, having lived in it from my birth to the present time, and my official duties having called me to different portions of the State. I feel that the educated class of the community are as disloyal now as they were at the time of the surrender of Lee.

Question. How has that happened?

Answer. I think mainly through the leniency of the government. I was in Richmond in November and December last, and saw some apparently good feeling on the part of the ex-rebels toward the government; but on my late visit to that city I found that feeling materially changed. The Union men in business there were afraid to be seen conversing with other Union men for fear of injuring them in their business. I spent last winter in the city of Norfolk. At that time the mercantile business was engaged in principally by northern Union men. The citizens not feeling disposed to encourage them in trade, and opposed to northern emigration, raised their rents to such an exorbitant price that they were compelled to discontinue business and leave; consequently the ex-rebels have the entire control. In Alexandria city the same proscription has been carried out. I am credibly informed that in Richmond the northern capitalists have partly suspended operations in the erecting of buildings on account of illegal legislation and a feeling of antipathy toward northern emigration. There is one other thing of which I feel fully satisfied; that is, that the loyal men of the State cannot get justice in the reconstructed disloyal courts.

Question. Why not?

Answer. For the reason of the disloyalty of the jurors and lawyers. As an instance, in the counties of Accomac and Northampton there is not a loyal man practicing at the bar out of some fifteen or twenty.

Question. Have they been all engaged in the rebellion?

Answer. Yes; some of them, however, did not leave, but used their baneful influence at home; whilst others, who ran the blockade and returned, were captured; others, who were the best and most respected, went with the southern confederacy, and remained there until the surrender of Lee.

Question. What is the feeling among that class of people as to remaining in the Union?

Answer. The feeling is this: if they can be thoroughly reconstructed in accordance with their desires—giving them full control of the government, the emoluments of office, and the honors connected—they might be induced to remain in the Union. They have said to me that they have no interest in the government. A prominent lawyer in the city of Richmond said to me last December that he would prefer to see Fred. Douglass emperor of the country than a Yankee to be at the head of the government.

Question. What was his idea about having a king or emperor?

Answer. They feel, I suppose, that they have been whipped, and those of prominence and wealth before the war, now being poor, feel that they have lost their power and have not their former influence. It is the leading politicians who do all the mischief; were they properly dealt with we would have less trouble, and I believe that the medium class would sustain the government.

Question. Could any of these persons be convicted of treason by a Virginia jury?

Answer. I think not; but a Union man would be very readily prosecuted by them.

Question. How is it with reference to freedmen?

Answer. They despise the freedmen; they think, and frequently express, that all they want is for the military to be removed and they will handle them roughly; they also speak in the same terms of Union white men. If reconstruction of the rebel States, as proposed, be successful, and they get possession of the States, my opinion is that not a Union man can stay in Virginia, as taxation and persecution by these parties must necessarily drive them from this State.

Question. What are the feelings and opinions of the Union men of the State?

Answer. The feelings and opinions of the Union men are, that they do not desire any form of reconstruction, either by a provisional or civil governor; we desire a territorial govern ment. If we can have that, I think in a short time we could induce emigration, which will not come in under the present state of things. It would also give time to make the colored man more intelligent and less under the influence of his former master. When a proper time shall arrive for reconstruction, we shall then be able to cast a majority of loyal votes—friends to the government, not enemies, as would be the case under the present policy of reconstruction. Without some such protection God save the Union men!

Question. Suppose the restraint arising from the presence of Union forces in Virginia was withdrawn, and suppose the Freedmen's Bureau was withdrawn, what would be the condition of the loyalists and freedmen in Virginia?

Answer. There would be no protection for Union men, and the freedmen would necessarily suffer much.

Question. Would there be scenes of riot and violence?

Answer. I think it probable. You have heard of the riot which took place on Christmas day, almost under the eye of the military, in Alexandria; from that you can judge what it would be if the military were withdrawn. At the late election at many places the ex-rebels paid no attention to the provisions of the Alexandria constitution, which required such voters to take the oath that they had not borne arms against the government of the United States since ——. A number of the members of the legislature who were elected, as I have been informed, were engaged in the rebellion as officers and otherwise, and have never taken the oath required by the constitution adopted in Alexandria in April, 1864.

Question. Is that the character of that legislature?

Answer. A large majority of that legislature, in my opinion, are disloyal men, but of course profess to be loyal. A member of the senate informed me a few days since that the money in the treasury, and for which the loyal men had been taxed, would not last more than twenty days.

Question. What effect has the liberal policy of President Johnson in granting pardons and amnesty to the rebels in Virginia had?

Answer. It has had no beneficial effect as far as my experience has been. I will give you a case in point. A wealthy gentleman, owning much land near Richmond and on the peninsula, came to my office in the month of December last, and said to me that he understood his lands had been forfeited to the United States government for the non-payment of the direct tax. On looking over my books I found his information to be correct. He asked me, "Can I redeem them?" I answered him, he could by paying the tax and interest. I made out a redemption receipt, and on handing it to him he gave me a check, with these words: "This is the bitterest pill I ever took except one, and that was the oath of allegiance to the United States government." That did not prove to me that leniency had caused him to feel any devotion to the government.

Question. What effect has been produced by the Union victories over the rebels on the minds of that old class of Virginians?

Answer. They had a considerable effect at the time of the surrender of Lee, but they seem to have been encouraged by the hope of reconstruction and leniency from the government of the United States, and now assume to demand rights which they have forfeited.

Question. Suppose the rebel States are admitted to a representation in Congress, what would be the effect upon the people of Virginia?

Answer. I think from what I know that the members elected would obey the wishes of their constituents, which are inimical to the government.

Question. Suppose they should get the power by a combination with some other party; what then?

Answer. That is what I alluded to. I believe they would use it if they got it.

Question. In what way would they use it?

Answer. First, to repudiate the federal debt.

Question. Would they stop there?

Answer. I think not; they would go for the payment of the confederate debt.

Question. Would they stop there?

Answer. I doubt it very much. I am of the opinion that should they get the power by combination with other parties a second rebellion might be the consequence.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that any of the leaders of the late rebellion have it still in contemplation to bring about another war?

Answer. I do not know that they have.

Question. Have you any idea that any such conspiracy exists in any of the rebel States?

Answer. I have not.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that they are collecting arms in any locality?

Answer. I have not. I would be the last man in Virginia to know it.

Question. Have you heard any such rumor?

Answer. I have not. I believe that there is a desire on the part of them that a difficulty between this country and some foreign power should take place. In Richmond, last November, in a conversation with a confederate captain, at the time there being much talk of difficulty between France and this government, he seemed rejoiced, and made this remark "I regret that my little company is squandered, but I can whistle them up."

Question. What was he going to do in case of a war with France?

Answer. I inferred from his remarks that he would join Maximilian.

Question. In case the government of the United States should be involved in a war with England or France, what would be the course likely to be taken by the rebel States?

Answer. I think they would join France or any other foreign power. I will not say that all of the ex-rebels would, but I think a very large portion of them would.

Question. Have you any other fact upon your mind which you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir. I would prefer to make some notes of what does not occur to me at present. In the first part of my testimony before this committee I spoke of the State legislature. I deem it proper to offer the following on that subject. The present legislature of Virginia should be set aside because of its illegality, and all its acts passed since the adoption of the Alexandria constitution declared null and void. In the Alexandria constitution, which was passed or adopted by the convention on the 7th day of April, 1864, among others it adopted the following provisions:

Article 4, section 1: "The legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of delegates." Section 2: "The house of delegates shall consist of not less than eighty and of not more than one hundred and four members. The senate shall never be less than one-fourth nor more than one-third the numbers of the house of delegates." Section 8: "A majority of the members elected to each house shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalty as each house may provide."

Since this constitution was adopted, there have been three sessions of the general assembly: a regular session commencing December 3, 1864; an extra session commencing June 21, 1865; and a regular session commencing December 4, 1865, and not yet closed. At the first regular session, and the extra session, the house consisted of fourteen members and the senate of six. No more were elected, or could be as matters then existed.

These facts are now matters of history and cannot be controverted.

WASHINGTON, January 31 1866.

John Hawkshurst sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Alexandria, Virginia. I am a citizen of Fairfax county, Virginia, and am in the employment of the government as United States direct tax commissioner.

Question. How long have you held that place?

Answer. For three years.

Question. What is your age?

Answer. Forty-nine.

Question. Are you a man of family?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Are you a man of property?

Answer. I had property before the war, but it is pretty much all gone now.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No; I was born in Queens county, New York. I moved to Virginia in 1846, bought property there, and engaged in milling.

Question. Have you been in the rebel service?

Answer. No.

Question. You have been a Unionist all along?

Answer. Yes, sir. I left my place, believing that there was an order out for my arrest, on the 28th day of May, 1861, going through the woods and avoiding the highways, and came to Washington.

Question. After that you did not pass back through the rebel lines?

Answer. No. I was then appointed to represent my county in the first Wheeling convention, and served in it; and then was elected to the legislature of Virginia, sitting at Wheeling. While I was a member there I was appointed to my present place.

Question. State what the general feeling is in Virginia, so far as you know, towards the government of the United States.

Answer. The feeling would seem to be sullen silence among a large portion of the people; a disposition to acquiesce so far as they must, but no further; a very strong desire to obtain their political influence, and to wield the actions of the general government to suit them.

Question. How are they satisfied in regard to the emancipation of their slaves?

Answer. They take it as a matter of necessity; a few, perhaps, do not regret it. Those who are loyal accept it and are satisfied.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance with the rebel portion of the population?

Answer. Not very extensive; am well acquainted with most of the leaders of our county.

Some of the original Union men became active and efficient in the rebellion at a later date. The man who represented our county in the convention that passed the ordinance of secession was such. His error was, that he took ground against coercion, and, upon the call of the President for troops, went against the government. He has come back and taken the oath, and I think him reliable; but some of this class seem more dissatisfied than the original secessionists.

Question. How does that happen?

Answer. They seem to feel the disgrace, as they deem it, more keenly than the others, and a large portion of them were not Union men from principle, but from policy—deeming secession a mistake rather than a crime; but when the State was committed to the measure they ceased their opposition, and became as active as the others, and feel the disgrace of defeat more keenly.

Question. What is the feeling of all these people towards the northern people?

Answer. It appears hostile.

Question. If they could have their way would the rebel people generally remain in the Union?

Answer. No; I think they have a stronger aversion and dislike of the Union than when they seceded.

Question. What has produced this increase of hatred?

Answer. The irritation of the war, and the humiliation of their State pride, which is a very strong element in their character, and predominates over all national feelings.

Question. Do you think they generally desire to see the government of the United States reserved?

Answer. I think not; do not think one-tenth of those engaged in the rebellion heartily desire the success of our government if it continues to be controlled by the present party, and will submit to it no longer than they are compelled, and hope yet to see the time when they will be free from it.

Question. You think, then, they have not given up that expectation?

Answer. I think not; I believe a large portion of them are looking to a foreign war as the means of their deliverance; meantime they are active in endeavoring to obtain political standing to the end that they may either control the government to their interests or produce a separation, as may best suit their purposes when such time comes.

Question. Suppose they get control of it in that way; what, in your judgment, will they be likely to do in regard to the public debt of the United States?

Answer. I think they will repudiate it.

Question. Suppose they cannot repudiate it; what then would they do; would they then ask to have their own debt assumed by the United States government?

Answer. Yes; I think there is a strong feeling that their own obligations should be paid as well as ours; I think, however, there is a strong feeling in favor of repudiation of the whole; but failing in that, would endeavor to throw in their own.

Question. In case of a war between the United States and a foreign power, such as England or France, would you regard the rebel States as an element of strength to the government of the United States or of weakness?

Answer. A great weakness; it would be much stronger at present if the Union was cut in two at the Potomac. The north is much stronger alone than combined with the south; and it would probably require more men to control the rebel States than to meet any foreign force that could be sent against us.

Question. Do you think they generally love this government less than they do the government of almost any other nation?

Answer. I think they have a strong and predominating desire for independence. They hold the government of the United States as a foreign government, and in about the same respect as they do others.

Question. What is their social demeanor towards Union people, either residents or from the loyal States?

Answer. There is not much social feeling between the rebels and the resident Union men; in many cases friendships are utterly destroyed. There does not seem to be so much bitterness towards those who have come from the loyal States since the war, as towards those who were here at the commencement and acted against them during the rebellion.

Question. How are they disposed towards the freedmen?

Answer. I have not been in a situation to see much on which to form an opinion in that respect. Two instances have come to my knowledge in which endeavors were made to keep them out of business: one in which a man had rented his farm to a freedman, and he heard of threats to burn his house in consequence, and on examination, sufficient danger seemed to exist to prevent him from fulfilling his contract with the freedman. Another, who employed freedmen to do nearly all his labor, heard of threats that induced him hastily to have his buildings insured. The corporate authorities of Alexandria refused to grant them licenses to do business, the law of the State not allowing it; and attempts were made in that city to enforce the old law against them in respect to whipping and carrying fire-arms, nearly or quite up to the time of the establishment of the Freedmen's Bureau in that city.

Question. What are the chances of Union men getting justice in a State court in Virginia?

Answer. I do not think it is good; we have sold considerable property for the non-payment of the United States direct tax, and no person has been able to obtain possession of it through the State courts. To aid this, Congress at its last session gave the commissioners authority to issue writs of possession; a number of suits of ejectment have been brought in the State courts against purchasers at government sales, creating distrust and uneasiness.

Question. How have they resulted?

Answer. None have yet been decided that I know of; several persons have been indicted for acts done while in the service of the United States as guides, but have been released by the military.

Question. What chances have the freedmen of obtaining justice in the State courts?

Answer. I do not think good, although it has not yet been fairly tried. The first organization of the counties with which I am most familiar, the loyal men obtained control, and they are as well disposed towards the blacks as any other people. In the counties organized after Lee's surrender, where the disloyal obtained control, the Freedmen's Bureau has taken charge of the matter.

Question. Have you any idea that a jury could be called in Virginia that would convict any of the ringleaders of the rebellion?

Answer. No; I do not think you could get a jury in the State to convict any one of treason, unless unfair means were used in obtaining it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 31, 1866.

George Tucker sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. I am not; I am a native of New Hampshire.

Question. How long have you resided in Virginia?

Answer. I have been in Virginia most of the time for the last four years.

Question. What has been your occupation in Virginia during that time?

Answer. I have been practicing law in Alexandria and Fairfax counties. I am commonwealth attorney of Fairfax county; I commenced the practice of the law in these counties in the spring of 1863; I came out as an officer in the army in the first place.

Question. How extensive is your knowledge of the state of public feeling in Virginia?

Answer. My personal knowledge of the state of public feeling in Virginia only extends to the counties of Alexandria and Fairfax, but I have had pretty extensive correspondence throughout almost all parts of the State.

Question. You have had good opportunities to know the condition of public feeling throughout the State?

Answer. I think I have.

Question. How is it in regard to the government of the United States?

Answer. The opinion of a large majority of the people of Virginia is, that they have no respect for the government of the United States. I have heard leading men among them say that they had no respect for the government of the United States; that they were subjects, conquered, but that they had no respect for the government, and that the time would come when the east and the west would disagree, and when the south would have sufficient power to achieve its purposes. That is a very prevalent idea among them. It is also a prevalent idea among them that in their rebellion they made a mistake in regard to seceding; that if they had revolutionized, as they now say, they would have succeeded, and that if there be any further difficulty it will be a revolution and not a secession. Secession was a mistake.

Question. You are a lawyer, and can give us the difference between secession and revolution as understood by the Virginians.

Answer. As understood by them it is this; that if they had revolutionized, it would have been a general thing throughout the Union; would have extended its ramifications all over the country; have had friends all over the country, and would have fought under the colors of the nation, so that it would have been a national movement, and a struggle between them, aided by those thinking like them, and the national power all over the United States.

Question. So that if it had succeeded it would have amounted to a usurpation?

Answer. To a usurpation; and my judgment, founded on what I have seen and heard, is, that it is a favorite object with them to destroy the United States government whenever an opportunity shall present itself.

Question. Do they foresee any particular method of getting at it just now?

Answer. I think that in that respect they are somewhat in the condition of the man who was waiting for something to turn up; but in my judgment, in the case of any foreign war, if they could see any reasonable hope of success, by joining their forces and power with a foreign government, they would do it; and if they did not do it collectively, they would do it very extensively, as individuals. That is to say, I believe that, as at present organized, and even as at present governed by provisional governments, they would be a source of weakness to the national power.

Question. Have you heard that particular subject spoken of by rebels of position and influence?

Answer. The subject was broached in a conversation I had with one of them, but of course there was no plain statement made of what they would do. The subject came up in the course of conversation in regard to the present state of affairs in Mexico. The gentleman with whom I was talking is one of the most respectable of the returned rebels whom I have met. He was one of that class who were Union men at the commencement. Although he believed in the right of secession, he did not believe that they had occasion for it; or, rather, he was one of that numerous class in Virginia, and I presume in the rest of the south, who did not believe that at that time they ought to secede, but that they ought to wait for an overt act, as they called it, on the part of the general government. I would not have a legal right to infer what I did infer from the remarks he made, but I inferred, that if a war should spring up now between us and France, it was his judgment they would be a source of weakness to us. I do not think that he personally would be on that side; but others, of equal intelligence and more bitterness, say that they have not the slightest respect for the national government—that we have not any national government. Others say, and I have heard them, that they are among the number of those who look upon emancipation as an outrage, and who believe that slavery will be reinstated. Of course it cannot be reinstated without force and opposition to the Constitution and laws of the United States. In the course of my practice in Fairfax county, where I am the attorney for the commonwealth under the reorganized government, which, a year ago, we were taught to consider loyal and good, I found a great difficulty in getting anybody punished who was a secessionist, or a sympathizer with secessionists, and who had committed any depredation upon a Union man. We had one capital case—a case of murder—where a Union man was killed by a fellow who had been in Mosby's gang—a noted guerilla. He was one of that class of men who would go on both sides. He had deserted, for some cause, from Mosby, and had acted with us for a while, giving information, but his feeling as a rebel was not changed. This fellow murdered a man at the village of Falls Church. It was a clear case of deliberate murder. The man who was murdered was a Union man, and he and others were talking of the subject of the Union. It was directly after the re-election of Mr. Lincoln, and that was the subject of conversation between the deceased and several other gentlemen on the front stoop of a store there. This man drove up and heard some of the conversation. He immediately came upon the stoop, and in a very violent manner threatened one of the men in conversation. They were in the position of two men about to fight, when this man, Porter, who was killed, interfered. He had at the time a very sore thumb, with his arm slung up. There was a grudge between them on account of general politics. Porter interfered by stepping up and touching the party who finally killed him, with his elbow, and saying, "Don't let us have any fighting here." The other fellow turned around, with an oath, and demanded to know if he took it up. I suppose Porter noticed that there was danger: He stepped back and said, no, he didn't take it up. The fellow immediately drew his pistol for the apparent purpose of shooting him, when he was interfered with by other parties. After disengaging himself he went around where he could get a fair shot at the man, and he shot him, so that he died in a few hours. On the trial of that case, which was made very plain, we had a jury, unfortunately, consisting of men who had sympathized with the rebellion. There was but one Union man on the jury. They were men of comparatively good standing, in other respects, in the community. They refused to find a verdict of guilty of murder in any degree, and eleven insisted upon an acquittal. The one Union man, however, would not agree to that, and the eleven thinking, I suppose, that it was safer, finally brought in a verdict of manslaughter. According to the provisions of Virginia law, the juries, in such cases, are allowed to prescribe the amount of imprisonment, and they made it one year. That was the result of that kind of trial before that kind of jury. When I tell you that Fairfax county is the best county in the State of Virginia, so far as Unionism is concerned; so far as the influence of northern men is concerned; so far as loyalty to the government is concerned, you can draw your inference in regard to the rest of the State. The fact is, that Fairfax county has been the county where a great many northern ~~men~~ have settled. At the time of the breaking out of the war, there were nearly two-fifths of the population northern people.

Question. What is the feeling towards the freedmen on the part of these ex-rebels?

Answer. It is very malignant. The freedman before any of their juries stands no chance of obtaining his rights, although he will stand as good a chance as a Yankee will, or as a native-born citizen of Virginia who has been a loyal man. The latter even stand a worse chance. These men, all of them, will be compelled to leave the State, just so soon as they cease to be protected by the national power. They cannot stay there. I am intimately acquainted with the Union men of Fairfax county, necessarily, and I do not know one of them who does not feel that he has got to leave. I know that almost all of them are preparing now to leave, and if it were possible for them to sell their lands, even at a large sacrifice, they would do so and leave. I have a pretty good opportunity to know that, from the fact that some months ago, when we hoped for a different state of affairs, I undertook to act as agent there to sell lands; and the lands of these people are nearly all for sale. They feel that they must leave the country.

Question. What does this arise from—from a feeling of insecurity?

Answer. Yes, sir; if they understood that they would be surely protected in their natural and political rights they would not only remain, but if a territorial government was given to us we should have a tremendous rush of immigration, and it would be for a little while only that it would be necessary for the general government to make any special protection for us, especially if we had equal suffrage. We do not feel afraid of the suffrage of the negroes; we do not feel afraid that they would give their votes to their old masters.

Question. In case the negroes were allowed to vote, would they not be likely to be controlled by their old masters, and vote in his interest and according to his dictation and desire?

Answer. I presume that would be true to a certain extent, and in certain localities; but these colored people who have mixed with northern men would be controlled by them. I infer that our influence over the negro would be far greater than that of the rebels. Probably on some plantations in the more southern States the masters might have an influence over the freedmen for the time being, but we do not feel any danger in Virginia in that respect. I think there is no difficulty in reaching them, and especially if we can have a territorial government long enough to let the freedmen get a little education, which they are very anxious to get.

Question. How do the Union men feel in regard to the policy of Mr. Johnson, in granting pardons so liberally?

Answer. They do not approve of it, and never have approved of it.

Question. Is the present government of Virginia generally acceptable to the people of that State?

Answer. It is acceptable to those who were active in the rebellion.

Question. But is it acceptable to the Union men?

Answer. It is very unacceptable. They consider, in fact, that the government, as it was reorganized, and out of which grew West Virginia, is entirely destroyed, and that that has been done by disregarding the constitutional provision made by the convention at Alexandria; though I am of the opinion that even with the provisions of that constitution, the white Unionists could not have sustained themselves against the influence of overpowering numbers. They legislate now without the slightest regard to that, and are there without having taken the oaths required by that constitution. They have been elected by men who were disfranchised by that constitution; and this has been done by the approval and assistance of Governor Peirpoint, whom we consider an apostate. He was advised to it, as I am credibly informed, by a man who, it seems to me, has more influence in this city than he ought to have, who never did anything for the benefit of the Union till after the surrender—I mean John Minor Botts. The Union people feel all this very much, especially those native-born Virginians who risked their lives and property, and everything, in order that the nation might not be hurt.

Question. What effect has the liberal policy of President Johnson exerted over the public mind of Virginia, whether upon rebels or Unionists?

Answer. The effect upon Unionists has been to discourage them; it makes them doubt whether they are going to be protected hereafter; it makes them feel as though those who had been against the government during the war were more sought after and more cared for than they, and that they would continue to be in their power. The effect of it is this, that many who were Union men, and who desired, when the fall of Richmond came, to have it known that they were Union men, are now afraid to have it known that they were loyal. They feel that they must deny their master. On the other hand, that policy makes the rebels impudent, exacting, intolerant, boasting, and vainglorious. That is the effect of it.

Question. On the whole, do you think that that policy has done any good?

Answer. I would say this: that if it had been intended, and was acted upon, as an experiment to ascertain the animus of the people, it may have had a good effect in that way; but having ascertained that animus, the further practice of the policy, it seems to me, should stop.

Question. You think the experiment has been fully tried?

Answer. I do, certainly; and it has proved a failure, unless it were for the purpose of ascertaining what effect it would have. My own opinion always has been, and still is, that they should have been treated as rebels, and should have been made to feel that to be a rebel was dishonorable; that they have lost their caste among men, and the leaders ought to have been made to feel that they were, and ought to be, outcasts.

Question. Do they exhibit any such feeling now?

Answer. Not the slightest. They claim that they acted honorably and well. They act in all their movements upon the principle that those who took the most active part in the rebellion should be first cared for in the way of civil offices, or anything of that kind. Their legislature has already proposed to pension the widow of Stonewall Jackson.

Question. You mean the legislature of Virginia?

Answer. Yes; I said "their" legislature, because it is theirs; it is not ours; they have proved that. They say that Lee shall be the next governor of Virginia, and they even think that he ought to run for President.

Question. Do you know of anything else you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I cannot think of anything particular.

Question. What would be the fate of the freedmen in case the Freedmen's Bureau was abolished and the federal forces withdrawn?

Answer. They would be in a worse state of slavery than ever before—those that remain.

Question. Would they be suffered to remain in the country?

Answer. I do not think they would, as a general thing, unless they remained as servants, subject to the absolute rule of the whites. They have not any idea of prosecuting white men for offences against colored people; they do not appreciate the idea. I do not think, and have not thought for two years, that there is any way to reach these people except for the government to take control of the country and give perfect security to all loyal people so as to repopulate the country.

Question. In such a case as that, there must be an exodus of rebels?

Answer. There would probably be a great exodus of rebels if we took stronger measures.

Question. Would that be injurious to the material prosperity of the State?

Answer. I do not think it would be injurious to the material industry of the country; I think, on the contrary, it would be beneficial, and for this reason: They feel a great repugnance to northern enterprise, and will use all their influence to keep it out, and their influence is great, for the people of that country have been always subject to their leaders, obeying their orders as much as soldiers obey military orders. To see any northern capital come in there and set up industrious pursuits, manufactures, or anything of that kind, so as to increase immigration from the north, is distasteful to them, and they will do everything to prevent it. The action of the legislature shows that in its proposition—to make a five years' residence necessary for voting.

Question. How does that measure stand in the legislature?

Answer. I understand they have amended it so as to reduce the term to two years. The constitution which the loyal men made before the breaking up of the confederacy provided for one year's residence only, as is usual in other States. They are going on to legislate without reference to that constitution at all.

Question. They do not regard the constitution formed at Alexandria as of any force?

Answer. They do not seem to.

Question. Is it not under that constitution the legislature is assembled?

Answer. Yes, so far as the form is concerned.

Question. They disregard the provisions of the constitution?

Answer. They discard its provisions in many respects. There is one simple provision in it providing for a change by the legislature in one particular item; they make that a stepping-stone and an excuse to do pretty much as they have a mind to with the constitution.

Question. What is that item?

Answer. It was in reference to the disfranchisement of a certain portion of the population. The constitution made two different classes of disfranchised persons, and provided that the legislature might enfranchise one of these classes; that, I think, was the extent of the provision. They make good use of that clause. I do not think of any other items at this time.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Lysander Hill sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am a lawyer.

Question. How long have you resided in Alexandria?

Answer. I have resided in Alexandria for two or three years.

Question. Of what State are you a citizen?

Answer. Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; I am a native of Maine.

Question. What have been your opportunities to observe the state of public feeling in Virginia since the close of hostilities in regard to the government of the United States?

Answer. I have made it something of a study to observe the state of feeling there; and while I have been confined for the most part, in my own observations, to the city of Alexandria, yet I have seen a great many persons from all parts of the State.

Question. Have you seen persons from the southern and eastern parts of the State?

Answer. Yes; I have seen persons from all parts of the State.

Question. What is the general state of feeling on the part of the rebel portion of the State of Virginia towards the government of the United States—friendly or unfriendly?

Answer. I think it is very unfriendly. There are very few, indeed, of those who are rebels, who would accept the present state of affairs and go in honestly with a reconstructed State government; but the majority of them are just as bitter and more bitter than they were when actual hostilities were going on.

Question. What has produced that increase of bitterness?

Answer. I think that the lenient course of the government towards them has tended to produce it. The abolition of all restrictions on the elective franchise, admitting those who were rebels to come in to a full participation in the elective privileges, has made them a great deal worse than they were before.

Question. From what source has that relaxation proceeded?

Answer. It has proceeded really from Governor Peirpoint. Peirpoint engineered the matter after he went to Richmond.

Question. Is there no limitation in Virginia of the right of rebels to vote?

Answer. Not in the slightest.

Question. And has the present legislature been elected without reference to the distinction between loyal and disloyal citizens?

Answer. Yes, sir; elected almost unanimously by rebels.

Question. Then the legislature is a rebel legislature?

Answer. It is a rebel legislature emphatically.

Question. And that character has arisen from the policy of Governor Peirpoint, you think?

Answer. There is no doubt of it at all.

Question. What restrictions or qualifications does the Alexandria constitution contain in regard to the right of voting?

Answer. The Alexandria constitution imposed certain restrictions on the right of voting and holding office. Article III of the constitution reads as follows:

"QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

"SEC. I. Every white male citizen of the commonwealth of the age of twenty-one years who has been a resident of the State for one year and of the county, city, and town where he offers to vote, for six months next preceding an election, and who has paid all taxes assessed to him after the adoption of this constitution under the laws of the commonwealth, after the reorganization of the county, city, or town where he offers to vote, shall be qualified to vote for members of the general assembly and all officers elective by the people: Provided, however, That no one shall be allowed to vote who, when he offers to vote, shall not thereupon take, or shall not before have taken, the following oath:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof as the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of the State of Virginia, or in the ordinances of the convention that assembled in Virginia on the 13th day of February, 1861, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I will uphold and defend the government of Virginia as restored by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June, 1861; and that I have not, since the 1st day of January, 1864, voluntarily given aid or assistance in any way to those in rebellion against the government of the United States for the purpose of promoting the same.

"But the legislature shall have power to pass an act or acts prescribing means by which persons who have been disfranchised by this provision shall or may be restored to the rights of voters when, in their opinion, it would be safe to do so. Any person falsely so swearing shall be subject to the penalties of perjury.

"No person shall hold any office under this constitution who shall not have taken and subscribed the oath aforesaid; but no person shall vote or hold office under this constitution who has held office under the so-called confederate government or under any rebellious State government, or who has been a member of the so-called confederate congress, or a member of any State legislature in rebellion against the authority of the United States, excepting therefrom county offices."

Question. State what has been done under that provision of the constitution.

Answer. This was the provision of the Alexandria constitution which was adopted in April, 1864, and is the fundamental law of the State. The legislature which was in existence at the time of the surrender of Lee consisted of about twenty members altogether. As soon as Governor Peirpoint got to Richmond and had time to communicate with the leading Virginians, chiefly of the rebel persuasion, he sent around to the members of the legislature asking them to meet him in Richmond to consult with him in regard to the state of public affairs. After they went to Richmond he issued a call for an extraordinary session of the legislature. That legislature met at Richmond on the 20th or 21st of June last, and immediately repealed all restrictions upon voting and referred it to the people at the next election whether the legislature which next met should not be clothed with power to repeal all restrictions upon holding office or upon amending the constitution. All restrictions having been taken away from voting, power was given almost unanimously to the legislature that is next to convene to alter or amend that article of the constitution. The legislature that has just assembled at Richmond this winter has considered itself clothed with full power to do this, and has proceeded to make such amendments as they considered necessary. These amendments have been to abolish all restrictions upon holding office or voting, growing out of the rebellion. In electing members of that legislature I may say that the first qualification throughout the State was that the candidate should have been actively and warmly engaged in the rebellion against the government of the United States; any person who put himself upon his record of loyalty was sure to be defeated. The condition of the people as regards obedience to the government of the United States has been growing gradually worse since the surrender of Lee; and it has been rapidly growing worse, I think, since the legislature met at Richmond.

Question. What effect has the President's liberality in extending pardons and amnesty to the rebels had upon the rebel community in Virginia?

Answer. It has had the same effect in character as the repeal of the restrictions upon suffrage and voting. It has tended to produce upon the minds of the late rebels in Virginia the idea that they can split the Union party of the country, and array President Johnson and certain classes of the Union party with him in opposition to that party which did the actual and effective work in carrying on the war. They are going to form an extensive alliance with the copperheads, and to combine to confiscate the government of the United States. That is the idea they have. They have learned to regard President Johnson as a natural ally of theirs against the republican party.

Question. Have you ever seen any of them who have talked with the President about that?

Answer. I do not recollect that I have.

Question. How do they feel about a foreign war?

Answer. There is a small party among the old men, I suppose, who would do nothing in case of foreign war; and they might perhaps advise others to do nothing, but the great majority of the active men, the young men, would try to assist any foreign nation at war with us. I have no doubt that, in the event of a foreign war, the first thing a foreign power would do would be to send emissaries among them who would find material ready for use, plenty of it. I do not know that I have heard any of them express that sentiment boldly, but I have heard of their expressing such sentiments, that they were desirous of a foreign war.

Question. Is the organization known as the Knights of the Golden Circle in vogue in any part of Virginia?

Answer. If it is it is secret.

Question. Do you know of the rebels entertaining any plan of reviving the rebellion in any form whatever?

Answer. A great many threaten to revive it in the same old form. They intend to revive it in Congress, and in the administration of the country, if they ever get the opportunity. They are just as hostile and more hostile to the government of the United States to-day than they were a year ago. They know that their military power is broken, and that is all the difference.

Question. Have they got any arms or military facilities at all in case of an outbreak?

Answer. Not to any great extent. There is a quantity of arms, of course, all through the south, but not to such an extent as before the rebellion.

Question. Have you any grounds to suppose that there is any concert between the leaders of the rebellion now existing, having in view a renewal of the war, or an attempt to get out of the Union?

Answer. I should not suppose there was a concert with a view of getting out of the Union, but I would have fears in case of a foreign war.

Question. Are you a practicing lawyer?

Answer. Yes; and I have made it a special study to examine the feelings of these people since I have been in Alexandria. I have had a great deal of curiosity to know what their feelings were, and what changes have been going on. I have tried to induce immigration there, in the hope of changing public sentiment in that way; and I have been obliged, of course, to understand the feelings of the people in order to talk with the persons who were coming from the north, and who would ask me a great many questions. I have probably seen hundreds coming here with a view of settling, and have been obliged to answer their questions and give them information, and I am constantly looking out for that information.

Question. Do you suppose it is safe for northern men to go into Virginia for the purpose of settlement?

Answer. At present, in some parts of Virginia, if they will ignore all political ideas and simply attend to the cultivation of their land, they may remain there.

Question. Suppose they do not ignore or suppress their Union sentiments?

Answer. Then I would not want to advise any one to go to Virginia.

Question. Has your acquaintance extended beyond Virginia into the other rebel States?

Answer. No, sir; except as derived from the public prints and from gentlemen who have been there.

Question. Is there any further statement that you wish to make?

Answer. I do not think of any.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Josiah Millard sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. Of what State are you a native?

Answer. I am a native of Massachusetts.

Question. How long have you resided in Alexandria?

Answer. For three years past. I have been in the State of Virginia nine or ten years.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am now assessor of internal revenue for the third district of Virginia.

Question. What counties does your district include?

Answer. Alexandria, Fairfax, Prince William, Loudon, Clark, Shenandoah, Frederick, Warren, and other counties.

Question. You must be quite well acquainted with the state of public feeling in your collection district?

Answer. Tolerably well.

Question. Is it loyal or friendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. No, sir, except a very small proportion compared with the population.

Question. About what proportion?

Answer. The original Union men, who were favorable to the government from the commencement, are about one out of twenty—perhaps hardly that.

Question. Were you residing in Alexandria during the war?

Answer. No, sir; I was residing in Loudon county. I was taken prisoner by the rebels on the 28th of May, 1861. I was the first prisoner taken in Virginia.

Question. What effect had the emancipation proclamation upon the rebels?

Answer. They did not think it had any effect at all. They did not think it would ever be executed.

Question. Did they look upon it as a pleasant proceeding on the part of Mr. Lincoln?

Answer. They looked upon it as something that could not be maintained.

Question. As if it was the "Pope's bull against the comet?"

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How did they like the fact that their slaves were all emancipated?

Answer. They did not like it at all. They protested against it to the very last, and some of them in the country now are trying their very best to make the colored men believe that they are still theirs; that they are not free.

Question. Have you ever occupied any other public station than you now hold?

Answer. No, not in Virginia.

Question. How do the rebel people feel in regard to the preservation of the government of the United States? Are they willing to pay the taxes necessary to preserve it and carry it on?

Answer. It is with great reluctance that they pay their taxes.

Question. Suppose they had it in their power, would they abolish all taxes to pay the national debt?

Answer. Yes, sir, unanimously so. I do not think there would be one dissenting voice among them. I have heard it repeatedly.

Question. Would they consent to contribute their proper share to the payment of the rebel debt if they had the opportunity?

Answer. I think they would. They simply claim that they are loyal now from necessity.

Question. Suppose that necessity was taken off?

Answer. To illustrate what I believe to be the general feeling among the rebels, I will state a conversation I had with one of the leading ones the other day. He said to me, "Sir, I entered into this thing in good faith. I honestly believed it to be right. I now propose to be a loyal man, to accept the laws of the United States, and to carry out all proclamations and requirements of the President of the United States in good faith." I said, "Suppose we examine the record and see. There is one thing you have not done; you did not open your church on Thanksgiving day." He seemed to be very much agitated when I spoke about that, and said, "Why, sir, do you think I could get upon my knees and ask God to forgive me for something which I believed to be right?" Said I, "That is the point. You are as big a rebel to-day as you ever were. You are simply loyal because the strong arm of the government makes you so." And that is the general feeling with all the leading men I have conversed with, and I have conversed with a great many.

Question. Has there been great destruction of property in your district during the war?

Answer. Yes, sir, very great.

Question. What kind of property has suffered principally?

Answer. Agricultural property, live stock, and mill property.

Question. Have you ever heard anything said by leading men in your neighborhood about a foreign war with the United States?

Answer. Not directly. I have heard it intimated that if such a thing should come up, and if there was a possible chance of their gaining their independence, they would join any power to accomplish that object.

Question. Have you heard that intimated very frequently in conversation?

Answer. Not very frequently. They do not intimate it unless you get them rather excited and warmed up in conversation. They do not like to be heard saying that, particularly persons who have taken the oath, because they think there might be some advantage taken of it.

Question. Could a jury be called in your collection district which would convict a rebel or treason for making war against the government of the United States?

Answer. No, sir, it could not, nor could there be one selected in the ordinary way to give a Union man any justice.

Question. What is that owing to?

Answer. To their violent prejudices against Union men.

Question. Would they treat men from the free States in the same way in your courts?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think they would.

Question. How would they treat the freedmen?

Answer. The freedmen would have no show of justice at all, not a particle.

Question. Do they seem to like or dislike the freedmen as such?

Answer. They dislike them as such. Up in Loudon county and in the valley they have resolved not to employ the freedmen.

Question. Are there associations for that purpose?

Answer. Rather neighborhood association of that kind. I know of several such.

Question. How are they going to get their work done?

Answer. They will try to get white foreign immigration.

Question. What is the reason of that? Is not work done by a negro as good, in their estimation, as that done by a white man?

Answer. The negro being free, they cannot say to him, as they used to, "Tom, you must do this, and if you don't I will give you a cut." They cannot talk in that kind of way. They say they have raised the negroes, and have fed them all their lives, and it is the negro's duty to work for them.

Question. The point of mortification is that they cannot lawfully whip them any more?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is it.

Question. They regard that as depriving them of a luxury?

Answer. Yes; I think so. I have seen them performing it as if it was a luxury.

Question. Have you in your mind any particular facts which you wish to state to the committee—any facts illustrating your views?

Answer. I only desire to say this—that unless Congress relieves us by giving us some other kind of government, either a military government, or some other government that will protect the Union men, the firm Union men, who have been firm to the government, have got to leave Virginia and the south. They cannot remain there. It would not be safe for me to go back on my farm and reside there.

Question. What have you to apprehend?

Answer. From their threats I apprehend personal violence.

Question. Are such threats of frequent occurrence?

Answer. Very frequent.

Question. You are a Union man and an employé of the government?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Suppose you should be murdered by an ex-rebel out of revenge and from dislike to you as a Union man, and suppose your murderer should be indicted and prosecuted in the proper court of that district, and a jury should be called under the existing laws of Virginia, have you not grounds to suppose that, in case the evidence was plain and clear, the jury would convict that man?

Answer. That would depend upon circumstances very materially. If the case was very plain and clear, and there was no possible chance to cover it up, the jury might bring in a verdict of guilty, but it would be very pressing circumstances that would compel them to do it.

Question. Under such circumstances you would rather expect that they would render a verdict of guilty, if the evidence was plain and without doubt?

Answer. Yes, sir; if there was no possible chance to avoid it. I have seen cases tried there similarly, which, to me, were as plain as the sun that shines, and the verdict was rendered quite the reverse.

Question. And that, you suppose, is owing to the prejudice felt generally by rebels against Union men?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Are they still anxious for independence of the national government?

Answer. The leaders are, all of them. There are a good many men who are very poor—reduced almost to starvation—who say "we have got enough fighting; we are not going to fight any more." But hitherto the leaders have always induced them to do what they wanted, and they will probably do the same in the future.

Question. Has the material prosperity of the people in that district been seriously affected by the ravages of the war?

Answer. Yes, sir; the valley of Virginia, Loudon county, Fairfax, and some of those counties, have been very materially injured.

Question. Have many estates been confiscated under the laws of the United States?

Answer. There were a good many seized, but the proceedings were stopped and the costs paid. There were quite a good many estates sold in Alexandria and some in Fairfax.

Question. What would be the effect on the freedmen if the Union military forces were removed?

Answer. It would be an awful affair. It would be something which I have not language to express.

Question. What would you anticipate?

Answer. The freedmen would be reduced to take just what compensation their employers chose to give them, and the latter would impose such penalties upon them as they might deem necessary. The result would be really the annihilation of the freedmen in a short time. It would not take a great while. They could not remain. They would be starved to death.

Question. How would it be in reference to the sick and aged and infirm among the freedmen? Would the whites be willing to contribute anything for their support?

Answer. I do not think they would.

Question. Would they leave them to die without giving them a helping hand? I speak of the people generally.

Answer. The general sentiment among the leading people, I think, is, that they would rejoice if the freedmen were out of existence. They would say, "God speed them: let them get out of the way as soon as they can."

Question. Why do they feel so to the freedmen?

Answer. I cannot tell you the reason why. They feel very indignant also toward the Union men who had been living among them. They say that the Union men—the northern fanatics—were the cause of their failing.

Question. Why should they detest the negro so bitterly?—he has been passive and substantially neutral.

Answer. That is true. I suppose they hate him because he was the cause of the war, and because the result has not been as they anticipated.

Question. Is that the cause of their deep mortification?

Answer. I expect that it is; I see no other.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Joseph Stiles sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Alexandria city. I am a citizen of Fairfax county, but I am temporarily residing in Alexandria. I was a refugee during the war, and have not gone back yet.

Question. Where were you born?

Answer. In Burlington county, New Jersey.

Question. How long have you resided in Virginia?

Answer. About twelve years.

Question. Were you ever a slaveholder?

Answer. My wife had an interest in a slave estate, but I never became fully possessed of it.

Question. How have you been employed during the war?

Answer. I have been in the military service of the government as a guide and scout and military detective. I served three years and about ten months.

Question. That was rather a perilous service, was it not?

Answer. Yes, sir, sometimes.

Question. Relate some of your adventures.

Answer. I left my home in Fairfax county the Sunday before the first Bull Run battle, and immediately became connected with the army in that capacity, and served until the first day of June, 1864, when I was captured by the rebels and served a short term in Libby prison. I went through many other adventures—incident to that business.

Question. How long did you serve in Libby prison?

Answer. About two months.

Question. The apprenticeship was sufficiently long for your comfort?

Answer. Yes, sir, plenty.

Question. How did they treat you there?

Answer. The treatment was bad, but I fared as well as anybody else. They were not exactly aware of my business, or else I should not have got exchanged. Since my discharge from the military service, I served a short time as deputy United States marshal, during which time I travelled over some few counties in eastern Virginia, libelling property. I met with a great many people, and talked with a good many of the returned soldiers and officers of the rebel army, and with a good many citizens. At the time of Lee's surrender the feeling appeared to be generally that they were glad to get home; they were worn out; they appeared to fear confiscation, taxation, and the penalties of treason. About the first of September I commenced collecting United States direct taxes in Virginia, and since that time I have been continually out in the counties collecting, and have met with a great many people. I find the sentiment of the people to have been gradually changing for the worse, in my opinion. It seems to me that the rapid promotion of rebels, the old politicians, to places of trust and honor, has had a great tendency to render treason popular instead of odious. It appears to me that a great many of those persons who at first were quiet are now beginning to talk about their rights again. I think that the disloyal feeling of the people is more intense now than it was immediately after the surrender of Lee's army.

Question. What effect has the liberal policy of President Johnson in granting amnesty and pardons, and restoring property that was confiscated, had upon their minds?

Answer. The general feeling and sentiment of the people appears to be as I have stated—getting worse, getting more unfriendly to the government. It appears to me that the leniency of the President was very bad for the Union people. Any man in that country who sets himself up as a candidate for office, and pretends to base his claim upon the ground that he has been loyal to the government of the United States, would be considered impudent—highly so. The successful candidates for office all base their claim upon the ground that they have been positive rebels, and that they fought this thing out. I have heard them boast that they were in the army until the surrender. These men are almost universally elected.

Question. Do they appear to be proud of the part they have acted in the war?

Answer. Yes, sir. There is a class of men in eastern Virginia who are good, honest people. They are tired of this thing. They are anxious to see peace and quiet restored to the country; but unfortunately that class of people, like the immigrants from the north, have very little to say in the reconstruction of affairs. The disappointed politicians, the disappointed ex-rebel officers, who were slaveholders and wealthy, and who now find themselves in a poor condition, seem to take the lead in these things, and it has often occurred to me that the editors and politicians were using the United States mail as a channel for communicating matter appealing again to the passions and prejudices of the people.

Question. Have you any ground to apprehend another outbreak in the rebel States?

Answer. No, sir, I think not. But it looks to me as though the politicians were attempting to gain by political intrigue what they failed to secure by resort to arms. If they cannot get the independence of the confederacy, they will try to get all the control they can.

Question. Suppose they should get the control of the government of the United States, both in Congress and in the executive branches, how would they use their power, judging from what you have seen and heard among the rebels themselves?

Answer. That is something I never thought of; but they certainly would use it very arbitrarily, judging from what they do.

Question. From what you have seen and heard, have you the impression that the masses of the rebel people have any respect for the United States government, or for the loyal people who have upheld it?

Answer. No, sir. I think there is a majority of them who are to the contrary, decidedly so—especially the politicians and those other classes I referred to. A loyal man, especially one who has been actively loyal, stands no chance of a show of justice among them at all. At the very first term of the circuit court of Prince William county, indictments were found against four of us who had been in the service of the government. I believe I was the only one in the actual service of the government; but the other three were refugees, and went as volunteer guides upon a scouting expedition in the autumn of 1863, by special order of Major General Heintzelman, who was in command at Washington. It was a scouting expedition in pursuit of guerillas, and the soldiers on that occasion took from a man who was caught running the blockade, two mules, and stole some of his chickens. At the first term of the circuit court this man went before the grand jury and made a statement, and they brought in a bill of indictment against four of us. I wrote to the clerk of the court for information concerning it, and he informed me that this man charged me with being present with a squad of soldiers when this stealing took place; but still this reconstructed grand jury could bring in an indictment on that information. There was a bench warrant issued for my arrest, and I sent them word where I was and to come and arrest me; that they would have to take me to jail, as I would not give bail. I concluded that, if the military authorities would suffer it, I would see what it would result in. They failed to come and arrest me. I suppose they thought that there was something behind by my sending them word. There were two or three other men who were in the service, and who were arrested since on the same charge. One of them gave bond for a thousand dollars; the other two had to go to jail. The one who gave bond came to General Augur, having been in his employment before; and the result was, General Grant's order directing military division and department commanders, whose command embraced any portion of the seceded States, to issue and enforce orders prohibiting civil courts from prosecuting any person who had been in the employment of the United States for acts done in the service. The officials of the county of Prince William refused to release these two men at first on that order, but held them for some time on the ground that they were not enlisted men; but finally, on the order of General Terry, they did release them. I was indicted, but never arrested. I suppose the indictment is on the docket yet, and that, when the military is withdrawn, it will be renewed. Some weeks ago I heard a party of men at the county seat of Culpeper county remarking that one Smith came and lived on their land and then joined their enemies as a guide to Kilpatrick. One of them remarked that Smith had killed two confederate scouts. A young lawyer, now a member of the Virginia State senate, advised them to have Smith indicted and tried for murder; stating that they could convict him.

Question. Has that been attempted?

Answer. That has not been attempted yet, but that was the advice which this member of the Virginia State senate gave. It almost discourages me, after fighting four years and whipping these men, to be placed again in their power, and be sat in judgment upon by these very men. By-the-by, Moseby was engaged to assist the prosecuting attorney at the trial in my case.

Question. Where is Moseby now?

Answer. He is at Warrenton, practicing law. It occurred to me that, after fighting four years and still feeling need of protection, I had better leave and give up Virginia; but then, again, it occurred to me that they could make a requisition for me as a fugitive from justice. Some persons have looked to immigration from the northern States into the south to neutralize, in a great measure, this rebel sentiment; but unless there is protection given, it never will be; and if these State governments are permitted to reconstruct, and to go on in the manner they are going on, the south will remain a nursery of treason. The rebels say, "We know that we are whipped; we are overpowered; but we hate you, and we will teach our children's children to hate you!" Their favorite expression is, "Every dog has his day, and the time will come, some time or other, when an opportunity will present itself to us."

Question. Is that feeling very general?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You have seen evidences of it wherever you have been in Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir; especially within the last two months.

Question. What chance does a Union or a northern man stand in their State courts?

Answer. No chance at all.

Question. Why not?

Answer. The popular feeling is against him altogether, and he has it all to butt against. It appears to me, when men who commit treason manifest such bad faith towards the leniency shown them, there is no show for justice to Union men in any case that affects rebels.

Question. What chance does a freedman stand for justice at their hands?

Answer. As a general thing, he does not stand any chance for justice at all. You may find men among them who would do him justice; but they are too few, and have but little to say. I found lots of men who said that it was wrong in the grand jury of Prince William county to indict me; but their saying so did not have any effect; it did not get rid of the indictment or affect public sentiment at all.

Question. Do you think there is generally in the State of Virginia a willingness to have the free negroes remain among them?

Answer. A majority of the persons whom I have heard speaking about it are anxious to have them sent away.

Question. Where do they propose to have them sent?

Answer. I have not heard any suggestion as to the place where the government should have them sent.

Question. Why do they want to have them sent away?

Answer. I have not heard any good reason advanced for it—anything more than a bitterness of feeling on the part of the rebels toward the negroes because they cannot control them any more.

Question. They dislike the negroes because they can no longer control them by force?

Answer. That is it. I find a very strong desire to get rid of the troops also. That is very prevalent, as far as I have been. I found it very prevalent among all persons connected with the State government.

Question. In case the troops were withdrawn, would you anticipate scenes of violence and riot?

Answer. Yes, sir, towards loyal men and freedmen.

Question. Would you anticipate the expulsion of loyalists from Virginia and also of freedmen?

Answer. Yes, sir. I would anticipate the expulsion of loyalists, and that the freedmen would be subjected to a peculiar kind of servitude similar to the kind they are attempting to bring about through the State legislature. I have heard them complaining that the negro will not work.

Question. Is there any foundation for that complaint?

Answer. Some of the negroes will work, but of course some of them are idle. I have told a good many of these rebels that they were standing about in idleness themselves, finding fault and apparently waiting for something to turn up, and that I thought the negroes were looking on following their example, and that it was better for them to go to work themselves and set a good example.

Question. If they paid the negro fairly for his labor, would he not work as willingly as the white man?

Answer. A majority of them would. There are some of the negroes, of course, who, being suddenly emancipated, do not really understand it; but they will soon come into it.

Question. Has not the negro a strong love of property?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. They love money, do they not?

Answer. Yes, sir. The negroes who are working the best are those who have been permitted heretofore to hire their own time and go around and work for themselves, which I think proves conclusively that when they have an opportunity they are inclined to work and take care of themselves.

Question. Have you any other statement that you wish to make?

Answer. None that occurs to me at this time. I sincerely hope that the government of the United States will not resign loyal men into the hands of these people.

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

Jonathan Roberts sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What is your official position?

Answer. I am sheriff of Fairfax county, Virginia.

Question. How long have you been sheriff of Fairfax county?

Answer. Nearly four years. They elected me sheriff when we reorganized our county, after the rebellion broke out. They re-elected me before the rebellion burst, and my time is not out yet.

Question. Does your acquaintance extend much beyond that county?

Answer. Not minutely. I have been seventeen years a resident of that county.

Question. How much chance is there for a Union man in the courts of that county who should be a party against a rebel in a suit?

Answer. None; not so far as justice goes. Let me qualify that. In the reorganization of our county the magistrates who were elected were almost all Union men, and, so far as they go, they are all right; but, when we come to a jury, we have to take the masses as they come, and there is no chance at all for justice.

Question. You have to draw your jurors by lot?

Answer. Yes; and, since the surrender and coming home of the rebels, there is less chance for getting a jury who will act justly.

Question. Could you gather a jury in Fairfax county that would convict of treason one of these rebels?

No, sir.

Question. Could you pack a jury in that county that would do it?

Answer. No, sir. I have no means of packing a jury. As the sheriff of the county I have the right to select the jurors to be summoned, and then a jury is drawn from them by lot. Just before the surrender of Lee there was a case tried of a returned rebel who shot a Union man at Falls Church. I endeavored, not particularly to get all Union men, but to get all who I thought would do right. The lawyers for the defence, however, managed to get nine out of twelve rebels on the jury. The evidence was just as plain and positive as it could be—indeed, the facts were admitted; and yet the jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, with one year's imprisonment. Nine of them went for acquitting him entirely; but the three Union men would not agree to it, and finally they compromised with one year's imprisonment. If it had been the other way, or if a rebel had killed a rebel, there would have been no doubt at all about his conviction.

Question. How large a proportion of the people of Fairfax county are Union men?

Answer. I suppose we have twelve hundred votes in our county, and I do not suppose we could number, with the returned northern men and all, three hundred Union votes, all told.

Question. Is there any real friendship for the government of the United States among these rebels?

Answer. None whatever among the leading rebels. I would modify that. If they could get the power that they had before the rebellion they would not try it again while that was the case. But they hate the Yankees, as they call all northern men, and while the government of the United States is in the control of northern men, or Union men, they will hate it, and they do hate it, and do everything they can to injure it.

Question. What has been the effect of President Johnson's liberal policy in granting pardons to rebels and restoring their estates to them?

Answer. We think, down there, and I think, that it has been bad. As soon after the surrender of Lee as the rebels could get home they all seemed to be perfectly satisfied with everything. So as they only got home, they were glad enough to submit to anything. They would shake hands with the Union men and be as clever as you pleased. But leading men got their pardons, and then they began to sue Union men for everything they could get hold of. A returned rebel, who was taken prisoner for shooting our pickets up at Fauquier county—an old slave trader—came back and sued me, as sheriff, for property which I was put in possession of for the benefit of the court. I was put in possession by an order from the Secretary of War. He sued me as a trespasser the minute he got back. If it was to go on to a trial they would convict me.

Question. You have resorted to some means to stop it?

Answer. Yes; that is good while the military are there, but will not protect me one hour after the military are taken away.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir, I am a native of New Jersey. I have been in Virginia for seventeen or eighteen years. I went there in 1848.

Question. How do they feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. Some have a liberal feeling toward them, but the great majority of them are very bitter, just because they have been liberated. Many of them who used their slaves pretty well before are very bitter now. They want to drive them away, and do everything they can to drive them away, to make the government odious for freeing them.

Question. Could they easily supply their places as laborers?

Answer. They could not.

Question. What are they going to do for laborers?

Answer. They seem to be reckless of consequences.

Question. Is it a species of blindness?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is a kind of mania that has possession of them; it seems to be their old prejudice, and the result of blasted hopes and blasted doings. That seems to be the definition. You asked me whether Union men would be protected and allowed to live quietly if the troops were withdrawn. I have got one thing to say in that respect. If it was known publicly that I came here and made this statement before you, I would not be safe one hour. There is evidently a band of people secretly bound among themselves to be true to each other, and to do all the injury they can to Union men. There are plenty of horse-thieves over there. They steal horses and cattle, and there is no convicting them because they are bound together; and if one undertakes to blab upon another, some of the party will shoot him. That was the case there recently, where a man named Sexton was shot.

Question. Do you suppose there is a secret association among them to protect each other?

Answer. I have no doubt of it at all. This Mr. Sexton, who was shot at Herndon the other day by McDonald, one of the gang, stated upon his dying bed that he was shot to prevent his giving evidence against them for horse-stealing.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the war debt of the United States?

Answer. I do not know that I can say much about it, only from what I learn from the newspapers, &c. They would hate most to pay this direct tax; but, as a war debt, I do not know that I have heard much said about it. My brother-in-law, who is United States assessor at Richmond, tells me that they talk down there as if they would like to pay their own war debt, but they do not like to pay Uncle Sam's. I have heard but little of it, except in newspaper editorials.

Question. Do you think that the general sentiment is that they would repudiate the federal war debt, if they had the power to do so?

Answer. There is not a particle of doubt about that.

Question. Do you think they would consent to assume to pay the debt of the confederate government if they had the opportunity?

Answer. There might be some who would object to it, but the leading men—those who would control things—would pay it. There is no doubt of it.

Question. Would the rebels join a foreign enemy in case of a war between this country and a foreign power?

Answer. I do not think they would like to join England. They are sore upon England. I think they would willingly join with France, and that they would jump at the chance of a war with Mexico. The rank and file do not want to go to war, but they are completely under their leaders. They do not talk much, but I can hear them saying, once in a while, "We are biding our time; we are only just subjugated at present; we are not whipped; we are only overpowered; we will be at it again one of these days; we will bide our time"—and such expressions as these.

Question. It appears to be not a state of contentedness under the government of the United States?

Answer. None whatever. If you knew the southern character as well as I do, you would confess that there is nothing but force will make them yield. You cannot coax them. They respect force, and nothing else. They are educated to it. One class is educated to drive, and another to be driven, and they do not believe in anything else. Law they do not respect for its moral obligations; but, if they can do anything which the law cannot absolutely take hold of; if they can just manage to steer clear of the law, they will do it. If they have a grudge against a man, they will plan all manner of schemes to gratify their grudge in a manner that the law will not get hold of them. They will get drunk and to quarrelling with a man that they have a spite against, so that they may not appear to be malicious in the matter.

Question. In their personal resentments are they perfidious?

Answer. They are really nothing but perfidy.

Question. Are they revengeful?

Answer. They are especially revengeful just as far as they think they can escape the law. Before the war, when northern men went there, they would be glad to receive them, and get their money; and as soon as they got their money they seemed to take a delight in banding together and injuring them as much as they could—in contriving to cheat them, and then drive them away. That seemed to be a systematic thing. All the northern people of that county will tell you the same thing. I was a little isolated when I went there, and yet they would come and tear down my fences, and turn in their hogs and stock, and do all they could to injure me. The Union men will have no kind of show at all unless the government will protect them.

Question. You would advise the continuance of the military force there?

Answer. The Union men cannot stay there unless the military force is continued.

Question. And also the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. I would. We are not going to have any safety under our present State organization. I say that although I am a sheriff, sworn to sustain the reorganized government, yet I do not believe that it is reorganized while rebels control it. They are now passing laws there to disfranchise men who have been voters there. They are passing vagrant laws on purpose to oppress the colored people and to keep them in vassalage, and are doing everything they can to bring back things to their old condition, as nearly as possible.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 31, 1866.

Charles R. Joyce sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Alexandria.

Question. What are you by profession?

Answer. Machinist and engineer.

Question. How long have you resided in Alexandria?

Answer. Fifteen years.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; I am a native of Maryland.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance in the State of Virginia?

Answer. Nothing outside of Alexandria; I have never been further in Virginia than Gordonsville.

Question. Have you taken any part in the late war?

Answer. At the beginning of the war I was nine months in the volunteer navy as engineer on board of one of the transports; she was afterwards taken by Admiral Goldsborough as his flag-ship. I was at the battles of Roanoke Island and Newbern; I was taken sick with typhoid fever and sent home and got discharged. I afterwards went to work for the government at the depot of the military railroad; I have been to work for the government during the war up to the 13th of November last.

Question. What is the feeling of the people of Virginia in regard to the government of the United States?

Answer. I believe, from the intercourse I have had with them, that they are opposed to the government; not all of them, however; there are a few Union men in Alexandria, but those rebels who have come back since the war are, I believe, as strong if not stronger against the Union than they were when they went away.

Question. Your acquaintance does not extend much beyond Alexandria?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Have you any acquaintance with the leaders of the rebellion in Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; except with some men who went away from Alexandria, officers of companies.

Question. What effect has the liberality of President Johnson in regard to pardons and amnesties had upon the minds of the rebel population, so far as you have been able to observe it?

Answer. I think if a different course had been pursued they would have been a different people.

Question. Different what way—better or worse?

Answer. I think they would have been better; I think there has been too much leniency used; I think the government has extended too much leniency towards them.

Question. What particular effect has that leniency produced upon them?

Answer. It has made them more defiant. It looks to me as if they thought the government was afraid of them, and was pursuing this course to conciliate them.

Question. Is there any particular fact on your mind which you desire to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir; my opinion is that if the rebels should get control, they would proscribe the Union men politically and socially.

Question. In such an event, would you stand in fear of violence on the part of ex-rebels?

Answer. Yes, sir; they threatened to drive me out of the town at the commencement of the war; they sent me word if I was not careful of how I talked they would drive me out of town; but I defied them, and they never bothered me.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1866.

J. J. Henshaw sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Lovettsville, Loudon county, Virginia.

Question. How long have you resided there?

Answer. I have resided there since 1856, with the exception of being absent from the 28th of June, 1863, until the 4th of July last. I was necessarily compelled to be absent during that time in consequence of the rebellion.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. I am; I was born in the county of Frederick, Virginia.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am a practicing physician.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance throughout the State of Virginia?

Answer. Not very extensive; I have been in Richmond as a member of the legislature last spring—I mean the loyal legislature that went from Alexandria. I was called there on that extraordinary session, and was there three days; I have never been in Richmond before. Some years ago I travelled the whole length of the Shenandoah valley, but I cannot say that I know much about the country or the people now, of course.

Question. From your knowledge and information, what is the general feeling of the rebel people in Loudon county towards the government of the United States?

Answer. In the precinct where I reside we had but very little disloyalty; we have about 375 voters, at the lowest estimate, and there are not twenty-five rebels among them, all told. Consequently, there being so few rebels in that particular locality, they are very quiet, and, generally speaking, conduct themselves very well. I have noticed this difference: Before I left the State, in the spring of 1863, my own warmest friends and most intimate associates were rebels, who had belonged to the whig party generally before. Since I went back, with the exception, I think, of three families that I have met in the outskirts of my ride, I have not been invited to call and see one of my old friends.

Question. Do you mean professionally?

Answer. No, sir; socially.

Question. Have you been called professionally among them?

Answer. Only in my immediate vicinity; there I practice among them as well as among others.

Question. Have you been, uniformly, a Union man yourself?

Answer. Yes, sir; all the time.

Question. You never have rendered any service to the rebel confederacy?

Answer. None; and in consequence thereof I had to leave; I was compelled to leave or report to General Jones, at Charlestown, on the 28th June, 1863.

Question. Who was General Jones?

Answer. A rebel general. The rebels were then on the raid into Maryland, and I was captured and notified to meet my captors the next evening or morning, at a certain point, to go with them to Charlestown. I of course did not meet them, but crossed the Potomac river into Maryland.

Question. How were you treated by the rebels into whose hands you fell?

Answer. They gave me time to report at a certain place and to go with them to the general; but I left the State and did not go back to remain there until the 4th of July last.

Question. What is the feeling on the part of the rebel population where you are acquainted towards the government of the United States?

Answer. As far as I am capable of judging, they are as hostile to-day to the government of the United States and to the loyal people of the State of Virginia as they ever were. There may be a few honorable exceptions, but they are very few.

Question. Are there many among them who have been pardoned by the President?

Answer. There are some in our county.

Question. What kind of feeling do they manifest?

Answer. I have not met with them at all, and cannot tell what their feeling may be.

Question. What effect has generally been produced on the minds of ex-rebels by the liberality of the President in granting pardons and amnesties; how do they regard that policy, and what effect has it had upon their hearts and conduct?

Answer. That would be a very difficult question for me to answer, and it is a little deeper in than I am able to see. But, if I am to judge from what I hear, they do not appreciate the kindness of the government at all, or only so far as it may serve their purpose.

Question. Do you think that that policy has had a tendency to quiet their feelings and reconcile them to the authority of the United States?

Answer. It should have had.

Question. But does it have according to your observation?

Answer. I do not think I can say it has.

Question. You have mingled among them to a large degree since you went back?

Answer. Yes, sir; with the few that we have in our neighborhood.

Question. State whether, in speaking of the United States and its government, they are in the habit of using expressions of respect for it or of contempt, or dislike?

Answer. I do not know that I can say that I have heard one, since I have been back, speak disrespectfully of the government; I do not know that I have.

Question. Is there any other fact which you want to state to the committee?

Answer. If I am only to state mainly what I am an eye-witness to I do not believe—

Mr. HOWARD. You can state what you hear from credible sources of information.

Answer. I will state a circumstance that I have from unquestionable authority, from some young men with whom I was well acquainted when a refugee and who have since gone back to their homes in Fauquier county. These men have been loyal and respectable, and they assure me that they got this information through Mosby's men—that Mosby had notified them to hold themselves in readiness. His words were: "Boys, hold yourselves in readiness, for it will not be more than twelve months until I want you again."

Question. What are the names of the persons who gave you this information?

Answer. John E. Fletcher, William H. Fletcher, and Marion Fletcher, three brothers with whom I was well acquainted when north of the Potomac. They got it from members of Mosby's gang. I do not know a better man than John E. Fletcher to be summoned before your committee.

Question. Do you get this statement from Mr. Fletcher?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And he told you that some of Mosby's men had made this statement in his presence?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Does Mr. Fletcher live in Lovettsville?

Answer. No, sir; his post office is Middleburgh, Loudon county. He lives on the road from Middleburgh to Upperville. I will relate another incident to the committee. I was intimately acquainted with a lady in our county before the war; and since the war, although she is an avowed rebel, I am still on intimate terms with her. She assures me that she is as much a rebel to-day as she ever was; and also assures me that those who have taken the oath, so far as she knows, are just as much rebels to-day as before they took it. Her husband was a rebel during the war.

Question. What do they think of the constitutional right of secession?

Answer. I do not think that they consider that their State rights or anything of that sort have been impugned. They have been overpowered, but they were right nevertheless. What they claimed and what they struck for they were entitled to, and are entitled to yet. That seems to be their impression. I do not think you can find one of them who will admit that he was wrong in sustaining the rebellion and in making war upon the government.

Question. Have you any reasonable ground for supposing that there are combinations or conspiracies anywhere in the rebel States, in Virginia or elsewhere, having in view the renewal of the war, the overthrow of the government of the United States, or the independence of the rebel confederacy?

Answer. I have never been induced to think anything of the sort until very recently; and my reason for thinking now that there may be something of the sort, is the manner in which the rebels and the disfranchised portion of the people of Virginia seem to be disposed to act. We are kept in the dark entirely as to anything of that sort; we can only get at it by accident, if at all. But if you would refer to the acts and speeches of that rebel legislature at Richmond, you would see that they either wish the government of the United States to destroy the State of Virginia, or are determined to let the government of the United States see that they will have things, and do things, and say things, just as they choose, whether loyal or disloyal.

Question. Is that a very general feeling among them?

Answer. I think it is almost unanimous. We have a member of the senate in the legislature from our county; I look upon him as a loyal man. I asked him the question recently, "How do you get along with these fellows?" He says, "Oh, very smoothly." I then asked him about the elective franchise, and about the proposition to require any one immigrating into the State of Virginia to remain there five years before he could exercise the right of a citizen. "Oh," says he, "that will not pass." "Well," says I, "they have got a bill up of that kind." That is one of the best indications I have seen from any quarter of the direct hostility of that part of the State of Virginia to the government of the United States—that five years' bill.

Question. Why did he think it would not pass?

Answer. I did not ask him. I just met him on the road as I was going home, and he did not enter into any particulars in reference to it.

Question. What do you suppose to be the animus of that bill, of which you have spoken, requiring five years' residence to enable one to vote in Virginia?

Answer. My supposition is, that it is designed to keep northern men—intelligent working men—from immigrating into the State of Virginia, and, at the same time, to prevent those who left the State and went north, and took part against the rebellion, from exercising their rights as citizens when they come back, because they have lost their residence in Virginia.

Question. Among what class in Virginia does this indisposition to welcome immigration from the north operate most powerfully?

Answer. Among the most wealthy and influential portion of the people.

Question. Do you mean the old slaveholders?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How are that class of persons generally disposed towards the freedmen in Virginia?

Answer. From what little I have seen (I have not seen a great deal) they are hostile, as a general thing, to the freedmen—decidedly so.

Question. If they had the power, would they or would they not reduce the blacks again to slavery?

Answer. I do not think they would hesitate a moment in doing so.

Question. Do you think it is their intention, by some artifice of State legislation, again to reduce the black man to a state of servitude?

Answer. I do not know. If they could do it with safety, I have no doubt but that they would do it; if they could have help enough from the United States, they would do it.

Question. Is the Freedmen's Bureau of any utility in Virginia, so far as you know?

Answer. We have a branch of it in our county-town, but I have seen or heard but little of its workings there. There is not much material for it to attend to. I know of but one family in my neighborhood that has undertaken to take care of freedmen.

Question. What effect would the withdrawal of the United States troops from Virginia have upon the peace and quiet of the State?

Answer. If the loyal white man and the freedman would willingly obey all the commands and dictates of the rebels, we would get along peaceably enough.

Question. Suppose they would not do that?

Answer. I do not suppose we would be allowed to do anything else but obey. I think we would necessarily be compelled to obey, if the military were taken away from the State of Virginia. We would have to succumb to the wishes of the rebels and to keep quiet, or else we would have to leave the State. We see from the papers that they complain now of certain parties telling falsehoods upon them, in order to excite Congress and the President against them; that they are loyal while these men are disloyal; and that if those men do not like what they are doing, the community would be as well without them—giving them permission to leave. That is a bold and significant indication, and I think it more than likely that it would be pressed in another form. I, myself, having taken a prominent stand all the time in favor of the government of the United States, would not feel very safe in Virginia if the military were taken entirely from the State.

Question. Would you not feel pretty safe in any of the civil courts of Virginia—you, a Union man; would you not expect impartial justice from a court and jury, if you were an accused person in the court, or were suing there for redress of any of your wrongs?

Answer. I do not believe that you could get an impartial jury hardly in our county to try a case between an avowed Union man and an avowed secessionist; I do not believe that you could do it.

Question. Could you not find a jury there who would convict a man of treason against the United States for waging war against it, wilfully and wantonly?

Answer. If you would select a jury, you could do it, because we have no less than seven hundred loyal men in the county.

Question. But if the jurors were taken up by lot, could you do so?

Answer. If they were taken up by lot in the ordinary way, you could not get a jury that would convict a man of treason against the government of the United States; I do not believe you could.

Question. You mean to say that it would be very difficult to get a verdict of twelve men, constituting a jury, to convict anybody of treason?

Answer. Yes, sir, I think it would, unless you selected a jury and picked them out. You could not do so if the jury was taken in the ordinary way.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that that feeling is prevalent throughout the State of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Does anything else occur to your mind that you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I might mention the treatment which Methodist preachers receive at the hands of the people in our county. Within the last three weeks a Rev. Mr. Ross, of the Baltimore conference, a Methodist preacher, was ordered into our county by the proper authorities of the church. About three weeks ago last Sabbath, while he was going from Leesburg to Warren to preach, he was attacked by three or four men, taken from his horse and pretty severely beaten; his pocket-book was demanded, but there proved to be nothing in it; they released him with the understanding, that in so many hours (a day or two) he should leave; if not, he would fare worse the next time. That is a notorious fact.

Question. What was the real character of the gang; were they mere robbers or highway-men, or were they rebel guerillas?

Answer. I do not suppose they were robbers, or highwaymen, or rebel guerillas; but they were men who are determined that ministers of the Baltimore conference shall not continue to preach to them.

Question. What is the political character of these ministers?

Answer. Their political character is, that they come from the north, and are sent there as men loyal to the government of the United States. Being members of the Baltimore conference, they are not, of course, members of that other conference which proposed to meet in Alexandria a week or two ago.

Question. What sort of men are they?

Answer. They call themselves southern Methodists.

Question. Has the split in the Methodist church never been healed?

Answer. It has never been healed. Nearly all those who during the rebellion adhered to the Baltimore conference, have gone now with the southern Methodists; and that reduces the northern Methodist church—as the southern people call it—to very few, except along the northern border of the county. I heard Mr. Ross state last summer, in the pulpit of the Rehoboth church in our county, that he proposed to preach at Hamilton, in Loudon county; but they would not let him have the key of the church in which he proposed to preach, and they would not let him have the church. These are evidences of their hostility.

Question. Are the municipal affairs of Loudon county in the hands of rebel officials?

Answer. No, sir; our sheriff, clerk of the county court, clerk of the circuit court, and three of the five deputies, are loyal men. The presiding judge of the county court, William H. Gray, is a reconstructed rebel. He has taken the oath and is a member of this Virginia legislature.

Question. How is the legislature now in Richmond regarded by the people of your county—as being a true representative of the State of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir; they are regarded as a true representative of the people of Virginia they represent them very well.

Question. What is the feeling in your county among the rebels towards Jefferson Davis?

Answer. I never heard a rebel in the county say aught against him or anything in his favor; more than that, he ought not to be hanged, and would not be hanged.

Question. Is there anything else you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. There would be no difficulty in getting every man in the county of Loudon to sign a petition in favor of doing away with that rebel government at Richmond, and giving us something that will not be such a government as that. I am satisfied of that; and I am not so sure but you will have petitions to that effect brought in soon.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

Watkins James sworn and examined

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Winchester, Virginia. I am about two-thirds of my time in Winchester and one-third in Woodstock.

Question. How long have you resided at Winchester?

Answer. Since May last. I am assistant United States assessor under the revenue act.

Question. And you find it necessary in the discharge of your duties to travel about a good deal?

Answer. Yes, sir; I had charge of three counties recently, but within the last three months I gave one of them up. Those counties were Frederick, Shenandoah, and Warren. I have not been acting in Warren since September last; I had more than I could attend to, and that county was assigned to somebody else.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; I was born in Maryland. I left Maryland in 1844, and since that time have resided in Virginia with the exception of the last two and a half years, when I was compelled to leave.

Question. In the course of your journeyings throughout your district what opinion have you formed of the feeling of the once rebel people towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I have come to the conclusion, from travelling through the country, that their feelings towards the government, towards Union men, and towards the freedmen, are more hostile to-day than they were at the close of the rebellion.

Question. Is that feeling confined to any particular class?

Answer. The under class as we, may term it, manifest that feeling; but the great difficulty is that there seems to be no disposition on the part of those who can control that class of the community to suppress it. I have, in my official capacity, gone to the leading men of several towns and talked with them on the subject, impressing upon them the necessity of trying to control that feeling, telling them that we would never get rid of the military until they learned to control that element. I had a conversation the other day with a gentleman in a store in Edinburgh, where there were some twenty persons present. I commenced making inquiries about our representation in Congress; I asked if he did not believe that there were influential men in that town who would dissolve the government to-morrow by legislation if they could. He said he believed there were. I asked if he did not believe that a majority of the people would do so. He said he believed they would. I said that there had been too much blood and treasure sacrificed in the country to let them step in now and accomplish by legislation what they failed to accomplish by the sword. I feel satisfied, from the conversations I have had, that if the troops were removed there would be trouble. It seems to me that our protection depends altogether upon United States troops. A little circumstance occurred on the 29th of last month (January) which I will mention: about seven o'clock in the evening, when the mail arrived, I went to the post office, and was in the ante-room, where there were some fifteen or twenty persons around. There was a little black boy there between eight and nine years of age, and there were some four white boys teasing him, knocking off his hat, pulling him, and calling him "Freedmen's Bureau," &c. One of these boys was, I suppose, fifteen years of age. I looked on for some time, and the boys kept it up for about fifteen minutes; at last I spoke, and said that they must stop that, as the boy was not troubling them. The boys stopped at once, and I then turned to the crowd and spoke to them about the impropriety of their permitting such conduct. I said, "You are anxious to get rid of the United States troops, who seem to be a nuisance to you, and why not try and put a stop to such conduct as this." I further stated that it was unpleasant for me, occupying the position I did, to interfere. Nobody made a remark except one old gentleman, who said it was outrageous, and that it occurred every night. I said I wanted to know who that boy's father was; I intended to see the boy's father and tell him about his son's conduct; I could not get one individual to tell me who that boy was. I talked to them in a spirit of kindness, and reasoned with them as though it was my interest to get rid of the troops. I do not regard the troops as a nuisance, because I believe they are necessary for my protection, but I talked as if I regarded them as a nuisance. After I left the post office one of the fellows there made the assertion that I seemed very much concerned about the troops, but that I knew damned well that I couldn't stand there twelve hours if the troops were gone. I have here the sworn statement of the postmaster. Witness produced and read the statement as follows:

"On the 29th day of January, 1866, I heard Watkins James talking to several persons about permitting some persons pulling a little negro about and calling him Freedmen's Bureau. He, James, insisted that it was the duty of every citizen to check such conduct, and gave as a reason why they should take the matter in hand, that unless they put a stop to such conduct we never would get rid of the troops. After said James left the room some person in the room remarked that James knew very well that if the troops left he, James, could not stay there.

"GEORGE W. TAYLOR,
"Postmaster of Winchester, Virginia."

"FREDERICK COUNTY, State of Virginia :

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, Joseph S. Denny, a justice of the peace, January 30, 1866.

"JOSEPH S. DENNY, J. P."

Witness continuing: It is a common saying, and they believe it, that we cannot stay there longer than we are protected by the military. My own idea is, that we cannot. If the military were withdrawn, nothing in the world could save us except the influential rebels were to take a stand and move in the matter.

Question. Does this feeling pervade these three counties?

Answer. I have not been in Warren county recently. Immediately after the surrender that feeling did not seem to pervade either of these counties. The principal inquiry seemed to be what the government would do.

Question. In which of the counties does this feeling prevail?

Answer. In Shenandoah and Frederick. The other county I would suppose was worse, because there are worse rebels there, and more of them. When I was in that county I found but one loyal man in it, and that was at Front Royal. The remark is often made, and it is the general impression, that we must go away from there as soon as the troops are removed. I have been struck by the good behavior and forbearance of the negroes. I have seen them pelted with snow-balls by boys fifteen years of age. The negroes seem to pass by and take no notice of what is done to them. There is almost negro element enough in the town of Winchester to weed out the rebels if they chose. I entertain the idea that the leading men are too much afraid of the government to take any part in the matter; but I look every day for patience to cease to be a virtue. The negroes have behaved thus far remarkably well. After this transaction which I have spoken of as having taken place in the post office, I went to Mr. Philip Williams, one of the leading lawyers, and told him about it. My object was to show him that there was no disposition to stop this thing. He rather apologized for the boys, and supposed they were playing with the negro. I told him about the remark which the fellow made about my having to leave. He said that I was popular among the people; that he had never heard any one speak disrespectfully of me, and that there was no danger of me. He said that the fellow must certainly have been drunk.

Question. What are Mr. Williams's politics?

Answer. Mr. Williams has been aiding the rebellion all he could since the State seceded. Before that, he made some of the most eloquent Union speeches I ever heard. The reason they do not try to suppress this element is this: they are working on the political board and want these boys' votes. It does appear to me that they are laboring now as faithfully to bring about a dissolution of the Union by legislation as they did by the sword, and they think they will accomplish it.

Question. Do you suppose there are any conspiracies or secret associations having in view the dissolution of the Union?

Answer. I do not know that there are; but I think that there is a general understanding among them in their political movements, and that they hope to accomplish a dissolution of the Union by legislation.

Question. How are they going to work at that?

Answer. If they can get representatives in Congress, and get up any question that will divide the north, they expect, by co-operation with their copperhead brethren, to embarrass legislation, and get the government into difficulty.

Question. By means of concert with their copperhead brethren?

Answer. Yes; I feel satisfied that if there was a rupture to-morrow between the United States and France or England, four-fifths of these men would engage with any ally who they might think would prove the destruction of the country. I cannot be mistaken about that.

Question. Have you heard anything said about that?

Answer. No; I have heard nothing said about it; but I have heard men arguing about the great principles that underlie the government—men who have not been defenders of their country or protectors of its honor; and the only object in the world they could have in wishing to get the country into trouble was to have their revenge.

Question. Do they generally detest the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are they in the habit of speaking of the government of the United States in terms of opprobrium or contumely?

Answer. Yes, sir; they hardly ever speak of it in any other terms. They speak of it as a tyrannical, oppressive, Yankee government, and everything else. They would injure themselves and the entire community if they thought they could ultimately injure the government. They suffer the basest misrepresentations to be gotten up about the currency, for instance. Men who have too much common sense to believe a story of that kind suffer it to be repeated in their presence a hundred times. For instance, they allow statements to be made in relation to the national bank notes which they know to be false. They will suffer the entire community to be injured by those misrepresentations simply that they may ultimately injure the government. I happened to be at Woodstock on Monday week, when a merchant came into the office and offered a note in payment of his taxes. I had seen this underhand work in trying to depreciate the currency, and I thought it was a good time to say something in favor of the currency. The room was pretty full, and all of them were rebels. Said I, "Mr. Smith, if I understand anything about the national currency—and I do not profess to understand much about it—the holder of this note is safe anyhow, unless the government breaks. Now," said I, "do you know how the bank gets this note?" He says he did not know. Said I, "Let me tell you how I think it is. The banks do not now issue their notes as the old banking institutions did; but before one of these national banks can issue a note they have to deposit a sufficient amount of government bonds for the ultimate redemption of their notes. Now," said I, "I can see how the bank itself can break, but the holder of the note must get paid." They began to talk about the matter, and all of them agreed upon it. "Now," says I, "if you all understood it before, why did not you simply say so, and stop these reports? They can do no good, but injure the currency of the country. This paper is worth from sixty to seventy cents on a dollar. If you drive this out of circulation, the next best money you can get is the notes of some broken bank of Virginia, that will be worth only from ten to twenty-five cents on a dollar." And yet they allow these reports to pass uncontradicted.

Question. Do you mean to say that business men who are in the daily use of large amounts of money—merchants and dealers who know the necessity of a good currency—will remain silent while these aspersions are cast upon the credit of the national currency?

Answer. Yes, sir. I saw in the town of Winchester lists of broken banks given to men who came into the country to put them on their guard, and the reason of it was this: None of the issues of these banks were in circulation; but the idea was to give the impression that there were bills of broken banks in circulation, so as to make people suspicious of the national bank notes. I was in Woodstock the day the military were withdrawn from there, and was stopping at the house of a Mr. Ives. A teacher of the colored school came down to see Mr. Ives, and spoke about giving up his school. He advised him to go on and continue his school, and take six or seven of the young men home with him to protect him. That night they put up a piece of writing on the postmaster's door, blaming him for boarding this man who was teaching the colored school. The writing made inquiry about his board bill—whether he had paid it, and remarking that the postmaster had gone up the spout for boarding him. After a day or two they took to snow-balling the teacher, and he had them up before the court. There their fathers promised that they would not do so any more, and they were let off. That judge was elected before the right of suffrage was extended. I do not believe that a Union man can have any justice in the courts for any outrage done him during the rebellion; and I will give my reason for that belief. Some Union lawyers there instituted certain suits of that kind, which have come off before the county court, and they have all been moved up before the circuit court, so as to get Judge Parker's opinion.

Question. Is that circuit court a State court?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How can a case be thus removed from a county court to a circuit court?

Answer. I am not lawyer enough to tell you; but there is a mode provided by law. I heard Mr. Pollock, a lawyer there, say that Mr. Williams, another lawyer, had four or five suits of that kind, and withdrew them because he would not involve his clients in further costs, as he did not believe there was any chance for them. He was afraid of the rulings of the circuit court being in favor of the rebels.

Question. You think that if the troops were withdrawn there would be scenes of riot and bloodshed committed by the rebels upon Union men?

Answer. I think so. I think Union men would not be permitted to stay there. I heard a lady who had been a refugee during the war say that she went to a church in Woodstock, and that a lady came in and took a seat beside her, but upon discovering who she was she got up and took a seat in another part of the house. The rebels will set to and curse the Union men who went off and followed the old flag as traitors.

Question. Do the rebels generally disregard the obligatory character of the oath?

Answer. It seems to me they entertain the idea that that oath is forced upon them for the purpose of their obtaining equal rights with other citizens, and therefore is not obligatory or binding upon them. I think that nineteen out of twenty believe that. It is a doctrine taught by high authority. Soon after the surrender I went up the valley and found these people quiet and peaceable, disposed to submit to almost anything. Some of the leading men inquired earnestly as to the policy the government would pursue towards them. I thought there would be no confiscation, and I remarked to them that there was nobody in the Shenandoah valley of importance enough for the government to notice if they behaved themselves. I gave them every assurance, so as to pacify them. Since that time they have assumed a different attitude altogether.

Question. What, in your opinion, has been the cause of that change?

Answer. My own impression is that the leniency of the government is the cause. They expected to have been dealt with more harshly than they have been. They found that the right of suffrage was extended to them, and that they could control the State and county and had nothing to fear.

Question. What, in general, is the disposition of the rebel portion of the population towards the freedman?

Answer. They are as hostile to him as they possibly can be. If it were not for the Freedmen's Bureau he would be in a worse situation now than when he was in bondage. My honest impression is that, if you remove the military, the negro will either have to leave there, go back to bondage, or be annihilated. It seems to me there is an animosity between the rebels and the negroes which never will be settled in this world. If there was a collision between the rebels and negroes to-morrow in Winchester I would not be afraid to walk the streets while the contest was going on, for I know that the negroes would not trample me. Their conduct has been orderly beyond my expectations. Their conduct has been unexceptionable, only that some of them will not work as well as they were expected to work; but there are a great many white people who will not work either. It is not an uncommon thing to see five or six of these young aristocrats, who never worked a day in their lives, and who are depending on bank stock which is not worth a cent, cursing and damning the negroes for not working, while the negroes can get along better without work than they can.

Question. What is the truth of the case in regard to the negro's inclination to work now that he is set free?

Answer. The negroes there seem to be sustaining themselves. I do not know that any charity is given to them in Winchester. I have said to these people: "I have no sympathy with the negroes; I am not going to grieve myself to death about them. Here is work for them to do."

Question. If the negro is fairly and honestly paid for his labor will he not work enough?

Answer. My own impression is that he will work much better than those people who are denouncing him. It is all a humbug, and has been a humbug from the beginning, to say that he will not work. The negroes know where they are treated well.

Question. What do you think of the present State government of Virginia?

Answer. I think that is the rock on which we split—in extending the right of suffrage so that the rebels could get control of things. I regard Mr. Peirpoint as having been deceived by them. He thought his lenient course would work well; but it has only made them arrogant.

Question. Does a Unionist stand any chance of being elected to office in Virginia?

Answer. None in the world; he never will be elected to office there. You have no idea of the tyranny exercised over men's opinions there. A friend could not sit down and talk with you if the negro was concerned in the conversation. Here was the prosecuting attorney, with the law on the one hand, and the mob with tar and feathers on the other. Talk about liberty! there never was more tyranny exercised on the face of the earth.

Question. Is it likely that a rebel who has been wilfully and willingly engaged in the war against the United States could be brought to justice and convicted of treason before a Virginia jury?

Answer. No, sir; no possibility of it unless you pack the jury with Union men. They believe now that they had the right of secession. The Virginia legislature want to assume the direct tax of 1861, and my opinion as to their object is, that it would be a stepping-stone towards establishing their great doctrine of State sovereignty. Another objection to their assuming it is, that they will collect the tax in their own way, by a capitation tax, so as to make the laboring people pay it, because the landed aristocracy are not able to pay it. Besides, a great many of the Union men went forward and paid their taxes, while the rebels are holding back as if by concert of action.

Question. Would they not be likely to discriminate between rebels and Unionists in the imposition of this tax?

Answer. It would seem to me that they would do so.

Question. And compel the Unionists to pay the principal part of the tax?

Answer. If there was any way in the world to put it all upon them they would do it. They say we are the ones who created the debt—that we would not let them alone.

Question. Is there anything else you wish to say to the committee?

Answer. No, sir; nothing else.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1866.

The following letter was this day received from the witness Watkins James, and was directed to be attached to his testimony:

ASSESSOR'S OFFICE, U. S. INT. REVENUE, 3D DISTRICT VIRGINIA,
Woodstock, Shenandoah County, Va., February 12, 1866.

DEAR SIR: You will remember that I was before the Committee on Reconstruction on the 2d day of February. Permit me to add to my testimony some things that have taken place since my return. I came from Winchester to this place to attend to my duty. I passed up Cedar Creek valley, and the rebels in this county have shown such a vindictive spirit that my friends here were alarmed about my safety, and were much relieved when I arrived. The reasons they gave, there was no security for life. A few days ago an anonymous letter was dropped in the post office, notifying the teacher of the freedmen's school that he must leave or take the consequences. About the same time, or a few days thereafter, two United States detectives were run from New Market. A black man, who culled at New Market to collect some money due him, was run out of the town. There was a juvenile exhibition in Woodstock, the county seat of Shenandoah county, under the supervision of the minister of the Methodist church south—his name is Armstrong—at which the lone star was exhibited in the room, with the word excelsior written under it. An argument was made, drawing a comparison between General Lee and George Washington, in which General Lee was made the greater. A man named Lamberson, who is engaged in a business in Woodstock, was coming from where his parents lived to town. He was shot at twice in quick succession, one ball passing in front of his face, and a Minnie ball passing through his carpet-sack, which he was carrying in his hand. This man's offence is, he served in the Union army. The Union men feel there is great danger. About the same time a teacher of freedmen, who was teaching about six miles east of New Market, and in Page county, was called on some time in the night by fifteen or twenty persons and taken from his bed; taken to the Shenandoah river, put in a ferry-boat, taken to the middle of the stream where the water was about four feet deep, and held under the water some time. He was put under a second time, and then threatened, if he did not leave the county in three days, he would be shot dead. This teacher came to Woodstock and reported these facts. The man who kept the key to the ferry-boat is either postmaster or deputy postmaster. The key to the boat was used by the mob. All these transactions took place about the same time, and but for the timely arrival of a few

Union soldiers at Woodstock, there is no telling where these atrocities would have ended. The teacher at Woodstock, and the one they ducked near New Market, went to Winchester and reported this case of ducking to Major General Ayres. He referred them back to the lieutenant at Woodstock, and thus the matter at present rests. It is said as soon as the cavalry arrives some arrests will be made, as several of the parties engaged in this outrage are known. While under examination you asked me if I knew of any secret organization existing in Virginia which I thought was operating against the government. I told you I did not, but there was a concert of action among the rebels since my arrival here. I now think there is, for this reason: A Union man, upon whom I can rely, told me a rebel asked him whether he had heard of such an organization, and from the character of that man I feel confident, from the manner in which the question was asked, it was done simply to find out whether the Union man knew of the existence of the organization. Rebel songs are sung nightly in our streets, and sometimes shouts for Jefferson Davis. When the purport of the Emperor of France's address was known here the leading rebels evidently showed they were disappointed. I am fully satisfied they would rejoice to see a war between the United States and any other power that they thought could damage the government.

Yours, very respectfully,

WATKINS JAMES,
Assistant Assessor 3d District Virginia.

Hon. JACOB M. HOWARD,
United States Senator for State of Michigan.

P. S.—The teacher who was ducked in the Shenandoah river made an affidavit to that fact before the lieutenant in command at Woodstock to-day. While I am writing there is a crowd in the street singing "Down with the Yankees and up with the bars." A pistol was fired in front of this house not two minutes ago.

ASSESSOR'S OFFICE U. S. INT. REVENUE, 3D DISTRICT VIRGINIA,
Shenandoah County, Va., February 12, 1866.

I, Watkins James, do solemnly swear that I believe all the above statements are true. They have come to my knowledge by such sources as I cannot reasonably doubt.

WATKINS JAMES.

Sworn to before me this 12th day of February, 1866.

GEORGE RYE, Justice of the Peace.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Rev. E. O. Dunning sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Winchester, Virginia. I am not legally a resident of Virginia, but that is my headquarters.

Question. In what capacity are you acting?

Answer. I am a clergyman, and I am agent of the American Bible Society. I was sent out to Tennessee and Virginia after the close of the war to make some explorations in regard to the condition of things there.

Question. How long have you been actually at Winchester?

Answer. I have been at Winchester about a month; but I have been in the valley of the Shenandoah and southwestern Virginia and East Tennessee for five months; I have been through all that region.

Question. Where is your home?

Answer. My family resides in New Haven, Connecticut. I am a citizen of Connecticut. I resided, I may say, ten years, before the war, in Virginia. I left there when the war broke out.

Question. In what part of Virginia did you reside?

Answer. In Winchester; that is, I resided there, as I do now. Occasionally I went home north to see my friends.

Question. Have you travelled about in Virginia much since the commencement of hostilities?

Answer. I have.

Question. Have you mingled freely with the people of all classes?

Answer. I have.

Question. What portions of Virginia have you visited since the war?

Answer. I have visited the tier of counties which belong to southwestern Virginia and the whole valley of the Shenandoah. I have been in nearly two-thirds of the counties of the valley since the close of the war. I visited at least twenty counties.

Question. How do you find the state of public feeling among the ex-rebels, where you have been travelling in Virginia, in reference to the government of the United States, and in reference to the loyal people?

Question. My opinion is that they are, as a general thing, disloyal. When I speak of their being disloyal I mean this: that they seem not to have fidelity to the government. They do not seem to have any good will to the government. They are not true, as I understand it, to the Union of the States, because I think that the old disunion feeling still exists there, and that they would like to be independent to-morrow.

Question. Do they tell you so, or is that an inference of their own?

Answer. Well, I will say this—that I have heard such expressions used.

Question. Among people of condition and influence?

Answer. I would not say that. I merely say that I have heard such expressions used as this: that they did what was perfectly right, and would do the same thing again; that I have heard, and that expression is published in the correspondence of the London Times as being the opinion of the young men of Virginia.

Question. What part would the ex-rebels generally be likely to take in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign power, such as France or England?

Answer. I have heard a great deal on that subject. I have heard general exultation at the prospect of a war with Mexico and France, because it would cripple the United States, and I have heard this remark made in connexion with it, and by respectable men, too, that were war to occur between the United States and Mexico, thousands of young men would rush to Mexico.

Question. What side would they be likely to take?

Answer. Against the United States.

Question. What young men?

Answer. The southern young men who had been in the rebel army. They would rush to Mexico; I have heard that. I have made a little arrangement of my ideas on paper here. Would it be pertinent to the subject to mention the ecclesiastical divisions upon sectional grounds, and the feelings of the people in that respect?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, sir; go on and give your narrative in your own words touching upon all the subjects that you choose to touch upon.

WITNESS. I would say with reference to church divisions that ecclesiastical bodies in Virginia are now divided upon sectional grounds. Before the war, churches in Virginia and in the south were connected with one of the general assemblies. They have now a synod of their own in the south, and on no ground that I can see, except on the sectional ground. I refer to the Presbyterian body, Old School. The Presbyterian body, New School, was divided before the war; that is, there was a southern assembly and a northern assembly. Since the war the Old School body and the New School body have merged all their doctrinal divisions, and have come together and united in doctrine; whereas they were divided before, discarding all connexion with the north.

Question. How do these religionists of whom you speak regard the abolition of slavery?

Answer. They say that the question is settled, so far as slavery is concerned.

Question. Do they think the abolition of slavery right or wrong?

Answer. They do not like it; they think it wrong.

Question. Is that feeling pretty general in that church?

Answer. Yes, sir. As to the Methodist denominations the same things have occurred there, which I thought very significant. Although the Methodist denomination was divided before the war on the question of slavery, yet there were many churches in the valley of Virginia still connected with the north by the Baltimore conference. Since the war these churches have gone over to the south, and withdrawn their connexion from the north. The preacher who was sent by the Baltimore conference to the church at Winchester was confronted in the pulpit by Mr. Wilson, a minister, who belongs to the southern connexion, and who took the hymn-book out of his hand and went on and preached the sermon. That was since the war. General Ayres, the general of the department, was in the congregation at the time, and sent word to Mr. Wilson not to appear in the evening; he had given notice of a meeting in the evening. That congregation has all withdrawn from the church and gone to the southern church, leaving the pews to the few Unionists who are there, officers of the army, &c. They all go to the Union church to sustain it, but the body of the people have gone to the southern church—all on sectional ground entirely.

In Berryville recently a mob broke up the meeting of a Methodist minister who had been sent by the Baltimore conference, in his own church where he was preaching. The mob assailed him, and drove him out of the pulpit and out of the church, and one of them fired a gun or pistol. The rebels said that they had fought four years, and would fight four years longer to break up such an establishment as that. I suppose that may be important to indicate the state of public feeling there. Northern ministers are not invited to preach in the south at all.

Question. How general is that refusal to invite them?

Answer. Almost universal, unless a northern minister is known to be a southern sympathizer. Some northern men may preach in the south.

Question. So far as your observation extends, is this universal?

Answer. Yes, sir. Dr. Bacon, of New Haven, went to the south, and I suppose he would give the same testimony. As an agent of the Baltimore conference I did business there, but was not invited into any pulpit, as I used to be. I am speaking now of Virginia; there is a very different feeling in Tennessee. I went all through the valley of Virginia, and western Virginia to Charlottesville, and over the ridge to Lynchburg, and was not invited to preach anywhere. I never heard a prayer for the President of the United States, or for the government, except in the Episcopal service, which requires it. I have heard since the close of the war expressions made in the pulpit, of which the people approved, in regard to the oppression of the United States government. I was in Charlottesville on the thanksgiving day appointed by President Johnson, and while the stores were shut up, there were no religious observations taken of the day at all.

An Episcopal minister of high standing in one of the towns of Virginia went down town with his coat to be mended; in one store that he went into he asked the tailor if he was a Union man: the tailor said yes, and the minister would not leave his coat to be mended, saying that he would not trade with Union people; he would rather do without having his coat mended. His congregation embraces friends of very influential men in the south.

A distinguished Presbyterian minister, Dr. Boyd, died recently in the valley of Virginia. His funeral sermon was preached by one of the most celebrated clergymen of Virginia, the well known Dr. Stiles, who was formerly settled over one of the Richmond churches, and in his sermon he made these remarks: he alluded to Dr. Boyd; said that he was a strong southern man, and had done what he could to separate the churches north and south, which he did not regret; then he spoke of Dr. Boyd having been taken from his family as a prisoner (he had been taken and carried to Wheeling as a hostage for the safety of two members of the West Virginia legislature who had been taken to Richmond.) He remarked that Dr. Boyd regretted nothing he had done for the separation of the churches, and asked who had any right to drag him from his family, to take him away and place him among felons as a prisoner?

Question. Did he say that the clergyman who was made a prisoner was placed among felons by the Union troops?

Answer. Yes, sir; he used that phrase, and I was pained to hear it. I was there myself part of the time; but this thing came directly to me from a lady who heard it. I thought it was calculated to keep up a state of bad feeling and excitement there.

I would say, in the next place, that there is very little social intercourse between the Union people and the secesh people of the district with which I am acquainted. The rebels will not have anything to do with the Union people. As a general thing, they shun them, and, as they are in the majority, the Union people expect them to make the advances which they are willing to meet; but the secesh people stand aloof and show very little social feeling. Union ladies are not recognized in the churches where they have been accustomed to go. No notice is taken of them by the secesh people in the churches. They will not trade with the Union people in that section of the country, if they can help it. I think there is a general disposition manifested not to do so, and I can relate some instances of it.

Mr. HOWARD. If they illustrate the state of feeling, relate them.

WITNESS. An apothecary in that district said that all his secesh customers had fallen off since the war. A shoemaker said that he had not had six cents' worth of custom from a secesh since the war closed. When I was going back south at the close of the war I met in Baltimore a gentleman from Winchester. He asked me where I was going. I told him I was going to Winchester, and asked him a little about the state of things there. He is a man of some influence. He said that northern men could not stay there, and he told me the circumstance of a Union man who came there with a carpet bag full of money to buy land, and who very soon found his way back to the railroad cars, because there was such a feeling of opposition to men who come there to buy land.

Question. You think there is an opposition to northern people going there to buy land and settle?

Answer. I think there is.

Question. How strong is it?

Answer. It exists among the majority of the people. A gentleman told me the other day that he bought a farm a few miles from town, but that there was such a state of feeling there, he was sorry he did so, and would sell it as soon as he could. A secesh lady who had been in the habit of trading with a Union man inquired of his brother if he was a Union man. He said yes. She had been trading at the rate of a thousand a year, but she said she would do no more trading with him.

I will relate an anecdote as to the feeling towards the United States government, the troops, and the Freedmen's Bureau. I met two or three gentlemen in Marion county, Virginia, within the last two months. They were conversing about the state of things. One of them was a principal lawyer of the county, and another was one of the most influential men of the county. One of them said, "Well, we submit because we are obliged to, but we hate the government, and, if the government were to get into trouble, we would laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh." The other gentleman, turning to his son, said "Yes, we teach our boys to hate the Yankees; there is a boy twelve years old who is trained up to hate the Yankees." These are two as distinguished men as are to be found in the valley.

I have often heard it mentioned as good news, the possibility of a rupture with France upon the Mexican question. General Lee's chief of artillery (Curtis or Custis, I think) was travelling with a friend of mine in the State, who related to me this fact; The chief of artillery found out that my friend was from the north and said to him "You have the advantage now, but we will try you again if you do not give us our rights," or words to that effect. It was as strong as that certainly. This was reported to Mr. Seward. A gentleman in Woodstock, an influential man, said the same thing to me. He is the tavern-keeper there. He said "well, we are whipped; but if the government does not give us our rights, we will fight again."

Question. What did he mean by their rights?

Answer. That he did not specify. I suppose he meant State-rights. I heard a remark made in reference to which was the strongest party in Virginia, the Union or the rebel party. The remark was, that if the United States troops were withdrawn we would soon see who were the strongest party. It was a rebel who said so. The army wagons belonging to the government were recently stoned when they were leaving Woodstock. This was within a few days past. They were also fired upon from a house. I have these facts upon the authority of Captain Howe, who is on duty at Winchester; and I suppose General Ayers will make a report of it to the War Department; but I thought I might as well mention it to the committee. Lieutenant Hall told me that he was travelling in an omnibus going to the cars; that the rebels were two rebel officers sitting beside him, and that one of them said to the other that the member elect to Congress had promised him an office, and that he supposed he would get him his old office in the Coast Survey. I think myself that the way the rebels parade their uniforms, wearing their buttons, is a sign of disloyalty.

Question. State how they parade them.

Answer. A great many coats are worn which were worn in the rebel army. As a general thing their buttons are cut off; but there are a good many who still wear their buttons. Some coats are evidently new, made in the old shape, but merely denuded of buttons, while a great many wear buttons. The gray predominates throughout the south. They seem to fancy it. As to the Freedmen's Bureau, of course there is a universal hostility against it. There is no doubt about that. Mr. Tookay, assistant superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau in Staunton, was lately hooted in the streets. His authority was repudiated by persons whom he had summoned before him, on the ground that the Yankees were gone. A circumstance occurred recently in the cars at Gordonsville to Mr. Cohan, superintendent of colored schools. He had got out of the cars for a moment, leaving his baggage on the seat. When he came back into the car he found that his baggage had been set aside, and that a lady had taken his seat. He finally hunted up his baggage and remarked to a person near him that he thought no lady would use a gentleman's baggage in that way. The gentleman afterwards conversed with the lady and she told him the facts. When they were getting out of the cars he told Mr. Cohan that if he did not ask the lady's pardon he should suffer for it. Mr. Cohan said that he had not insulted any person, and was not going to ask pardon. Upon that the gentleman knocked him down. His name is Strother, and he is a member of the house of representatives of Virginia. Cohan rose from the ground and asked if there was no guard there, meaning the United States soldiers. One man remarked, "We have got enough of you, you d—d Yankee;" and that was the general shout of the car-load of passengers. They had inquired of the conductor who Cohan was, and when they found out who he was the general feeling was against him—a feeling of exultation that he had been knocked down. I would say that colored schools have been broken up in Virginia since the troops have been withdrawn. That has been the case in Waynesboro', near Staunton.

Question. Is that to your personal knowledge?

Answer. I had it from Mr. Tookay, assistant superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau at Staunton. A southern lady, who had undertaken to teach a colored school there, had been told to leave. They would not allow her to teach there.

Question. Who told her to leave?

Answer. The secesh portion of the people.

Question. Did she leave?

Answer. Yes, sir; but they were going to restore the school again. She did leave, and the school was broken up. Ladies who go there as teachers of colored schools find it almost impossible to get any quarters; people will not take them in to board. I have heard it said often that if the soldiers of the United States were not there, there would be no colored schools open. Mr. Creever, pastor of the Methodist church in Winchester, told me the other day that although he had done nothing but preach in the church, he should not consider his life safe in Winchester unless there were troops there. I have heard some of the conservative secessionists say that it is the mob that does this thing; but the question arises, why there is not some exhibition of feeling on their part to put down such things. I believe, from my general observation of the people of that district, and from what I know of Virginia before the war and since, that there is as bitter feeling prevalent among the people against the Union citizens at the south—those who sided with the Union cause in the rebellion—as there was during the war; and that is the general feeling there among Union people. I do not think that the Union men can stay there, unless they are protected by the United States soldiers. A circumstance occurred the day before yesterday in Winchester, which it may be as well to mention. Two Union men were conversing in the street, and one said to the other that for his part he approved of a certain measure introduced in Congress to consider the States lately in rebellion as conquered territory, to be treated as such. A person who was said to be the first man to appear when the war broke out, with his musket, in the streets of Winchester—he was a major afterwards in the rebel army throughout the war, and is an influential man—was passing at the time and overheard part of the remark. He turned to the other Union man and asked, "What did he say?" The other mentioned what he had said, that he had approved of the measure introduced by Mr. Stevens. "Ah," said he, "he ought to have been hanged ten years ago, and you with him," and he passed on. The post-master at Winchester is my authority.

Question. Do you know anything about the condition of East Tennessee?

Answer. Yes, sir, I do. I visited about twenty counties, out of thirty, in East Tennessee. I consider the people of East Tennessee as decidedly loyal—very much so. I did not go into West Tennessee. Judging from what they said and did, there is a strong feeling manifested against the rebels. There have been some excesses of mobs, which, of course, I do not approve of; but they were excesses running the other way. The rebels there are altogether more subdued and more submissive than the rebels in Virginia, and have, I thought, a different feeling towards the government of the United States.

Question. Is it not because there are more Union men in East Tennessee that the rebels feel thus mollified?

Answer. I think it is. I found there the old feeling against the colored people, just as much as in Virginia.

Question. What is the general disposition of the rebel people toward the freedmen in Virginia where you have been acquainted?

Answer. Decidedly hostile.

Question. If they could have their way would they reduce the blacks again to slavery?

Answer. I cannot say, as a general thing; some would.

Question. Would they expel them from the country if they had that power?

Answer. I think they would.

Question. Are they willing to supply their places with free laborers from the north or from foreign lands?

Answer. They manifest a preference to supply their places with foreigners.

Question. Are the rebel people, with whom you have been acquainted, generally anxious still for southern independence, so called?

Answer. Yes, sir; I regard them so.

Question. Do they seem to feel a disposition to separate themselves and to be by themselves as an independent people, unconnected, either commercially or socially, with the northern States?

Answer. Yes, sir; they do, very decidedly.

Question. Do they appear to hate the government of the United States generally as a government?

Answer. I think they do.

Question. And do they appear to hate the north as a community?

Answer. Yes, sir; decidedly.

Question. In case of the removal of the military forces of the United States from those communities, is it likely, in your mind, that there would be scenes of violence and riot there?

Answer. I have no doubt of it.

Question. What would be the special object of such violence?

Answer. I think it would manifest itself against Union citizens and against colored people.

Question. In your opinion, could any considerable portion of the rebel population be induced to volunteer their military services to defend the government of the United States?

Answer. I think not; that is my opinion.

Question. How do they regard General Lee?

Answer. With a great deal of admiration.

Question. How do they regard Jefferson Davis?

Answer. I never heard much said about Davis in my travels. They did not talk about him much. They talked pretty much about Lee.

Question. Did you hear any censure cast upon Lee, among intelligent men, either for the terms of his surrender or for the fact of his surrender?

Answer. I did not.

Question. When they say that they "accept the situation," what is the practical meaning which they attach to that very indefinite phrase?

Answer. I suppose them to mean this; that they could not wage the war any longer; that they were conquered, and had to submit to the government of the United States, but unwillingly, and that they would prefer to be independent all the time. That is my opinion.

Question. Have you any reason to believe, from information which you may have gathered, that there are conspiracies or combinations of rebels having in view the renewal of the war or the securing of southern independence?

Answer. I have not. I have not any knowledge of that sort.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1866.

Calvin Pepper sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Of what State are you a native ?

Answer. Of Massachusetts.

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. At Norfolk, Virginia.

Question. How long have you resided at Norfolk ?

Answer. I have resided at Norfolk about eighteen months.

Question. What is your occupation there ?

Answer. I am a lawyer.

Question. Are you in the practice of the law there ?

Answer. Yes, sir. I was in the practice of the law at Alexandria six months before going there.

Question. How extensively are you acquainted with the political and social condition of affairs in Virginia ?

Answer. I will state the sources of my knowledge and information. I am delegate here from a loyal league council, No. 7, of Norfolk. I have come commended by that league. I have been delegated to come to Washington to represent the state of feeling in Virginia. I am also sent here by an association of white persons exclusively, at Norfolk, to promote the right of impartial suffrage. This loyal league and this association comprise, as I believe, every one of the white persons in that section of the country who have been loyal during the war.

Question. How numerous are the two associations put together ?

Answer. The number of white persons whom I feel authorized to represent is about two hundred and fifty.

Question. Are they all embraced within the city of Norfolk ?

Answer. Norfolk and Portsmouth. I am also deputed to represent about twelve mass meetings, held irrespective of color, but principally composed of colored people, held at Norfolk, Portsmouth, Hampton, Old Point, Yorktown, and Williamsburg.

Question. To whom are you deputed here ?

Answer. I was deputed to the President of the United States, to this committee, to the War Department, to the Freedmen's Bureau, and to represent the interests of the people whom I have come to represent. I would state that I have also been elected by the colored people of Norfolk county as their judge in the freedmen's court, so called, and that I have been, by many separate meetings, appointed the attorney and counsel of colored people in regard to those matters, and that I should judge that there are at least thirty persons a day on the average at my office, especially colored people, consulting me in regard to matters pertaining to their interests.

Question. What is the state of feeling on the part of the rebel people in and about Norfolk toward the government of the United States ?

Answer. It is decidedly hostile.

Question. Is that hostility apparently on the increase ?

Answer. It has sensibly increased within the last three months—that is, by expression.

Question. What, in your opinion, is the cause of that increase ?

Answer. I do not say there is an increase of the feeling, but there is an increase of the manifestation of that feeling.

Question. What do you fancy has been the cause of that increase ?

Answer. Their restoration to power by pardons.

Question. What effect has the liberal policy of granting amnesties and pardons had upon the minds and hearts of the rebels ?

Answer. To encourage them in their hopes of establishing an independent government eventually.

Question. What appears to be the ultimate hope of the rebel community there ; what do they intend ; what is the ultimate purpose and great end to which they are looking ?

Answer. I think they still fondly cherish the hope of eventual separation from the United States government, but to be brought about in other ways than by the battle-field. They seem to have abandoned that.

Question. What other scheme have they in view now ?

Answer. I will state that I am seriously apprehensive of direct hostile collisions between loyal citizens and the former rebels, unless checked.

Question. Suppose the Union forces were withdrawn from those localities, what result would it have ?

Answer. I do not believe there would be protection to the colored people or to the loyal white men, or that it would be safe for a loyal white man to reside there.

Question. What would the rebels do ?

Answer. I think we would not be safe in property, liberty or life.

Question. You mean to say that you apprehend scenes of violence and outrage ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How do the rebels feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. They feel vindictive toward them because of their aid in suppressing the rebellion and their steadfast loyalty to the country.

Question. If they had the power, what kind of policy would they pursue toward the freedmen?

Answer. They would reduce them again to slavery, or its equivalent under some other name, so far as they could do so without interference.

Question. Would you apprehend an expulsion of the blacks from the neighborhood?

Answer. Their expulsion or complete subjugation, one or the other.

Question. Is that feeling, in your opinion, prevalent in the State of Virginia?

Answer. I believe that is the opinion of all the colored people without exception, and that is the opinion and conviction of all the white Unionists with whom I have come into correspondence, many of whom are native Virginians. The native Virginians are the most decided in that conviction.

Question. Do you draw these conclusions from your actual conversations with the rebel portion of the community, or from the loyal portion?

Answer. From both, and from what I have seen and observed and know.

Question. What is the feeling in relation to any foreign war in which the United States may be engaged?

Answer. I think that, with the present feeling, it would be quite unsafe, if we would preserve peace at home, to engage in foreign war.

Question. What do you anticipate would be the course taken by the rebels?

Answer. I think they would make use of that opportunity to show resistance again to the United States government.

Question. Would they generally join the enemies of the United States?

Answer. If by that course they could secure their independence, as they call it, I think they would.

Question. What is the general feeling among the rebels toward the northern people; are they willing to have social and commercial intercourse with them?

Answer. They carefully abstain from it, and persistently, so far as they can and maintain any of the other decent appearances of life.

Question. How much chance does a northern Unionist stand in a State court in Virginia in the prosecution of his rights?

Answer. A very poor chance.

Question. In an ordinary suit between a loyalist, whether northerner or southerner, and a rebel, would you expect that justice would be fairly administered by a State court and jury in Virginia?

Answer. As a general rule, I do not. Of course there might be some jurors who would insist on justice being done; but, as a general rule, I do not think there would be.

Question. In your opinion, could one of the ringleaders of the rebellion, if brought to trial for treason before a jury selected in Virginia, be convicted of treason upon clear proof of his having participated in the war against the United States?

Answer. I should regret very much to have the experiment tried.

Question. What, in your opinion, would be the result in case the proofs were clear and sufficient; would the jury find a traitor guilty?

Answer. I think the verdict of a jury could not be relied on. It might be possible that they would convict him, but my own opinion would be that a conviction would not follow. Yet it would be possible if the jury were as fairly constituted as it might be.

Question. Suppose the jurors were taken by lot?

Answer. If they were taken by lot, I do not think that a conviction would be possible.

Question. Could you pick out a jury in the county where you live that would convict Jefferson Davis of treason in case the proof was perfectly clear that he had participated in overt acts of war?

Answer. Not unless northern men should be selected as jurors, or native Virginians who have been loyal throughout the war, and are known to be such.

Question. How do the rebels feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. Within the last six months I have had more than a hundred complaints made to me with reference to the abuse of freedmen by the rebels, or at their instigation. They have been beaten, wounded, and in some instances killed; and I have not yet known one white man to have been brought to justice for an outrage upon a colored man.

Question. Are these scenes of frequent occurrence?

Answer. Quite frequent. I am at present employed in the prosecution of a white man for hanging a colored man; in a prosecution against a white man for shooting, with intent to kill, a colored man; in a prosecution against a mob of white men who broke into the house of a colored man at Portsmouth and robbed him and destroyed his property. These are cases still untried. I am also employed in a case in which a colored man was beaten by a member elect to Congress.

Question. What, if they had the power, would the rebels do with the freedmen—expel them from the country?

Answer. Or subject them, so that they could have their unrequited labor and be masters over them.

Question. From what you have seen, are you of opinion that that feeling is extensive in Virginia ?

Answer. I think it prevails as extensively as ever it did.

Question. Are there colored schools established at Norfolk ?

Answer. There are.

Question. How are they regarded by the rebel whites ?

Answer. With detestation.

Question. Are the teachers treated with respect ?

Answer. They are not, but quite the reverse. They do not expect to be treated with respect.

Question. Is there anything else that you desire to say on this examination ?

Answer. A year ago I thought it my duty to bring before the district court of the United States the right of a colored man from another State to testify in the State courts in Alexandria. I filed a bill in the district court of the United States, before Judge Underwood, in behalf of a witness whose testimony was excluded. I held that the State law excluding his testimony could be treated as a nullity by the United States court, and that that right to testify should be enforced ; for which, and which only, I was indicted at the instigation of the governor of the State.

Question. Indicted for what ?

Answer. Indicted for this disloyalty to the State of Virginia.

Question. For arguing in that way in a court ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; for taking that position ; for that I was indicted. I want to show you what protection we have. I was told by the governor of the State, in view of that (although his opinions are ostensibly changed since) and for other reasons, that, if he had the power, he would build a wall as high as the clouds to exclude every Yankee from the State.

Question. What governor said that ?

Answer. Governor Peirpoint. He told me so to my face, and for no other reason than for those proceedings which he asked me to stay. I told him I would if he would pledge his influence to have a law passed allowing such testimony.

Question. Where did you hold this interview with Peirpoint ?

Answer. In Alexandria.

Question. Have you anything further to state ?

Answer. I will state, that the colored men who are here with me are delegates appointed at the meetings of which I spoke, and are representative men in Virginia, men of influence. The meetings at which these delegates were appointed numbered actually in attendance at least five thousand persons, and this delegation must represent at least fifty thousand persons in Virginia.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Dr. Daniel Norton (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. I reside in Yorktown, Virginia.

Question. How old are you ?

Answer. About 26 years old.

Question. Are you a regularly licensed physician ?

Answer. I am.

Question. Where were you educated ?

Answer. In the State of New York. I studied privately under Dr. Warren.

Question. How long have you resided at Yorktown ?

Answer. About two years.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; I was born in Williamsburg, Virginia.

Question. What is the feeling among the rebels in the neighborhood of Yorktown towards the government of the United States ?

Answer. They do not manifest a very cordial feeling toward the government of the United States. There are some, of course, who do, but the majority do not seem to manifest a good spirit or feeling.

Question. How are they disposed to treat you ?

Answer. Me, as a man, they are generally disposed to treat well, but there are others of my fellow-men whom they do not treat as well.

Question. Are you employed as a physician in white families ?

Answer. I have not been employed in any white families, except in one case, since I have been there. I principally practice among the colored.

Question. How do the returned rebels treat the colored people ?

Answer. They have in some cases treated them well, but in more cases they have not. A number of persons living in the country have come into Yorktown and reported to the Freedmen's Bureau that they have not been treated well; that they worked all the year and had received no pay, and were driven off on the first of January. They say that the owners with whom they had been living rented out their places, sold their crops, and told them they had no further use for them, and that they might go to the Yankees.

Question. What is the condition of the colored people in that neighborhood?

Answer. They are poor, sir. There is a large settlement near Yorktown, called Slabtown, settled by the government during the war with those who came within the lines. The colored people there are doing such work as they can get to do, oystering, &c.

Question. Are not their old masters ready to employ them for wages?

Answer. There have been some sent for, and in several cases they received such bad treatment that they came back again. (Witness related several instances of this kind.)

Question. Are the colored people in your neighborhood willing to work for fair wages?

Answer. They are, sir.

Question. Do they find any difficulty in obtaining employment at fair wages?

Answer. They do find some difficulty. The slaveholders, who have owned them, say that they will take them back, but cannot pay them any wages. Some are willing to pay a dollar a month, and some less, and some are only willing to give them their clothing and what they eat. They are not willing to pay anything for work.

Question. Are the colored people generally provided with houses in which they can eat and sleep?

Answer. Yes, sir; such houses as they have built themselves, slab-houses.

Question. How do the colored people feel toward the government of the United States?

Answer. They feel determined to be law-abiding citizens. There is no other feeling among them.

Question. Are you a delegate sent to the city of Washington by some association?

Answer. I am. I was sent by three counties; I represent, perhaps, something like fifteen or twenty thousand people. The great trouble, in my opinion, is, that the colored people are not more disposed to return to their former homes on account of the treatment which those who have gone back have received.

Question. State generally whether or not the treatment which these colored people receive at the hands of their old white masters is kind or unkind?

Answer. It is not what I would consider kind or good treatment. Of course I do not mean to be understood that there are not some who treat them kindly, but I mean generally; they do not treat them kindly.

Question. In case of the removal of the military force from among you, and also of the Freedmen's Bureau, what would the whites do with you?

Answer. I do not think that the colored people would be safe. They would be in danger of being hunted and killed. The spirit of the whites against the blacks is much worse than it was before the war; a white gentleman with whom I was talking made this remark: he said he was well disposed toward the colored people, but that, finding that they took up arms against him, he had come to the conclusion that he never wanted to have anything to do with them, or to show any spirit of kindness toward them. These were his sentiments.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Reverend William Thornton (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What is your age?

Answer. Forty-two, sir.

Question. Where were you born?

Answer. In Elizabeth City county, Virginia.

Question. What degree of education have you received?

Answer. My education is very narrowly limited; I have not had the advantages of a first-education.

Question. You can read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Oh, yes, sir.

Question. Can you read ordinary newspapers?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you write a letter on business?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Were you ever a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. When were you made free?

Answer. I was made free under the proclamation.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Hampton, Elizabeth City county, Virginia.

Question. How do the old rebel masters down there feel toward your race?

Answer. The feeling existing there now is quite disagreeable.

Question. Do they not treat the colored race with kindness down there?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What acts of unkindness can you mention?

Answer. I was asked the other day if I did not know I was violating the law in celebrating marriages. I did not know that that was the case, and I went up to the clerk's office to inquire; I said nothing out of the way to the clerk of the court; I only asked him if there had been any provision for colored people to be lawfully married. Said he, "I do not know whether there is or not, and if they are granting licenses you can't have any; that is my business, not yours." After I found I was violating the law, I went to the Freedmen's Bureau and stated the case. A provision was afterwards made in the bureau granting licenses, and authorizing me to marry. Some days after that an old gentleman named Houghton, a white man living in the neighborhood of my church, was in the church. In my sermon I mentioned the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. Next day I happened to meet Houghton, who said to me, "Sir, as soon as we can get these Yankees off the ground and move that bureau, we will put you to rights; we will break up your church, and not one of you shall have a church here." Said I, "For what? I think it is for the safety of the country to have religious meetings, and for your safety as well as everybody else's." "We will not have it, sir," said he, and then he commenced talking about two classes of people whom they intended to put to rights, the colored people and the loyal white men. I asked him in what respect he was going to put them to rights; said he, "That is for myself."

Question. Is he a man of standing and condition in the neighborhood?

Answer. He owns property there.

Question. Is he a rebel?

Answer. Oh, yes.

Question. Can you speak of any acts of violence committed by the whites upon the blacks?

Answer. Yes, sir; about three weeks ago a colored man got another one to cut some wood for him, and sent him into the woods adjoining the property of a Mr. Britner, a white man. The colored man, not knowing the line between the two farms, cut down a tree on Britner's land, when Britner went into the woods and deliberately shot him as he would shoot a bird.

Question. Was he not indicted and punished for that?

Answer. They had him in prison.

Question. Is he not in prison now?

Answer. I heard that they had let him out last Sunday morning.

Question. Do you know any other instances of cruelty?

Answer. I have church once a month in Matthews county, Virginia, the other side of the bay. The last time I was over there an intelligent man told me that just below his house a lady and her husband, who had been at the meeting, received thirty-nine lashes for being there, according to the old law of Virginia, as if they had been slaves. This was simply because they were told not to go to hear a Yankee darkey talk. They said he was not a Yankee but was a man born in Virginia, in Hampton.

Question. Why did they not resist being flogged?

Answer. They are that much down.

Question. Did they not know that they had a right to resist?

Answer. They dare not do it.

Question. Why?

Answer. I do not know. On the 1st of January we had a public meeting there, at which I spoke. The next night when I was coming from the church, which is about a mile and a half from my house, I met a colored man who told me that there was a plot laid for me; I went back to the church and got five of my church members to come with me. I afterwards learned that a fellow named Mahon, a white man, had determined, for my speech that day, to murder me the first chance.

Question. Did that come to you in so authentic a form as to leave no doubt upon your mind?

Answer. I believe he made the threat. The next day he said to me, "We hope the time will come that these Yankees will be away from here, and then we will settle with you preachers." That gave me to understand that the threat was made.

Question. Do you wish to state any other instances?

Answer. These are as many as I care to speak of.

Question. You are up here as a delegate to make representations to the President in reference to the condition of the colored people?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are you a regularly ordained minister of the gospel?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. In what church?

Answer. In the Baptist church.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Madison Newby (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Have you any white blood in you ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Where were you born ?

Answer. In Surrey county, Virginia.

Question. How old are you ?

Answer. Thirty-three.

Question. Can you read and write ?

Answer. I cannot write ; I can read a little.

Question. Can you read the Testament ?

Answer. A little.

Question. Have you a family ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you been a slave before the war ?

Answer. No, sir ; I never was a slave.

Question. How do the rebel white people treat you since the war ?

Answer. They do not allow me to go where I came from, except I steal in there.

Question. Why not ?

Answer. They say I am a Yankee. I have been there, but was driven away twice ; they said I would not be allowed to stay there, and I had better get away as quick as possible. I had gone down to look after my land.

Question. Do you own land there ?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How much ?

Answer. One hundred and fifty acres.

Question. Did you pay for it ?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do you stand in fear of the rebel white men ?

Answer. Yes, sir, I do. If all the Union men that are down there would protect us we would not be so much afraid. I went down there to pay my taxes upon my land, but I could not see any person to pay them to ; I didn't want to pay any but the United States government ; and finally, they told me at the court-house that I had better let it alone until I could see further about it.

Question. What is your land worth ?

Answer. I gave $700 for it.

Question. Is there a house on it ?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Do the colored people down there love to work ?

Answer. They work if they can get anything for it ; but the rebel people down there who have got lands will not let the colored people work unless they work for their prices, and they drive them away. They expect colored people down there to work for ten or eighteen cents a day. Six or eight dollars a month is the highest a colored man can get ; of course he gets his board, but he may have a family of six to support on these wages, and of course he cannot do it.

Question. How do you get your living ?

Answer. I am living in Norfolk at present. I piloted the Union forces there when they first came to Surrey ; and afterwards the rebels would not let me go back.

Question. Were you impressed by the Union forces, or did you voluntarily act as a guide ?

Answer. I was impressed. I told the Union forces when they came that unless they were willing to protect me I did not want them to take me away, because my living was there ; and they promised they would see to me.

Question. Did they pay you for your services ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. They gave you enough to eat and drink ?

Answer. They gave me plenty to eat when I was travelling, but nothing to drink except water.

Question. Now that the blacks are made free, will they not, if left to themselves without the protection of the whites, become strollers and rovers about the country and live in idleness, and pilfer and misbehave generally ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not ?

Answer. Because they have all been used to work, and will work if they can get anything to do.

Question. Do they not want to go away from the old places where they have been accustomed to live and go off west somewhere ?

Answer. No, sir ; we want to stay in our old neighborhoods, but those of us who have gone away are not allowed to go back. In Surrey county they are taking the colored people and tying them up by the thumbs if they do not agree to work for six dollars a month; they tie them up until they agree to work for that price, and then they make them put their mark to a contract.

Question. Did you ever see a case of that kind?

Answer. Yes, sir, I did.

Question. How many cases of that kind have you ever seen?

Answer. Only one; I have heard of several such, but I have only seen one.

Question. What is the mode of tying up by the thumbs?

Answer. They have a string tied around the thumbs just strong enough to hold a man's weight, so that his toes just touch the ground; and they keep the man in that position until he agrees to do what they say. A man cannot endure it long.

Question. What other bad treatment do they practice on the blacks? do they whip them?

Answer. Yes, sir; just as they did before the war; I see no difference.

Question. Have you seen them whipped since the war?

Answer. Several times.

Question. By their old masters?

Answer. By the old people around the neighborhood; the old masters get other people to do it.

Question. Do they whip them just as much as they did before the war?

Answer. Just the same; I do not see any alteration in that. There are no colored schools down in Surrey county; they would kill any one who would go down there and establish colored schools. There have been no meetings or anything of that kind. They patrol our houses just as formerly.

Question. What do you mean by patrolling your houses?

Answer. A party of twelve or fifteen men go around at night searching the houses of colored people, turning them out and beating them. I was sent here as a delegate to find out whether the colored people down there cannot have protection. They are willing to work for a living; all they want is some protection and to know what their rights are; they do not know their rights; they do not know whether they are free or not, there are so many different stories told them.

Question. Where did you learn to read?

Answer. I first picked up a word from one and then from another.

Question. Have you ever been at school?

Answer. Never in my life.

Question. Are the black people there anxious for education and to go to school?

Answer. Generally they are; but down in my neighborhood they are afraid to be caught with a book.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Richard R. Hill (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you live?

Answer. Hampton, Virginia.

Question. That is where President Tyler used to live?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did you know him?

Answer. Yes, I knew him pretty well.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. About thirty-four years.

Question. Were you ever a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. When did you become free?

Answer. When the proclamation was issued. I left Richmond in 1863.

Question. Did you serve in the rebel army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Or in the Union army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How do the rebels down there, about Hampton, treat the colored people?

Answer. The returned rebels express a desire to get along in peace if they can. There have been a few outrages out upon the roadside there. One of the returned Union colored soldiers was met out there and beaten very much.

Question. By whom was he beaten?

Answer. It was said they were rebels; they had on Union overcoats, but they were not

United States soldiers. Occasionally we hear of an outrage of that kind, but there are none in the little village where I live.

Question. What appears to be the feeling generally of the returned rebels towards the freedmen; is it kind or unkind?

Answer. Well, the feeling that they manifest as a general thing is kind, so far as I have heard.

Question. Are they willing to pay the freedmen fair wages for their work?

Answer. No, sir; they are not willing to pay the freedmen more than from five to eight dollars a month.

Question. Do you think that their labor is worth more than that generally?

Answer. I do, sir; because, just at this time, everything is very dear, and I do not see how people can live and support their families on those wages.

Question. State whether the black people down there are anxious to go to school?

Answer. Yes, sir; they are anxious to go to school; we have schools there every day that are very well filled; and we have night schools that are very well attended, both by children and aged people; they manifest a great desire for education.

Question. Who are the teachers; white or black?

Answer. White, sir.

Question. How are the white teachers treated by the rebels down there?

Answer. I guess they are not treated very well, because they have very little communication between each other. I have not heard of any threatening expression in regard to them.

Question. Did you ever hear any threats among the whites to reduce your race to slavery again?

Answer. They have said, and it seems to be a prevalent idea, that if their representatives were received in Congress the condition of the freedmen would be very little better than that of the slaves, and that their old laws would still exist by which they would reduce them to something like bondage. That has been expressed by a great many of them.

Question. What has become of your former master?

Answer. He is in Williamsburg.

Question. Have you seen him since the proclamation?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did he want you to go back and live with him?

Answer. No, sir; he did not ask me to go back, but he was inquiring of me about another of his slaves, who was with him at the evacuation of Williamsburg by the rebels.

Question. How do you feel about leaving the State of Virginia and going off and residing as a community somewhere else?

Answer. They do not wish to leave and go anywhere else unless they are certain that the locality where they are going is healthy and that they can get along.

Question. Are they not willing to be sent back to Africa?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not?

Answer. They say that they have lived here all their days, and there were stringent laws made to keep them here; and that if they could live here contented as slaves, they can live here when free.

Question. Do you not think that to be a very absurd notion?

Answer. No, sir; if we can get lands here and can work and support ourselves, I do not see why we should go to any place that we do not want to go to.

Question. If you should stay here, is there not danger that the whites and blacks would intermarry and amalgamate?

Answer. I do not think there is any more danger now than there was when slavery existed. At that time there was a good deal of amalgamation.

Question. Amalgamation in Virginia?

Answer. There was no actual marrying, but there was an intermixture to a great extent. We see it very plainly. I do not think that that troubles the colored race at all.

Question. But you do not think that a Virginia white man would have connexion with a black woman?

Answer. I do, sir; I not only think so, but I know it from past experience. It was nothing but the stringent laws of the south that kept many a white man from marrying a black woman.

Question. It would be looked upon as a very wicked state of things, would it not, for a white man to marry a black woman?

Answer. I will state to you as a white lady stated to a gentleman down in Hampton, that if she felt disposed to fall in love with or marry a black man, it was nobody's business but hers; and so I suppose that if the colored race get all their rights, and particularly their equal rights before the law, it would not hurt the nation or trouble the nation.

Question. In such a case do you think the blacks would have a strong inclination to unite with the whites in marriage?

Answer. No, sir; I do not. I do not think that the blacks would have so strong an inclination to unite with the whites as the whites would have to unite with the blacks.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1866.

Alexander Dunlop (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. How old are you?

Answer. Forty-eight years.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Williamsburg, Virginia. I was born there.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Never, sir.

Question. Are you able to read and write?

Answer. No, sir; I can read some. That was not allowed me there.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you belong to a church?

Answer. Yes; I belong to the First Baptist church of Williamsburg. I am one of the leading men and trustees.

Question. About how many are included in the church?

Answer. Our minutes show seven hundred and thirty-six.

Question. Do you own the church building?

Answer. We do.

Question. Are you a delegate to the President of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was sent by my people convened at a large mass meeting.

Question. For what purpose?

Answer. My purpose was to let the government know our situation, and what we desire the government to do for us if it can do it. We feel down there without any protection.

Question. Do you feel any danger?

Answer. We do.

Question. Danger of what?

Answer. We feel in danger of our lives, of our property, and of everything else.

Question. Why do you feel so?

Answer. From the spirit which we see existing there every day toward us as freedmen.

Question. On the part of whom?

Answer. On the part of the rebels. I have a great chance to find out these people. I have been with them before the war. They used to look upon me as one of the leading men there. I have suffered in this war; I was driven away from my place by Wise's raid; and so far as I, myself, am concerned, I do not feel safe; and if the military were removed from there I would not stay in Williamsburg one hour, although what little property I possess is there.

Question. In case of the removal of the military, what would you anticipate?

Answer. Nothing shorter than death; that has been promised to me by the rebels.

Question. Do they entertain a similar feeling toward all the freedmen there?

Answer. I believe, sir, that that is a general feeling. I ask them, sometimes, "Why is it? we have done you no harm." "Well," they say, "the Yankees freed you, and now let the Yankees take care of you: we want to have nothing to do with you." I say to them, "You have always been making laws to keep us here, and now you want to drive us away—for what?" They say, "We want to bring foreign immigration here, and drive every scoundrel of you away from here." I tell them that I was born in Virginia, and that I am going to die in Virginia. "There is but one thing that will make me leave Virginia," I say, "and that is, for the government to withdraw the military and leave me in your hands; when it does that, I will go."

Question. Has your property been destroyed by the rebels?

Answer. I had not much, except my blacksmith's shop. I carried on a large business there. The rebels and the northern men destroyed everything I had; what the one did not take, the other did; they did not leave me even a hammer.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. Yes, sir; a wife, but no children; I bought my wife.

Question. How much did you give for her?

Answer. I gave four hundred and fifty dollars for my wife, and seven hundred dollars for my wife's sister. After I bought my wife, they would not let me set her free. I paid the money, and got the bill of sale.

Question. What hindered her being free?

Answer. It was the law, they said. She had to stand as my slave.

Question. How extensive is this feeling of danger on the part of colored people there?

Answer. I believe, sincerely, that it is the general feeling.

Question. Did you ever see a black rebel, or hear of one?

Answer. I must be honest about that. I believe that we have had some as big rebel black men as ever were white.

Question. Many?

Answer. No, sir; they are "few and far between;" but I believe that any man who, through this great trouble that we have had, would do anything to stop the progress of the Union army, was a rebel. When Wise made his raid into Williamsburg, I just had time to leave my house and make my escape. They broke up everything I had; they took their bayonets and tore my beds all to pieces. All they wanted was Aleck Dunlop; they wanted to hang him before his own door. One day, since the fall of Richmond, I met General Henry A. Wise at Norfolk. He spoke to me, and asked me how I was. I said, "I am doing a little better than could be expected." Said he, "Why?" Said I, "Them devils of yours did not catch me; I was too smart for them that morning." "Do you think," said he, "they would have hurt you?" "No," said I, "I don't think so, but I know it; they had orders to hang me."

Question. Did Wise admit it?

Answer. He did not say so; but he turned and went off. The day that Wise's men were there, my wife asked them what had I done that they wanted to hang me in preference to anybody else? They said it was because I was a Union man. I had worked for the rebels from the time the war broke out until General McClellan moved up; and then they concocted a scheme to get me to Richmond; but when I saw the wagon coming for me, I went off in the opposite direction. When General Hooker and General Kearney came there, they sent for me, within three hours of their arrival, and asked me about the country, and what I knew. I gave them all the information I could; that, through a colored friend, got to the secessionists and embittered them against me. The next Union officer who came there was Colonel Campbell, of the 5th Pennsylvania cavalry; and I believe he was as great a rebel as Jeff. Davis. He was governor there for a long time. They captured him, and carried him to Richmond.

Question. The rebels never caught you?

Answer. They have never caught me yet.

Question. How do the black people down there feel about education?

Answer. They want it, and they have a desire to get it; but the rebels use every exertion to keep teachers from them. We have got two white teachers in Williamsburg, and have got to put them in a room over a colored family.

Question. Do the black people contribute liberally to the support of their own schools?

Answer. They are not able, sir. The rebels made many raids there, and destroyed everything they could get their hands on belonging to colored people—beds and clothing.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Thomas Bain (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Norfolk, Virginia.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. I think about forty.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Yes.

Question. When were you made free?

Answer. When emancipation came, I was in Massachusetts; I had got there on the underground railroad. I went back to Virginia after the proclamation, and sent my child away to Massachusetts; I have been down there ever since.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you write a letter on business?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can you read the Bible?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And newspapers?

Answer. Yes, sir; I subscribe to newspapers.

Question. What is your business?

Answer. Dentist.

Question. Did you ever start to be a dentist?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was raised in the business.

Question. Where?

Answer. In Norfolk. I spent ten years at it in Norfolk, and ten years in Massachusetts.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. My wife died some time after I was married; I have one child—a daughter.

Question. Are you here as a delegate from the colored people of Norfolk?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. To make representations to the President?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you had an interview with him?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What is the feeling on the part of white rebels at Norfolk towards the colored people?

Answer. Their feelings are very hard—terrible. I have had a chance to travel around some, preaching.

Question. Do you preach?

Answer. Yes, sir; I am a volunteer missionary—a self-sustaining one. The church, under whose auspices I act, is not taxed for my services; neither are the people; I make my practice as I go along; just enough to support me; I can reach most of them in that way; I have a permanent office; and then I travel about the State and preach.

Question. To what denomination do you belong?

Answer. The Wesleyan Methodist.

Question. You preach to the colored people?

Answer. Yes; I have had occasion, of course, to visit a great many.

Question. How are the black people treated in Virginia by the whites since the close of hostilities?

Answer. The only hope the colored people have is in Uncle Sam's bayonets; without them, they would not feel any security; and what is true of the colored people in that respect, is also true of the Union men; the secessionists do not seem to discriminate between them; they do not seem to care whether a northern man is with us or not with us; if he is a Yankee, that is enough; they hardly wait to examine what his views are; it is not uncommon to hear such threats as this: "We will kill one negro, at least, for every rebel soldier killed by them."

Question. Did you, yourself, ever hear such a threat as that made?

Answer. I have heard it at night, in the streets of Norfolk. (Witness related some incidents going to show how much afraid the colored people there are of ill treatment from the whites.) Last June there was a threat by a white citizen of Norfolk to get up a riot.

Question. Did he get one up?

Answer. Yes; they got one up.

Question. What did it result in?

Answer. It resulted in three colored men being shot. One white man got shot through the shoulder; had his arm amputated, and died. It was got up to attack the colored people, and clear all the negroes out of the city.

Question. Are the colored people whipped now as they used to be?

Answer. Not in my vicinity; I only hear reports of that.

Question. Have you heard of cases of whipping by white men?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. During the summer?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Many cases?

Answer. Yes, sir; and it is not so much that the colored people are afraid of the white people, as it is that they are a law-abiding people.

Question. Do they submit to be whipped?

Answer. They do, in places near where there are military men. They fool the colored people into believing that the military ordered them to be whipped; they do not want to resist the government.

Question. Are the black people down there fond of education?

Answer. I think that they are excelled by no people in an eagerness to learn.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Edmund Parsons (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. How old are you?

Answer. A little over fifty.

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Williamsburg, Virginia.

Question. Can you read and write?

Answer. I can read a little. I have been a regular house-servant, and I had a chance to turn my attention to it.

Question. Have you ever been a slave?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have been a slave from my childhood up to the time I was set free by the emancipation proclamation.

Question. How do the black people in your neighborhood feel toward the rebels?

Answer. I did think myself always secure with the whites ; but it is very different now sir, very different.

Question. Do you stand in fear of them ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What have you to be afraid of ?

Answer. When the Union forces came there first a good many officers became attached to me and my wife, and we felt perfectly secure ; but now the rebels use the officers that are there "to pull the chestnuts out of the fire."

Question. Have you heard threats of violence by white rebels against the blacks ?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What do they threaten to do ?

Answer. They threaten to do everything they can. My wife died about a year ago. I had a house, where I had been living for twenty years. A lawyer there went and got the provost marshal to send a guard and put me out of my house. They broke my things up, and pitched them out, and stole a part of them.

Question. The Union guard ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; it is a positive fact. They put me out of my own house. That was January, 1865.

Question. What was the pretext for putting you out ?

Answer. My wife had been left free. She had a half-sister and a half-brother ; and they pretended to be owners of the property where I had been living all my lifetime.

Question. Who was the provost marshal ?

Answer. Reynolds.

Question. Do the returned rebels threaten to commit violence on the colored people there ?

Answer. I can hear people complaining of that ; but I have really been so mortified at the bad treatment I received, that I have not paid much attention.

Question. How do the colored people feel in regard to education ?

Answer. They are very anxious to get education, and feel grateful for it.

Question. Are you a member of a church ?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have been deacon of the Baptist church for years. It is pretty much my living.

Question. Are you willing to go away and leave old Virginia ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Why not ?

Answer. I would rather stay in Virginia.

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1866.

D. B. White sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Of what State are you a native ?

Answer. Of the State of New York.

Question. Are you in the public employment now ?

Answer. I am not.

Question. Have you been ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. In what capacity ?

Answer. I have been an officer in the army for nearly four years.

Question. What commission did you hold ?

Answer. I held the commissions of captain, major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel.

Question. In what States have you passed the most of your time during that period ?

Answer. In the States of Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina.

Question. State whether you have had command of troops there.

Answer. Yes, sir. I had command of a regiment a portion of the time. The best opportunity I had to observe the state of things in the country was in the winter of 1863, when I spent most of the time south of Norfolk, on the line between Virginia and North Carolina, and went out on scouting parties through Camden and Currituck counties.

Question. Have you been situated since the close of the war so as to acquaint yourself with the condition of things in those counties ?

Answer. Since the close of the war I have been more particularly acquainted in Virginia.

Question. Have you been stationed in Richmond ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; I have been stationed near Richmond, at Manchester, and at Williamsburg, Newport News, and at Hampton, after the war.

Question. While thus stationed did you mingle freely with the people in Virginia ?

Answer. Yes, sir. I had considerable opportunities. As our regiment was isolated at times from other troops, we were brought in contact very much with the citizens.

Question. How long did you thus remain in command in Virginia ?

Answer. From the 3d of April, when Richmond was taken, until the 31st of August, when I was mustered out.

Question. You then left the State, I suppose?

Answer. I am living in the State now, at Hampton. My family moved there, and that is my residence.

Question. When did you go to live at Hampton?

Answer. About the 5th of October, 1865.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the feeling of the rebel people of Virginia towards the federal government and towards the loyal people?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have had quite an opportunity of becoming acquainted, and I have some knowledge of the facts.

Question. What is that feeling, so far as you know?

Answer. So far as I have been able to learn, it is very bitter. The feeling is not only bitter, but frequent manifestations of hostility are made. I would not be understood as saying that I have seen any manifestations of a desire to take up arms.

Question. Has that feeling exhibited itself in scenes of violence?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. State any incident that may have come under your observation.

Answer. The first incident that comes to my mind is this: A man near Richmond, after the close of the war, in my presence and in the presence of one or two officers of my regiment, declared his intention ever to resist the government of the United States whenever an opportunity presented itself.

Question. Had this man been a rebel officer?

Answer. He had been connected with the rebel service in some way. I am not positive that he was an officer. I rather think, upon second thought, he was.

Question. State whether you have heard the like declaration from any other persons of condition and influence in Virginia.

Answer. The person who is now deputy sheriff of Elizabeth City county, residing at Hampton, expressed his wish to organize what he could of the remaining forces of Virginia, or the people of the community, to drive out of that part of the country every Union man, whether of the south or of the north. He made some considerable threats.

Question. Was this in your hearing?

Answer. No, sir; but it came to me by the best of evidence. I was one day crossing Hampton roads in a steamboat, when I overheard a conversation between two persons whom I judged to be southerners from their appearance and style, and their manner of talk, and from the subject on which they talked. They talked very bitterly, and expressed themselves with a great deal of vehemence, not only towards me but towards all the Union people. The conversation commenced upon Yankees, as they termed them, who came from the north; and then they spoke about all the Union people. They said that those who had been unfaithful to the State ought to be treated in a similar manner.

Question. What kind of treatment had they been speaking of?

Answer. They had been speaking of myself personally, about throwing me overboard, and speaking of my Union sentiments.

Question. Had they been threatening to throw you overboard?

Answer. They did not threaten me, but made the remark that I should be thrown overboard; they made the remark that such a man ought to be hung. I am publishing a Union newspaper at Hampton. These two individuals were talking together and I overheard them. I did not pretend to notice it, because it might lead to a difficulty, which I wished to avoid. The colored people are often assailed and treated badly by that class of persons, and, but for the Freedmen's Bureau, I think they would have no protection at all.

Question. Suppose the protection of the Freedmen's Bureau was withdrawn, and the Union troops were withdrawn, what would be the treatment of the whites towards the freed blacks?

Answer. In my candid opinion, the condition of the blacks would be worse than slavery. That may seem an extravagant expression, but I have thought of it a good deal. The oppression they would endure would be worse than the former state of things. In many instances it is now. The protection of the Freedmen's Bureau does not extend as generally throughout the country as it is hoped it will; and in some of these places where the bureau does not extend these people are treated very badly. They are employed, and, when their time expires, they are turned off without clothing or any remuneration, and very often the vagrant laws, as they are termed, have been attempted to be enforced, and have been to some extent, although I think the Freedmen's Bureau are looking up these matters so as to extend protection to the freedmen.

Question. Are the whites who employ freedmen in the habit of whipping them?

Answer. There have been frequent instances of that. A few days before I left Hampton I heard of an instance of the kind where two persons were whipped, one of them with an unaccountable number of stripes—over a hundred.

Question. What effect has President Johnson's liberality in granting pardons and amnesties had upon the temper of the rebels where you have been?

Answer. It has never in my estimation mollified them in the least. They have been just as much embittered towards the colored people and toward the Union people, both northern and native southern, as they were before. In fact, as far as my observation extends, before Congress met, and when they were quite sanguine in the expectation that the States were going to be admitted to Congress, and when everything was moving favorably, they were exceedingly triumphant and overbearing, and often used haughty expressions to the effect that they were going to have the matters in their own hands and have things their own way; and they indulged in threats to Union men of the chances and opportunities they would have under the new state of things.

Question. Have you ever heard among any influential and intelligent rebels any conversation respecting a war between the United States and a foreign country, and what the rebels would do in such an event?

Answer. I do not know that I have heard any such conversation recently.

Question. How does Governor Peirpoint's government in Virginia, so to speak, affect the minds of the Virginians generally; do they like or dislike it?

Answer. I guess that his administration is becoming extremely unpopular on all sides. I speak of the Union people. They are decidedly unfavorable to Governor Peirpoint.

Question. What, in their minds, is the great defect in his administration?

Answer. They think he has been forgetful of the Union people and of the principles of the Union, and that he has succumbed or yielded to the dictation and wishes of the old confederates. In all his appointments he has shown his partiality to rebels.

Question. Has that been the cause of much discontent among the loyal people of Virginia?

Answer. It has been the cause of much dissatisfaction. There was a time when the Union people of the State of Virginia were very much disheartened and discouraged, but recently they have been looking up with more hope and a brighter expectation.

Question. Have you heard anything said by the rebels about the payment of the war debt?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have in some instances.

Question. What do they say?

Answer. They speak in favor of a repudiation of the national debt. I heard one man say at Hampton (although he has since denied the interpretation given to the remark) that his expectation was, that if they were going now to establish the Union they should repudiate both debts or pay both debts.

Question. Is he a man of influence?

Answer. He is a man of a great deal of influence. He is a physician, and is quite popular, although he ran for office and was defeated. I think he was not in the war, although I cannot say positively. He is quite an influential man.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that feeling is very general in Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think it is.

Question. Would a majority of the people of Virginia vote to-day, if they had the opportunity, to repudiate both debts, or one debt?

Answer. I think they would repudiate the national debt by a vote, and a very strong vote, too.

Question. And would there be a like vote given for the payment of the rebel war debt?

Answer. I do not think they would go so strongly for that. It is not natural to suppose they would. But if they repudiate the one they would repudiate both. If the northern debt was paid they would insist upon assuming the rebel debt.

Question. How is it with the blacks in Virginia; are they generally friendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. Very. I never saw any people more faithful than they have been. They are quiet and peaceable. Just before the holidays there were a great many reports that they were getting up an insurrection, and they felt very much aggrieved about it. It worried them that there should be such reports. They had mass meetings in which they passed resolutions and expressed themselves very strongly upon it, denouncing any colored people who should ever think or speak of an insurrection. They were very strong in denunciations of anything of the kind.

Question. State whether there is generally a fear or apprehension of danger on the part of the freedmen from their old rebel masters or from the whites generally.

Answer. There is, in some instances, in Surrey county. There are some colored people living at Hampton and Newport News who dare not go to Surrey county, although their families are there, and there are colored people in Surrey county who dare not go away from there. Some have got away, and that is how we are made aware of the facts. They try to enforce the vagrant laws without having it come to the knowledge of the Freedmen's Bureau. Captain Flagg is an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, stationed at Norfolk. Several instances have occurred where officers of the State attempted to enforce the vagrant laws, and sold colored people for the coming year—sold them to service. I made a statement to that effect. Captain Flagg denied the statement, as he thought it could not be the case. But he afterwards ascertained that the facts did exist, and he wrote to me stating the circumstances.

Question. What is the general feeling among the white Virginians in respect to southern independence?

Answer. I am confident they would all prefer a state of independence. I have never heard any expressions otherwise. They speak of the Union now and say, "We will make the best of it. We have taken the oath now, and must make the best of it." They claim to be loyal, but they express their regret that they are not independent and could not succeed. They speak of "folding away the flag of their country in tears;" complaining about the loyal people plundering and spoiling and robbing their country.

Question. How do they treat, socially, persons coming from the north to settle or to transact business with them?

Answer. So far as I have an opportunity to know, they are very indifferent and treat them coldly. In Hampton the northern men who are doing any business, so far as I know, are doing it with the colored people and Union whites. I speak of the loyal whites as a class, but they are a very limited class. Since the war it is much easier to know who is a loyal man than it was during the war, because the rebels assisted in drawing the line of demarcation, and in some instances they knew where our forces did not know.

Question. Would the masses of white Virginians be better pleased to be separated politically from the north?

Answer. I think they would. I think they would vote by a very large majority—almost unanimously—to accomplish it, if they could.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that they still entertain schemes of separation and independence?

Answer. I do not think they have any immediate plan of organizing. Yet I have frequently thought, and so expressed myself to friends, that they entertain the hope now just as they did formerly. In and about Norfolk the secessionists almost all have arms. Throughout the country they have arms. When they go to market they put arms in their wagons.

Question. What kind of arms?

Answer. Muskets and pistols. There are a great many muskets scattered throughout the country.

Question. What chance has a northern man or a Unionist for justice in the State courts of Virginia?

Answer. He has not any chance at all. I would not go before one of those courts, if I could avoid it, under any circumstances, because there is no justice there at all.

Question. When you say there is no chance, do you mean to say that the bias and ill feeling on the part of court and jury are so great against the Unionists north and south that they would not be able to obtain their rights?

Answer. Yes, sir. The bias is so great that they could not even entertain a hope of getting justice according to their interpretation of their own State laws.

Question. Are northern immigrants welcome among them, or are they regarded as unwelcome visitors?

Answer. They are very unwelcome; expressions of that kind are very frequent.

Question. In case a northern man should purchase real estate among them, would he be safe in the enjoyment of his property?

Answer. I think he would not. A man bought a farm near Hampton under a confiscation sale; he was down at Hampton a month or so ago; two of his neighbors came in who had had a claim upon the farm formerly; very evidently, from the manner of their talk and the way they told their story, they came there for the purpose of making trouble with this man. Both of them were armed, and if the man had not had assistance, I do not know but that they would have killed him. I wrote an application for that Union man to General Miles to attend to the matter and give him protection.

Question. What are you by profession?

Answer. A minister; when the war commenced I was preaching in the Methodist Episcopal church.

Question. State whether the old connexions between the Methodists of the south and of the north have been dissolved?

Answer. They were dissolved before the war, and have not been reunited.

Question. Has any effort been made to reunite them?

Answer. There has been some talk of it; I do not know that there has been any special effort made; that is, some people have spoken of it, but I have never seen any indication particularly looking toward a reunion of the church; there is no immediate hope of it. At Williamsburg, on the Peninsula, between Richmond and Fort Monroe, I had an opportunity to become somewhat acquainted with the Methodist society, and attended service several times. The feeling of the church seemed to be about the same in regard to the abolition preachers, as they call the preachers in the northern church; they had a bitter feeling towards what they called the abolitionists.

Question. Do you regard it as likely that the Methodist church north and south will be soon reunited?

Answer. I do not; I think it is impossible to accomplish that.

Question. Is there any manifestation of willingness on the part of southern Methodists?

Answer. No, sir; there is not. I think there is generally an unwillingness.

Question. Do you think of any other circumstance that you wish to relate?

Answer. I do not think of anything more now.

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1866.

Charles Douglas Gray sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. In Augusta county, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And have always resided in the State ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You have been a loyalist during the war ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; uniformly so. I, however, voted for the ratification of the ordinance of secession. That is the only act I am ashamed of in the whole transaction ; I was forced to do it, by the pressure of the moment.

Question. Have you been so situated as to be tolerably well acquainted with the state of public feeling among the white people of Virginia since the close of hostilities ?

Answer. I have not ; I have stayed very closely at home on my farm, and have mingled very little with the people.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the state of public feeling in Augusta county ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; I think I am.

Question. Have you been holding any public position there since the war ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Nor during the war ?

Answer. No, sir ; none at all.

Question. State what is the general feeling among the ex-rebels, the once disloyal people of that county, towards the government of the United States.

Answer. I would say that the majority of the people of Augusta county accept the result of the war in a spirit of resignation and submission ; they are resigned to the result. There is a large portion of the population of Augusta who were thoroughly loyal men all the time ; we always believed that more than one-half of them were loyal, but in the elections we have had we have been largely out-voted. We have a Dunker population—a religious denomination, non-combatants—which we were not able to get to the polls, and the consequence was that there was a smaller Union vote than there were Union voters in the county.

Question. Why did the Dunkers refuse to go to the polls ?

Answer. Immediately after the surrender they did go to the polls to make an effort to elect little local Union officers, and were defeated, and we could not get them to the polls again, when we had the congressional election. Mr. Lewis was candidate of the Union party in our district, and Mr. Alexander H. H. Stuart the candidate of the other party. I do not mean to be understood as saying that Mr. Stuart is not a loyal man ; I think that a majority of the people of Augusta county are now loyal to the government of the United States.

Question. Have the goodness to explain a little more fully what is understood by the phrase "accepting the situation."

Answer. It is a phrase that is used by the secessionists. The Union men never use it. As I understand it, they mean by that phrase this : that they appealed to arms, to the arbitrament of the sword, as they say ; that the decision was against them, and that now they submit to the authority of the United States, forced by the military power of the government. That is what I understand by the term.

Question. Is not that the way they understand it ?

Answer. I cannot say ; that is the way I understand it ; they acknowledge that they are whipped, and soundly whipped.

Question. Do they not feel better for it ?

Answer. Not so much as they ought to do, but I think they will ultimately. That is as near as I can describe it.

Question. Since the close of hostilities, do they appear to entertain feelings of respect and attachment to the government of the United States ?

Answer. I would rather you would ask them in regard to that.

Question. I ask how they appear.

Answer. Well, they are submissive, and that is about as far as I know. They grumble a good deal ; they complain of the taxes ; and they are very much in favor of the President's policy ; they extol that ; they think that the test-oath is an unconstitutional outrage. I think that the people are a great deal sounder than the politicians—a great deal. I believe in the loyalty of a large majority of the people of Augusta county. There are a great many individuals in the county who, no doubt, deeply regret the result ; but, seeing now that it was inevitable, they are going now to obey the laws, and I have no doubt that in a year or two they will be a great deal happier than they ever were, and will love the Union and the government of the country. You may remember that Augusta county was one of the strongest Union counties in the State ; that it was an old Henry Clay whig county, and that it stuck to the Union—not so long as, I think, it ought to have done—but it stuck to it until their State pride induced them to go over ; they thought it was their duty to stand by their State. It is a Scotch-Irish population, and you know the temper of that population: when their blood is heated, there is not a more tenacious population in the world. They were the last to go into the war and they were the last to give it up. They did not lose a great many slaves. In old Virginia, where they lost most heavily in the slave population, they were more overwhelmed by the result than were the people in the valley. In old Virginia they thought the loss of slavery was the loss of everything worth living for; but we had few slaves. Then Shoridan's burnings exasperated them very much, although there was always more Unionism in Augusta and in the valley than in eastern Virginia.

Question. Do you think that those persons in the county who took up arms against the United States are beginning to regret that they struck at Uncle Sam?

Answer. I cannot say that. In a general way they say that it would have been better not to have begun it, as it ended as it has; but if it had ended differently I do not think they would have regretted it.

Question. What is your profession?

Answer. I am a farmer now. I have been a lawyer.

Question. What chance does a Unionist, either a Virginian or a northern man, stand in the State courts there for justice?

Answer. I believe that I could get justice in any of the courts in Augusta county. I would not be at all afraid to go before a jury even of secessionists. There would be prejudices if it were a question connecting itself in any way with politics; but I would not, in an ordinary case, fear injustice. I would not feel at all insecure.

Question. How would it be with a man from one of the northern States?

Answer. I believe that he would get justice.

Question. Would he stand as good a chance as you would?

Answer. I believe so. There is a prejudice existing among the secessionists against Yankees, as they are called—a strong prejudice; but, nevertheless, I believe they could get justice.

Question. Is there much immigration from the north into that part of the valley?

Answer. There is a disposition, I think, in our section to encourage the introduction of northern capital.

Question. Suppose a northern man, of very decided anti-slavery feelings, who had been an advocate for the prosecution of the war to put down the rebellion, should go there to settle, and buy land and become a permanent resident, how would he be treated?

Answer. I think that at the start he would be treated with reserve. It would take some time for him to get on social terms with his neighbors; but they would not molest him.

Question. You have no apprehensions of that kind?

Answer. None at all.

Question. How do the secessionists there feel generally toward the emancipated blacks?

Answer. Well, the prejudice is pretty strong against the blacks. However, they want black labor, and they hire them readily, pay them their wages, and treat them well.

Question. Do you know of any combinations existing in the county to keep down the wages of the freedmen?

Answer. None at all. I think that they can get good wages and can get employment as much as they like.

Question. You are acquainted with the state of public feeling in Virginia in other localities, to some extent?

Answer. Yes, to some extent; but I cannot speak with any confidence or with any personal knowledge.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that the secessionists still harbor, directly or indirectly, the project of secession or southern independence?

Answer. I do not believe there is such a project harbored in any section of the State.

Question. Suppose the United States were engaged in a war with a foreign power, such as England or France, in a close hand-to-hand contest, as it probably would be, how would you regard the secession people of Virginia in relation to the United States?

Answer. Well, sir, I will give you my view upon that subject. The secessionists were very angry with England for not recognizing them. I think they were more dissatisfied with England's course than the United States were. There would be a great many secessionists who would like to avenge themselves upon England. I believe that if there were a war of the character you describe, a great many would stand by the government, not from any very great love for the United States, but because they hate England for the course she pursued—for her duplicity—for her not recognizing and helping them. There are others who, very probably, if they had an opportunity, would join the British arms. I think there are very few men of that character in the State—very few who would join the enemy, at least until they saw very plainly that England was going to whip; I doubt whether any of them would.

Question. You think that a few would join the enemy, especially if they imagined that the enemy was going to be successful?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How large a proportion is there of that class of persons?

Answer. I think that they constitute a very small portion. I do not believe they constitute one-twentieth or one-fiftieth of the population. Indeed I do not know that any of them would; it is merely a surmise. I am giving my best impressions of the feeling in the State. I have heard a great many of them say that they would like to have an opportunity of fighting England.

Question. But suppose this exigency should present itself; suppose the old secession party in Virginia and in other rebel States should imagine that this war presented an occasion which might enable them to secure their own national independence, what course would they pursue then?

Answer. In answer to that question, I would say that, in my opinion, if the real feelings and sentiments and inclinations of the majority of the people of Virginia to-day could be ascertained in a quiet way, not by a public election, but in a quiet way, by going to their firesides, a majority would be found in favor of remaining in the Union in preference to having their independence.

Question. And do you think that feeling is gradually being strengthened?

Answer. I think so. I think that that feeling is gradually increasing in the State.

Question. How do they regard their leaders in the rebellion, such as General Lee and other distinguished men?

Answer. There is a great disposition to reward them; a decided disposition to reward the men who have fought for their country.

Question. What does this feeling rest upon more particularly—the admiration of the voters for the gallantry and bravery of the leader for whom they are asked to vote, or their love for the old lost cause?

Answer. I think it is the feeling of respect and admiration for the man who fought for the State, although he was wrong in doing so.

Question. For his display of gallantry and skill?

Answer. Yes, sir; for his display of gallantry in defence of the soil of the State.

Question. Depending more on that feeling than on dislike to the United States?

Answer. I think so.

Question. How is Jefferson Davis regarded down there by the secessionists?

Answer. He is very bitterly denounced and accused by the secessionists, more so, I think, than he ought to be.

Question. Was he ever very popular in Virginia?

Answer. No, sir. After the State seceded Mr. Davis started with great popularity; but now they must have a scapegoat, and the disposition is to make Mr. Davis that scapegoat. They attribute to him the failure of the cause—to his blindness; his stubbornness; his interference with officers; his self-will, and all that. I always say that I do not think it was Mr. Davis who ruined the confederate cause at all; that it would have been ruined anyhow. I think that few men could have kept it on its feet as long as he did. I think that if we had kept McClellan they would have kept up the war a year or two longer. There is another feeling—a feeling of great bitterness toward the republican party; to the black republicans. The secessionists in Virginia are very bitter toward the men and measures which saved the Union; to what we understand as the Union party of the country. But that is politics; they want to see the republican party thrown out of power.

Question. What, so far as you know, appears to be their ulterior political designs?

Answer. I think they only want the offices.

Question. What is their idea of proceeding? what alliance do they propose to form?

Answer. They want to organize a great conservative party. That party will, of course, embrace all the copperheads and a sufficient number of others to get into power.

Question. You have very little doubt about their entertaining that purpose?

Answer. I have very little doubt about their wanting to get into power—not the least doubt about that.

Question. What, in your judgment, has been the general effect of the liberality of President Johnson towards the rebel community?

Answer. It has made him very popular.

Question. Has it increased or diminished the attachment of the people to the government of the United States.

Answer. I do not think it has diminished the attachment of the people to the United States government?

Question. How do rebels, who have been pardoned there, generally speak of the government of the United States—in terms of respect, or of contumely and defiance?

Answer. They speak generally in terms of great respect for the President and his policy, and of great denunciation of those who oppose him.

Question. Among the people at large in your vicinity, what is the feeling toward the freed-man? Is there a disposition to keep him under; to withhold from him the ordinary rights and privileges of a free man; to constrain him to labor for under-wages, or for no wages; to treat him with contempt and injury, or with justice?

Answer. I will endeavor to give you some idea of that. You must remember that the relation has been suddenly and violently changed between the white man and the black man. From a slave he has suddenly become a free man. Before the abolition of slavery, and before the war, it was the policy of the slaveholders to make a free negro as despicable a creature and as uncomfortable as possible. They did not want a free negro about at all. They considered it an injury to the slave, as it undoubtedly was, creating discontent among the slaves. The consequence was that there was always an intense prejudice against the free negro. Now, very suddenly, all have become free negroes; and that was not calculated to allay that prejudice. But that feeling is in my section of the country gradually subsiding. There is a great deal less feeling of that kind now than there was six or eight months ago. They all predict, of course, that the negro will not work; that some means will have to be found by which he can be forced to work, or that he will not work. However, they hire them, and I hear very little complaint. There is great dissatisfaction, of course, with the abolition of slavery. We have not become reconciled to that.

Mr. HOWARD. The coat does not fit?

WITNESS. The coat does not fit at all; but I have no doubt that in course of time they will be reconciled to it, and a better feeling will exist toward the negro.

Question. State whether you have noticed anything like a general repugnance on the part of whites to the black man becoming the owner of lands, houses, and other property.

Answer. There was at the start. A great many houses were burned down in my neighborhood, which it was feared would be rented to negroes. They do not like negro families to settle in the neighborhood if they can prevent it; but that feeling, too, is not so strong as it was six months ago. They are beginning to see that it was a mistaken policy. They are beginning to see that they require and need the negro labor. I do not know (to be perfectly frank and candid) but that the predominant feeling in the State is a disposition to get rid of them at present. I think, however, that that feeling will change sooner or later.

Question. Must it not necessarily change?

Answer. I think it must necessarily change.

Question. Must it not necessarily, in the end, change to a feeling which would retain the black laboring man in the midst of the white people as a laborer?

Answer. I would think so. They are making a great effort to introduce foreigners. My own opinion is that our negroes will be a great deal better laborers, and that the people will see it. That was my view from the start.

Question. At the present time, of course, there is no great friendship for negro schools?

Answer. No; there is a disposition to laugh it down, to ridicule it, and make fun of it.

Question. Have you yourself noticed the capability of the black to acquire learning in the ordinary elements of education?

Answer. I have not; but I have no doubt at all of it.

Question. What do you hear said of it generally by those who have given attention to that subject?

Answer. There has been very little attention given to that subject. There are a great many negroes in our country who learned to read when it was against the law to teach them. The children of the families would teach them their A, B, C's, and they would go on from that to learn to read. The children would sit upon their laps and teach them to read. At present the negro himself is in a restless, unsettled condition, which is a very natural thing; and there is a disposition on their part to congregate in the towns, which is a misfortune for them.

Question. Do they congregate there for mutual protection?

Answer. I do not know, sir. There is a great deal of disposition on their part to go to house-keeping. Their idea of liberty and independence is to keep house; and no matter what sort of a shanty or shelter they can get up, they prefer that. But they will soon see that that is not a wise course at all, and that they will starve if they congregate in towns where there is no employment.

Question. What is the general susceptibility of the negro for religion? Is he more or less religious in his nature than the white man?

Answer. He is very susceptible to religious impressions, and prefers the more emotional forms of religion—the Methodist and the Baptist.

Question. Is he not inclined to be superstitious?

Answer. Yes, sir, very.

Question. More than the white man?

Answer. Well, I do not know that he would be. The ignorant white people are as superstitious as the negroes.

Question. Do you think of any particular facts that you would wish to incorporate in your statement, illustrating your ideas?

Answer. No, sir; I think that if the right course is pursued down south, we can have the best peasantry in the world by securing the negro in all his civil rights. I do not mean by that the right of suffrage at present; I do not think they are in a condition at present to exercise that right; I think that in the course of a generation, when they have been educated, it will be time enough to agitate that question. But let the negro understand that he is a bona fide free man, and that his wages will be paid, and let him understand the worth of money, (he does not understand the worth of money now, and has no idea of the expenses of housekeeping,) and I think he will be industrious and frugal. I have known a great many very successful negroes.

Question. Do you think that there is, as a general thing, a feeling of unkindness on the part of the negroes toward the white people?

Answer. I do not think there is at all; in my section there is none at all Question. Do you think there is any danger of negro insurrection in your neighborhood?

Answer. We have no apprehension whatever. There are too few there, in the first place.

Question. So far as your knowledge extends in Virginia, have you any reason to apprehend any danger from the negroes?

Answer. I have none. I have heard some gentlemen express some apprehension, but they did not seem to be very serious at all.

Question. Have the negroes arms?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question. Have these secessionists, who have been in the rebellion, generally arms at their dwellings?

Answer. I do not know; the officers retained their side-arms, and you may often see a gentleman riding with pistols; there are some few fowling-pieces and arms of that kind in the neighborhood. If there are arms I have no knowledge of them.

Question. You have no reason, so far as your observation extends, to apprehend a revival of the rebellion?

Answer. None, whatever. People are thinking about their private business; they want to go to work to repair their losses; they do not wish any more war, domestic or foreign war, if it can be avoided. They are tired of war. They knew nothing of what war was before the rebellion; they had no idea at all of the kind of war they were engaging in; they are heartily sick of war. They are an afflicted people, terribly afflicted; almost all of them have lost sons or brothers; the country is full of widows and orphans and destitute people. I think that, on the whole, the people are bearing their misfortunes with cheerfulness and fortitude, and are anxious now just to get the means of restoring their losses, and if politicians would let them alone, I think there would be no trouble whatever.

Question. You have journeyed up and down the valley continually during and since the war?

Answer. No, sir; during the war I staid very close at home; I was in a very critical position all the time, and I never left home when I could help it.

Question. You did not think it necessary to leave home?

Answer. No, sir, not at all. The President's proclamation ordered me to go home and stay there, and I obeyed that proclamation.

Question. Within the circle of your personal observation, what is the appearance of the country where those armies have marched?

Answer. From Harper's Ferry to New Market, which is about eighty miles, from one mountain to the other, the country was almost a desert. There were no fences. Speaking of the condition of the valley after General Sheridan retired, I described wheat-fields growing without any enclosure; some one asked me whether the stock would not destroy the wheat. I said "Certainly, if General Sheridan had not taken the precaution of removing all the stock." We could cultivate grain without fences, as we had no cattle, hogs, sheep or horses, or anything else. The fences were all gone; some of the orchards were very much injured, but the fruit trees had not been, as a general thing, destroyed. The barns were all burned; a great many of the private dwellings were burned; chimneys standing without houses, and houses standing without roof, or door, or window; a most desolate state of affairs; bridges all destroyed, roads badly cut up. Large armies, whether friendly or hostile, are devouring animals. There is no question about that. The damage was not all done by the federals.

Question. The general appearance of the valley was desolate?

Answer. Very much so.

Question. Probably no section of the country has suffered so severely as the valley of the Shenandoah?

Answer. Except, perhaps, from Alexandria to the Rapidan; that has suffered perhaps as much as the valley.

Question. Almost every proprietor suffered in some degree?

Answer. Oh, certainly, every farmer; I suffered less myself, I believe, than any farmer. There was not a federal soldier on my farm during the war. That was owing to the happy location of my property. It was not in a good military position. The battle of Piedmont was fought two and a half miles from my door; but I had a blessed little river running in front of my house, which happened not to be fordable at the time, and so I escaped.

Question. Were you ever arrested by either party?

Answer. No, sir; I never was arrested. I was sometimes in very great apprehension of being arrested.

Question. Was your house molested?

Answer. Never, sir. I lived most of the time in the town of Harrisonburg. While I was there, my house and yard were filled alternately with federal soldiers and confederate soldiers, all hungry, and I fed them all as long as I had a mouthful of bread in my house. I never had the slightest reason to complain of the soldiers of either army.

Question. And you have seen the play?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have seen the whole of it.

WASHINGTON, February 7, 1866.

John F. Lewis sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Rockingham county, Virginia.

Question. What is your profession or occupation?

Answer. Farmer.

Question. How long have you resided in Rockingham county?

Answer. I was born there and have lived there ever since. I have never resided anywhere else.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the state of public feeling in your vicinity?

Answer. I think I am pretty well.

Question. Do you hold any official position?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What is the general feeling on the part of secessionists there towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not believe that a majority of the people there are loyal according to my understanding of the term. They profess to be loyal. My understanding of the term "loyal" is respect, love, devotion. These feelings do not exist to any great extent in any portion of the State where I have been. But I believe if not interfered with by the political aspirants and newspaper editors, they could soon be induced to cultivate love and devotion to the government of the United States.

Question. Has a large proportion of them engaged in the war against the government?

Answer. Yes; a large proportion of them either voluntarily or involuntarily engaged in the rebellion. I suppose that in the latter part of the war a majority of them were conscripts.

Question. Are you prepared to say that a majority of the people of that county are, in feeling, friendly to the United States?

Answer. I have had no means of ascertaining that except in the elections that have taken place; and they have indicated no friendly feeling to the government.

Question. How do you explain that indication—what is it?

Answer. I do not believe that a man who had been an uncompromising Union man through out the rebellion can be elected to any position either of trust or profit.

Question. What description of persons have generally been elected in that county?

Answer. Men who have been in the rebel army. There were some restrictions placed upon them by the law, but they have been removed by the present legislature.

Question. What were those restrictions?

Answer. The Alexandria constitution, as it was called, restricted the elective franchise to persons who had been loyal during the war. That restriction has been removed by the legislature now in session at Richmond. The clause in the constitution imposing restrictions upon voters on account of disloyalty was so framed as that the legislature might, if it saw fit, repeal it. That repeal was submitted to the voters of the State at the last election, including loyal as well as disloyal; and they almost unanimously decided in its favor, so that the restriction was taken off.

Question. Would an out-and-out Union man stand any chance of being elected in that county now?

Answer. I think not.

Question. Do the secessionists there entertain any desire or any purpose to renew the war for southern independence?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think they do. I believe the impression is universal, almost, that they are powerless to renew the war.

Question. Suppose they had the power and the means to renew the war, what course do you think they would take?

Answer. I think a great majority of them would be neutral; would not take either side. Some of them would take sides against the United States, and some of them for, but a majority would, I think, be neutral.

Question. You have heard the question I have put to Mr. Gray respecting the course that would be pursued by the secessionists there in the event of a war between the United States and a foreign power?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You heard his answer?

Answer. I did not concur fully with Mr. Gray in that.

Question. Give your own views.

Answer. I think a great many of them would take part against the United States. I often hear the secessionists there—(they are all termed secessionists now with very few exceptions)—I often hear that class of persons who were in the army say that they would rejoice to see the United States well thrashed by England and France; and I think that in the event of a war there would be some apprehension of trouble. I have some apprehension there would be trouble in the State. I know one thing—that if there was a war between the United States and any foreign power of any considerable magnitude, I should endeavor to get north of the Potomac. I should not feel safe in remaining where I am.

Question. How extensive is that feeling among the Union people in your vicinity?

Answer. I think if they were satisfied that there was to be a war between the United States and any foreign power of any considerable magnitude, the feeling to get away would be pretty general among the Union people. I do not think they would feel secure.

Question. Have you any reason to apprehend that the secessionists in your part of the State, and where you are acquainted, still entertain projects of secession or southern independence?

Answer. No, sir; I think not. I think they have abandoned all such ideas. If they have any such they are kept a profound secret. I was a member of the convention which passed the ordinance of secession. I refused to vote for the ordinance of secession throughout, and I refused to sign the ordinance after it was passed. I was the only member of the convention east of the Alleghany mountains who refused to sign the ordinance of secession, for which I was threatened repeatedly. They threatened to hang me several times, and I had some little apprehension at one time that they would do it. But I remained there throughout, and, beyond some denunciation and abuse, I was not molested.

Question. You felt constrained to keep a pretty close mouth during the war?

Answer. I was not as prudent probably as I ought to have been. I was so ardent and devoted a Union man that I could not keep prudent all the time.

Question. We have had accounts of the secret session of the secession convention in Virginia—were you in the convention at that time?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are you at liberty to state anything about it?

Answer. Oh yes, sir; the restriction has been removed.

Question. Did all the members of the convention attend that secret session?

Answer. Yes, sir; the body met in secret session for some days previous to the passage of the ordinance of secession.

Question. What was the object of the secrecy, to discuss the question more freely?

Answer. I always believed that the object was to impose upon the Union sentiment of the country, and prevent the people from knowing anything that was doing there.

Question. You were not in the secret of the secrecy?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Was Governor Wise a member of that convention?

Answer. Yes, sir; he was the leader of the secession party?

Question. Did he attend the secret sittings?

Answer. Yes, sir; all the members attended. I do not think that any member of the convention refused to attend the secret session. Most of the business was transacted in the latter part in secret session.

Question. State how prominent Wise was in his advocacy of secession.

Answer. Well, sir, he was generally conceded to be the leader of the secession party there, although he professed to be a Union man. He said to me on one occasion, "Lewis, you help to save the negro, and I will help you to save the Union." He was endeavoring to persuade me at his desk to adopt his views; I remarked to him that I was not an abolitionist, and I went on to argue the question with him. He caught at that idea, and said "You help me to save the negro, and I will help you to save the Union." My impression was that his plan would destroy both; he went on to prove to me that I was mistaken.

Question. I suppose he was perfectly confident of success in the enterprise?

Answer. I think so.

Question. His idea was, that by seceding and getting up a southern confederacy, slavery would be perpetuated and placed beyond the reach of black republicans and abolitionists?

Answer. Yes, sir, I think that was the idea, although Mr. Wise has written a letter since the surrender of the rebel army, saying that he was convinced long before the close of the war that slavery was an evil, and that if the south had been successful he had intended to canvass the State for the abolition of slavery. I do not think that that is generally believed by the people of Virginia.

Question. Was Mr. James M. Mason a member of that convention?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Was Alexander H. H. Stuart?

Answer. Yes, sir, he was.

Question. How did he vote on the question of secession?

Answer. He voted against the ordinance of secession. The final vote stood 88 to 55. The ordinance was passed by 33 majority, but finally Mr. Stuart signed the ordinance.

Question. I suppose that that was a mere authentication of the paper?

Answer. Yes, sir. He said he regarded it in that light. Mr. Stuart was a Union man.

Question. Was George W. Summers, from the Kanawha district, a member of that convention?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How did he vote?

Answer. He voted against the ordinance. He did not return to the convention, and I am not able to say whether he signed the ordinance or not. He took no part in the war, I believe. I heard him roundly abused for not taking the southern side. While the convention was still in session, I went to the house of Mr. John Minor Botts, in Richmond, on the 10th of April, 1861, and he informed me that he had been to Washington a few days before, and had had an interview with Mr. Lincoln, in which interview Mr. Lincoln informed him that he had sent a special messenger to Richmond for George W. Summers to come to Washington; and in the event of his not being able to come, to send some reliable Union man to consult with him on important matters. Mr. Summers, from some cause or other, did not go, but sent Colonel John B. Baldwin, of Augusta county, Virginia. Mr. Lincoln informed Mr. Botts that he had made this proposition to Colonel Baldwin; that if that convention would adjourn without passing an ordinance of secession, he (Mr. Lincoln) would take the responsibility of withdrawing the troops from Fort Sumter. Colonel Baldwin declined to accede to it, and no such proposition was ever made or communicated to the convention. Next morning I took Colonel Baldwin to the house of Mr. Botts, who told him he was informed that such an interview had taken place. Colonel Baldwin did not deny it. In answer to Mr. Botts's question of how, in the name of God, he could take the responsibility of withholding the knowledge of such an interview from the convention, Colonel Baldwin remarked that it was then near the hour for the meeting of the convention, and that he was compelled to be there, but would see him again. No such communication was ever made, to the best of my knowledge and belief, to any large portion even of the members of the convention, and a large number of them are to this day ignorant of the fact.

At the same time a party of secessionists met together at Richmond—a self-constituted convention—for the purpose of forcing this convention to pass an ordinance of secession, or of turning them out of doors, and deposing Governor Letcher. And I believe that if it had not been for the fear of that body, the ordinance of secession could not have been passed. A large portion of the people of Virginia at that time were utterly opposed to the passage of an ordinance of secession.

Question. How does the secession party in your county feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. I think there is generally a kind feeling. The former owner of the slave is, I think, his best friend. There is very little prejudice against the negro, except among the class whose labor comes in competition with him—that is, in our county.

Question. You suppose that the higher classes in Virginia feel more kindly toward the negro than the lower classes?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think so, as a general thing. In Eastern Virginia there is a different feeling. There they were pro-slavery people. In our country there were comparatively few slaves. In Eastern Virginia there is, I think, a great deal of prejudice against the negro, and a worse feeling exists there than in our section.

Question. Do you think that President Johnson's policy in granting pardons and amnesties to the rebels has increased or diminished the respect of the rebel community for the government of the United States?

Answer. I have been convinced for some time that the policy of Mr. Johnson was a bad one. I was one of those who took an active part, immediately after the surrender of General Lee, in getting pardons for these people. I believe, as a general thing, they have failed to comprehend or appreciate the magnanimity of the government shown towards them; and I think there is a worse feeling there now than there was at the time of the surrender of General Lee's army. A great number of persons who have received their pardons are now acting in a way that they would not have done if the pardons had been withheld a few months longer.

Question. Do I understand you to be of opinion that that liberality has rather tended to increase the insolence of the secessionists than to abate it?

Answer. Yes, sir; and I have heard that question discussed a great deal. I have been travelling about somewhat; I have been to Richmond very frequently, meeting the members of the legislature there from different parts of the State, and conversing with persons from different portions of the State; and that, I think, is the general impression among the Union men—among the men who are really Union men. There are a great many men, I was going to say, who now profess to have been Union men all the time, but who were not known as such during the war. Of them I did not speak; I spoke of those who were known to be uncompromising Union men throughout. There were very few such persons in the State. The Dunkard population, of whom Mr. Gray spoke, were generally loyal, and are still loyal; but they are a timid set of men, who take very little part in politics, and their influence is pretty much lost to the State. Leave that element out of the question, and the Union men are in a very meagre minority.

Question. Are Union people in your vicinity secure in their possessions and rights of property and person?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think they are. I do not apprehend any danger. I feel no apprehension at all myself; and I suppose I am as obnoxious there as anybody can be, having been one of the very few men in the valley of Virginia who always, and under all circumstances, expressed themselves in favor of the Union.

Question. Does this security, of which you speak, depend in any degree, in your judgment, upon the presence of federal troops in the State?

Answer. I am not prepared to say that it does, nor am I prepared to say that it does not. I think that the sending of troops to our country immediately after the surrender of General Lee's army was a great protection and security to the Union people there and to the whole people. There were a parcel of marauders in the country who were giving a great deal of trouble, and the sending of Union troops there is regarded, I think, by secessionists and Union people as being very opportune. I have no doubt that we would have had very considerable trouble there if this had not been done.

Question. Trouble consisting of turbulence and riot?

Answer. Yes, sir; they were fighting and squabbling over government property, and driving stock from one farm to another; and there was horse-thieving going on. They had reduced horse-thieving to a science in our country during the war. It was almost impossible to recover a stolen horse. I frequently had to keep a guard in my stable.

Question. Do the people of that section generally feel willing to accord to the freedmen the rights of property and of family?

Answer. Yes, sir; as a general thing, they do.

Question. To what extent would family rights, especially the marital rights of husband and wife, be respected by the freedmen among themselves if they were allowed, as they now are, to enter into those relations and enjoy those rights?

Answer. I cannot answer that question, because the system and practice of slavery in Virginia were in violation of all those rights, and the negro generally felt very little compunction at leaving his wife, or his wife at leaving him, and taking up with some one else. They were liable to be separated by their masters, or by either of their masters, when they were owned by different persons. Either master could sell and separate them at pleasure; that had the tendency of weakening the attachment of the negroes to their families; they felt an insecurity. I suppose there would be a very different feeling now. Most of the negroes were not married legally. There was no such thing as legal marriage between them. They generally just took up with each other, and lived in a state of adultery as long as it suited their convenience, and then broke off.

Question. Do you think that the feeling growing out of that sort of license will become improved by protecting marriage by law?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think so.

Question. Is there any other fact which you desire to state?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think of any. I intended to say, in speaking of the loyalty of the people of Virginia, that I am induced to doubt their loyalty from this circumstance: the legislature, now in session in Virginia, seems to be afraid to elect, and has not elected, any man to any of the offices within its gift who has had Union proclivities. They seem to have a distrust of their constituents; and that has led me to the belief that there is less loyalty in the State than is supposed by a good many of us. I have been observing very closely these things, feeling a deep interest in them; and, in travelling through the State, as I have done a great deal, I have heard a great many disloyal sentiments expressed.

Question. How do the secessionists generally treat northern men who travel through the country?

Answer. I have not heard of any violence offered to any person passing through. I think northern men are generally very prudent, when travelling, not to express their sentiments openly. I have observed that frequently in travelling on the Orange and Alexandria road. I have met with northern persons on the cars, and found them out by their coming to me after hearing me discuss these subjects with southern people. I have several times observed that there was a great deal of apprehension felt by these northern people in travelling; and they are generally very prudent until they find out whom they are talking to.

Question. Do you think it would be safe for members of this committee to repair to Richmond for the purpose of prosecuting their inquiries there?

Answer. Oh yes, sir. I should not apprehend the slightest danger. I think that the press of Virginia is doing a vast deal of mischief, and that the tendency of the press is to weaken the love of the people there for the government of the United States. I know of but one loyal paper in the city of Richmond, the Republic, and that has a very small circulation, as I understand. I was told in Richmond by a gentleman who was well informed that the press there is not supported generally by the people of Virginia, but that the secession papers are kept up principally by funds raised in New York and elsewhere.

Question. By funds contributed at the north?

Answer. Yes, sir, by the copperheads. I heard it stated there that the New York News had probably a larger circulation in the State of Virginia than any other paper, and that that class of persons at the north were subscribing to the secession papers at Richmond. I was inquiring how those papers could be supported there, as there is very little money in our country. There are more newspapers in Richmond than were ever there before; and I did not suppose they could be supported by the people of Virginia. I made the inquiry and was told that they were supported by northern capital.

Question. Are the people in Richmond and other intelligent people who read the New York News aware that that paper was subsidized by money directly contributed by rebel agents in Canada during the war?

Answer. I never heard before that it was. I acknowledge (and it is probably as well for me to say so) that I am very bitter in my feelings toward the secession party. I have always been so. I always hated them as I hated the devil himself; but there is a class of persons that I hate more than the secessionists; that is the northern copperheads; and I have regarded the New York News as being one of our worst enemies. I never read it or encouraged it. I see it sold by the newsboys in our country. I see a great many people in Staunton and the villages coming out of the post offices with the News in their hands. I think it has a very large circulation, and is doing a great deal of mischief in our country.

Question. Are you aware of the fact that a rebel agent in Canada sent during the war a draft for twenty-five thousand dollars in gold direct to Ben. Wood, proprietor of that News?

Answer. I saw some statement of that sort in one of the papers since the surrender.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you desire to state?

Answer. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

M. D. Corse sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. How long have you resided there?

Answer. I was born there and have lived there all my life, with an interval of seven years in California.

Question. What is your profession or occupation?

Answer. I am a money-broker. That was my business before the war.

Question. Were you a resident of Alexandria during the war?

Answer. No, sir. I was in the service of the Confederate States.

(The witness was cautioned that he was not bound to state anything that might criminate himself.)

Question. In what capacity were you in the rebel service?

Answer. I was brigadier general.

Question. You served under General Lee?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. In what battles were you engaged?

Answer. I was engaged in nearly all of them. I was in the first battle of Bull Run, the battle of Williamsburg, Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, and the last battle of Five Forks. I was taken prisoner at the last battle, four days before the surrender of General Lee. I was sent to Fort Warren and there discharged.

Question. Have you been pardoned by the President?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. You are the subject of no pardon or amnesty that you are aware of?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance with the people of Virginia?

Answer. My acquaintance does not extend very far; it is very limited. I know a good many people in the adjoining counties. I know the people who served with me, and I know a good many citizens in Fauquier and Fairfax counties.

Question. You are well acquainted, of course, with the secessionists?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You are well acquainted with their political feelings?

Answer. Yes, sir; but my intercourse has been very limited indeed. My business was prostrated when I came back, and I had to go to work to make something for the support of my family. The consequence is that I have been confined pretty much to my business as a broker in town.

Question. What is the general feeling among the secessionists of Virginia, so far as your acquaintance extends, towards the government of the United States?

Answer. So far as my knowledge extends they seem to be willing to accept the issue, and I think that those who have taken the oath seem to be all in good faith disposed to uphold the government so far as they can. That is my own feeling. We went to war and attempted to establish another government. It has gone against us, and I accept the issue. I have taken the oath of allegiance, and am disposed to keep it in good faith; and I think that is the feeling all through the State.

Question. Do you know of any disposition among the secessionists to renew the war?

Answer. I do not know any. I never heard any expression of that kind.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that there is any plan on foot among the secessionists again to embark in rebellion against the government?

Answer. None in the world, sir. I have no knowledge of the kind. I have no reason to believe that there is any. I think the people want to be let alone and protected.

Question. How do they feel in the State in reference to the abolition of slavery?

Answer. As a general thing I think they take it as it has been given. Some, of course, do not like it—think it a mistake on the part of the government, and think the colored people better in the condition of slaves. They do not like, I would say, negro suffrage.

Question. In your judgment what would be the effect of giving suffrage to the negroes, or to the more-intelligent class of negroes?

Answer. I do not know, indeed, what would be the effect.

Question. What effect would it have on the minds of the whites?

Answer. As far as I can judge, I think it would have very little effect upon them. They would not like it. I do not think it would produce any feeling of rebellion or resistance.

Question. Would you not fear scenes of violence between the whites and blacks?

Answer. No, sir, I do not think so; it might cause at the polls, occasionally, a little drunken row or something of the kind. I think, among the better classes, the thinking people of the community, they would let it pass.

Question. Has not the result of the war left a very deep-seated feeling of disappointment in the hearts of the people who were engaged in it on the rebel side?

Answer. I think there is generally a feeling of disappointment, but I do not think it as strong as it was. I think the people seem to be disposed just to go on, accept the issue, and make the best of it. Sometimes there is a feeling of disappointment; but that, I suppose, is the most natural feeling in the world. When men embark everything they have on earth, their lives and estates, and fail, it is perfectly natural that they should be disappointed; but I think they are a people who, if left alone, would support and build up and give their aid to the government.

Question. You think they feel that they have had fighting enough?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think that is the general feeling throughout the community, and I believe that the men who fought the most are the best.

Question. Are you not in the habit of hearing expressions of contempt and contumely against the government of the United States on the part of secessionists?

Answer. Sometimes they will speak against the government just as much as they did before. I suppose I may have heard such expressions, but I cannot mention any one in particular.

Question. To use a common expression, do you think that the secessionists generally love the government of the United States?

Answer. Well, sir, I do not think they do; it is too near to their discomfiture; their defeat is too close at hand for them to fall in love immediately with the government. The wound is rather too fresh, but I think that if let alone it will heal over.

Question. Do you not think that, if the secessionists should now have an opportunity to go out of the Union and establish a southern government independent of the United States, they would do so?

Answer. I do not know as to that; it is a difficult question to answer; but, to answer it in all candor, I should think they would; still, I think there would be no difficulty of that kind; I cannot say that I think they would join with any other government. If they were let alone and peaceably allowed to have governments of their own, I think they would not be disposed to go to war again.

Question. Suppose the government of the United States were involved in war with a foreign power, such as England or France, and we should have a hard pull at it; what would probably be the course taken by the secessionists of Virginia, and other places south, with whom you are acquainted?

Answer. I think that as many, and perhaps more, would take sides with the government of the United States as against it.

Question. Do you think that any considerable portion of the secessionists would join the enemy if they had the opportunity?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think that any considerable portion would. I do not see any reason why they should be in love with France or England.

Question. Suppose they saw, or thought they saw, a prospect of southern independence by taking such a course?

Answer. That might be a very tempting bait.

Question. Do you think it would be so strong a temptation that some of them would not be able to resist it?

Answer. I think it is probable, with the present feeling.

Question. How do the secessionists generally feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. Kindly, I think. I am sure I have no feeling against them.

Question. How do they feel on the subject of negro education?

Answer. I am sure they are perfectly satisfied with it; they would give their aid, most of them, to the education of the negro. I am sure I would myself; I always thought it should be.

Question. How are northern men treated who purchase property among them and settle?

Answer. For aught I know, very well; I never heard of anybody being maltreated. I think they have a better feeling towards northern people than towards their own people who have been against them in the war. As far as the northern man is concerned, I do not think there is a bad feeling towards him.

Question. Do they feel a willingness to contribute their share in the payment of the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war?

Answer. I think so; they know they have to do it, I suppose; they think it very hard, to be sure.

Question. If they had an opportunity would they not vote against the payment of the federal debt?

Answer. I really do not know how I can answer that.

Question. Suppose it was left to their free election, to be decided by their votes, would they repudiate the United States debt?

Answer. I think they would.

Question. Suppose it was left to their votes whether or not the confederate debt contracted in the prosecution of the war should be repudiated, rejected, and annulled, would they vote to annul it?

Answer. I do not know, really; I never thought about that. I do not know that I can give a fair answer to that.

Question. Is there not in your mind some ground to apprehend that they would vote to repudiate it?

Answer. Yes; in my opinion there are many who would vote to repudiate it.

Question. Have you any idea as to what that debt is?

Answer. I have not; it is enormous.

Question. What are the confederate bonds worth now in the market in Alexandria, or the confederate currency?

Answer. There are frequent applications at my office by little negroes and negro women to know if I will buy rebel money, but no one offers to buy any.

Question. It is not selling for anything in the market?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Have you any further observation that you wish to make to this committee?

Answer. No, sir, I do not know of any. I do not think it would be wise to force negro suffrage upon the people now in their present condition; it might lead to difficulties; I don't mean any serious public difficulties, but difficulties between negroes and white men coming together at the polls; there might be broils and disturbances.

Question. In case the negroes should be given the right of suffrage in Virginia, would they, or not, be likely to be induced by their old masters, or the party embracing their old masters, to vote for them and for their interests generally; in short, could they be led away like a herd to vote as they should be dictated to by their old masters?

Answer. I do not think they could now. I think that the feeling of liberty has permeated through the country. I do not think that they have the same confidence or feeling in their old masters which they had some time ago.

Question. Would they not be rather likely to vote the other way?

Answer. They might. I know that they are very easily controlled, but their mixture with the army and with northern people, and with soldiers at military posts, has broken up the old feeling.

Question. In your military service did you ever encounter any of the black troops on the field?

Answer. No, sir; I never encountered any black troops at all; I have had them in front of me on picket.

Question. So far as you know, or have been informed, what is their quality as troops?

Answer. As far as my own belief is concerned, I think they are capable of being made valuable troops. I think it was a very great mistake that we did not put them into the service of the Confederate States in the beginning.

Question. Why did not your confederacy give them their freedom?

Answer. That is what I say. We should have gone to work, given them their freedom, and made soldiers of them; we ought to have held up their freedom as a bait and mustered them all into the service, making their freedom the reward.

Question. Suppose that, instead of putting them into the confederate service, the confederacy had emancipated the entire race and then used them as soldiers?

Answer. That would have been better; we then would have had a prospect of success; but the people were not prepared for it.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

Dr. M. M. Lewis sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. Physician.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. I am.

Question. How long have you resided in Alexandria?

Answer. Since 1847, when that portion of Virginia was retroceded to Virginia.

Question. What have been your political connexions during the war?

Answer. I was with the confederate army.

(The witness was cautioned that he was not bound to state anything that might criminate himself.)

Question. How extensively are you acquainted with the people in your vicinity?

Answer. I have been a practitioner there for some time, and have quite an extensive practice in Alexandria, but my intercourse is altogether of a professional character. I never was a politician in my life, and have less disposition to be one now than ever.

Question. Do you know the state of public feeling in that county?

Answer. I know the feeling, pretty much, of my immediate circle of intimate friends. We discuss these questions very little now.

Question. What is the feeling towards the government of the United States on the part of secessionists?

Answer. I believe that the feeling of those with whom I conversed is very friendly. I do not know anything to the contrary. I believe they are perfectly willing to be restored to their former condition, and to remain as good citizens as any north of Mason and Dixon's line. I believe that is the determination of pretty much everybody that I have conversed with.

Question. Is there not a feeling of deep disappointment as to the result of the war?

Answer. They were disappointed in this respect—that they thought they would be restored to their position in the Union sooner than has been done. They are anxious to resume their relations, and to be again represented in Congress.

Question. What has been the effect upon the minds of secessionists in your vicinity of President Johnson's liberality in extending pardons and amnesties to the rebels?

Answer. I do not know, more than that they appreciate it. I have had no conversation with many who have been pardoned. I have been so exclusively and entirely devoted to my profession, from necessity, since I came back, that I have conversed very little with these persons; but in all conversations in regard to the President they have always spoken most cordially of his course, and they are very anxious and willing to sustain him in the administration of the government. I really think that the resolutions passed by the Virginia legislature the other day embody very completely the sentiments and tone of the people of Virginia. I believe that every man in Virginia, of any sense or standing, subscribes to those resolutions heartily and cheerfully.

Witness produces a copy of the resolutions referred to, which are as follows:

"Resolved, &c., That the people of this commonwealth, and their representatives here assembled, cordially approve the policy pursued by Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, in the reorganization of the Union. We accept the result of the late contest, and do not desire to renew what has been so conclusively determined, nor do we mean to permit any one subject to our control to attempt its renewal or to violate any of our obligations to the United States government. We mean to co-operate in the wise, just, and firm policy adopted by the President, with all the energy and power we can devote to that object.

"2d. That the above declaration expresses the sentiments and purposes of all our people, and we denounce the efforts of those who represent our views and intentions to be different, as cruel and criminal assaults upon our character and interests. It is one of the misfortunes of our present political condition that we have among us persons whose interests are temporarily promoted by such false representations; but we rely on the intelligence and integrity of those who wield the powers of the United States government for our safeguard against such malign influences.

"3d. That involuntary servitude, except for crime, is abolished, and ought not to be re-established; and that the negro race among us should be treated with justice, humanity, and good faith, and every means that the wisdom of the legislature can devise should be used to make them useful and intelligent members of society.

"4th. That Virginia will not voluntarily consent to change the adjustment of political power as affixed by the Constitution of the United States; and to constrain her to do so in her present prostrate and helpless condition, with no voice in the councils of the nation, would be an unjustifiable breach of faith; and that her earnest thanks are due to the President for the firm stand he has taken against amendments of the Constitution, forced through in the present condition of affairs."

Question. You think these resolutions embody, generally, the feeling of the secession people of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How do they regard the freedmen?

Answer. I believe they would treat them more kindly if they were left to them, and not trammelled or bothered, than they are treated now. They do not have any enmity towards them. There is a feeling of indifference towards them. The people would rather get rid of them if there were any possible means of doing so. They are a nuisance, in the present state of affairs. They will not work.

Question. Will they not work if they are paid for their labor?

Answer. They will not even do that, unless you give them exorbitant wages, more than you could get the labor done for by others.

Question. Have they been demanding higher wages than white laborers?

Answer. That is what I hear from the farmers. They also complain that they will not work for them more than a month or two.

Question. Is there not, generally, among their employers a disposition to constrain the freedmen to work at low wages?

Answer. I rather think not. Like everybody else, they like to get labor as cheap as they can. That is the disposition pretty much everywhere.

Question. Do you know of any combinations among employers to keep down the wages of freedmen?

Answer. No, sir; I do not.

Question. There is no general understanding to that effect?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the freedmen?

Answer. That I never heard anybody talk about. I do not suppose they would object to it if it did not interfere with them or tax them too much. Our communities have never been taxed much for educating our white poor, and I suppose they would not like to be taxed much to educate the negroes, especially in the present state of poverty in the south; but I believe the disposition on the part of the people there would be to treat them kindly, and give them every justice that they are entitled to, and all the rights they are competent to exercise.

Question. Suppose the negro should be allowed to vote?

Answer. Well, of course, there would be opposition to it; but the opposition would not amount to resistance to any law.

Question. You think not?

Answer. I should think not.

Question. Would it not be likely to lead to scenes of violence and riot?

Answer. No more than in any election—in the city of Baltimore for instance—where there might be some drunken rowdies fighting at the polls. I do not think there would be any concert of action on the part of the intelligent and respectable portion of the community to interfere with the negroes' voting.

Question. How do the negroes generally behave: are they orderly and submissive to the law?

Answer. They are very respectful to me, and I cannot say that I have seen any bad misbehavior on the part of the negroes in Alexandria. The trouble on Christmas day was more of a drunken frolic than anything else. I do not think there was any concert of action or purpose on either side.

Question. How did this violence at Alexandria break out?

Answer. My impression is, that it arose from drunken parties meeting each other in the street.

Question. Did the blacks give any provocation, so far as you know?

Answer. I do not know who gave the provocation. I suppose that it just arose from drunken people meeting on the street. I think it was whiskey, not design, on the part of either party. I have seen just as much disturbance in Alexandria on other Christmas days; certainly I have dressed as many wounded men on other Christmas days as on that day. Down at Fishtown I have dressed more wounds in a day in the fishing season. There used to be always rows there. There was some alarm expressed by white persons in regard to negroes breaking out in insurrection that day; but I had no apprehension of it. I am very certain there was no intention on the part of the whites to make any disturbance that day. In a community there will, of course, be some men fond of kicking up a fuss or disturbance. I believe the people of the south would be better citizens than ever they were if they were just allowed to assume their old position under the government. Of course they have feelings which they cannot divest themselves of as yet; but those feelings would be soothed down very much by a restoration to their former relations with the government.

Question. What are your personal feelings now towards the government of the United States?

Answer. My personal feelings are for the success and prosperity of the government. I have no unkind feeling towards the government, and never had any, so far as that is concerned.

Question. Suppose the United States should have a war with some foreign power, such as England or France, do you not fancy that a considerable portion of the secessionists would be ready to embrace the cause of the common enemy?

Answer. That is a question which I have often thought of, but which I am not prepared to answer. I think it is very doubtful. Of course there would be some who would do so. As to my own feeling, I would be very willing to be let alone, to stay at home, or to accept a position in the United States as in the confederate army.

Question. You would be willing to fight the common enemy?

Answer. Yes, sir; as a surgeon, in my profession. But I believe that feeling would dissipate very thoroughly, or certainly very quickly, by a speedy acceptance, on the part of the federal government, of the States back into the Union. I think they are harassed a little.

Question. Was there not, during the rebellion, a very strong desire to have the government involved in a war with France or England?

Answer. Oh, certainly there was.

Question. Was there not a pretty prevalent feeling that, rather than submit to the government of the United States, they would prefer to be under the protection of France?

Answer. That was expressed by a good many persons; not that the objection was so much to the government of the United States under its Constitution, but to being under the control of the black republican party.

Question. They did not like that party at all?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How do they feel towards the black republican party now?

Answer. I do not know that they have any very kind feeling towards them.

Question. How do they feel towards the majority of both houses of Congress?

Answer. I think they would rather see the black republican party out of power, and some other party in power.

Question. You think it probable they have more respect and attachment for President Johnson than they have for the majority in Congress?

Answer. Probably they may, simply from the fact that President Johnson is disposed to view their present condition more leniently, and is more anxious to restore them to their original rights; whereas the black republican party is not disposed to do so.

Question. Have they not an idea that Mr. Johnson is willing to have them readmitted to both houses of Congress without any further delay?

Answer. So far as my information goes, I should suppose that they may be under that impression; that President Johnson is somewhat anxious to have them restored immediately.

Question. And they suppose that the black republican party is opposed to that?

Answer. I suppose so. They think this: that when they went out of the Union, as they thought legally and constitutionally, and as they submitted that to the arbitration of the sword, which arbitration has been decided against them, they are willing to abide by the decision; and as the republican party never acknowledged that they were out of the Union, they do not see now why they should be compelled to bring about another war to fight their way back into the Union. That party never admitted that they were out of the Union.

Question. It is a very general impression among the secessionists, is it not, that they were out of the Union?

Answer. There were certain men who believed in the doctrine of secession, and certain men who did not believe in it. Those who believed in the right of secession believed, of course, that they were legally and constitutionally out of the Union, and were no longer subject to the authority of the United States.

Question. Did you belong to that school?

Answer. Yes, sir, I belonged to that school. I believed we had a perfect right to go out. I went out, not because I objected to the government of the United States, but because I was engaged with that party. I belonged to that school and entertained that opinion.

Question. Have you changed that opinion now?

Answer. I have changed it so far as the practicability of it.

Question. Have you changed it as a legal principle?

Answer. I believe, sir, that the States, according to their understanding of the constitution, had a right to go out.

Question. Do you hold also that the people of a county in Virginia have a right to secede?

Answer. No, sir; that is a different proposition altogether.

Question. Different in what respect?

Answer. The States have delegated to a government certain powers. Beyond those powers the government has no control.

Question. Did not the county also delegate powers to the State government?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How did the State government obtain its powers except from the counties?

Answer. The State government organized the counties. The States were organized before the Union, and the State was organized before the counties. The States created the Union, but the counties did not create the State.

Question. Who created the State?

Answer. The people created the State. The people voted in mass.

Question. At the time the people created the State, to what government did they belong?

Answer. The old States belonged to themselves.

Question. Did they not belong to England?

Answer. They belonged to England; but when they achieved their independence they were acknowledged as sovereign and independent States.

Question. Who achieved their independence?

Answer. They did it jointly.

Question. Then they all achieved the independence of each?

Answer. Yes.

Question. And hence you derive the right of each to secede from the rest?

Answer. Yes; there was no Union at that time. The Union existed for the accomplishment of a certain purpose.

Question. Do you think of anything else you want to say on this examination?

Answer. No, sir. As far as my individual self is concerned, I am anxious, and I believe everybody is anxious, to get back and to go into the old routine and condition of affairs. I believe that if the southern States were restored they would be as loyal and true and as obedient to the laws of the country as any State in the Union. So far as the negroes are concerned, I expect the people would like to get rid of them. The south is in a very bad condition now to take care of so large a population, but I believe she would give them just as much rights as any other class of people.

Question. How do the secessionists look upon the copperhead party of the north?

Answer. I suppose they look upon them more favorably, as being disposed to sympathize with them more than the other party.

Question. Do they not generally look to the copperhead party for support and encouragement?

Answer. They look to what we call the democratic party, I suppose.

Question. Do they not look toward a reunion of the democratic party for success in politics?

Answer. I suppose that politicians generally look to their friends for support, but I do not pretend to say what politicians intend to do.

Question. Do not secessionists entertain a very peculiar respect for that class of northern men, now known as copperheads, who discouraged the war on the part of the government?

Answer. It would be natural for them to do so; I suppose they do.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1866.

Dr. J. B. Johnson sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. Are you a practicing physician in Alexandria?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How long have you resided in Virginia?

Answer. I am a native of Virginia.

Question. What was your occupation during the war?

Answer. That of a physician.

Question. Were you practicing at Alexandria?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What political party were you connected with during the war or since the war?

Answer. The States-rights party.

Question. Did you take any part in the war?

Answer. No, sir, none.

Question. Are you well acquainted with the state of public feeling in Virginia toward the government of the United States?

Answer. I have had opportunities since the cessation of hostilities of observing the temper and character of the people.

Question. Does the secession part of the people generally feel kindly toward the government of the United States?

Answer. They manifest no opposition. They show perfect obedience to the laws, proclamations, and orders of the government; that is, among that class of the people whom we expect, of course, to be law-abiding and good citizens.

Question. Do you not, habitually or occasionally, hear contemptuous expressions towards the government?

Answer. Yes, sir, I do sometimes.

Question. Have any instances of violence come within your notice growing out of differences of political opinion since the war?

Answer. Nothing of any consequence, except those little street disturbances, which are always liable to occur—mere matters of police.

Question. Is there not a deep feeling of disappointment and chagrin on the part of secessionists at the result of the war?

Answer. I do not observe it. They all seem to be cheerful, and to take the result as a matter of course. They seem to be perfectly reconciled, and to be returning to habits of peace as rapidly as they can. I see no bitterness about their disappointment.

Question. Do they generally regard the question of the right of secession as having been settled by the sword?

Answer. It seems to me so. That is the expression of the majority of those with whom I have conversed.

Question. Do they generally hold, at present, that a State has the right to secede from the Union?

Answer. I have heard no expressions of such an opinion, either public or private.

Question. You think that practically the result of the war has decided that question in their minds?

Answer. I do think so, from my observation.

Question. How do this class of people generally feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. Very kindly. We have had no difficulty there or dispute with the negroes, except on one occasion, on Christmas day. A crowd of drunken white people got into a miscellaneous row with negroes; but the negroes are generally treated kindly. My own negroes, with the exception of one, have returned to me. My own negro boy, whom I have owned since infancy, has returned to me after having been employed in the commissary department in Alexandria, at the rate of thirty-five dollars a month and rations. He has returned to his old status. The feeling between the negroes and their former masters seems to be perfectly kind; I see the negroes working as usual.

Question. From what you know of the feeling in Virginia, have you any reason to suppose that a majority of Virginians would now, if left to their free choice, decide in favor of a southern independent government?

Answer. I cannot say; I am in that position of life that does not justify me in giving expression to what public sentiment would be; I do not feel able to answer the question satisfactorily, because I am not informed on the subject; but I may say that I have scarcely met a single person among the secessionists who does not really accept the matter as settled, and seem to be satisfied with it.

Question. How do they regard the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. We really have very little to do with the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. You do not like it much?

Answer. Well, we do not object to it; we have but very little difficulty with the negro. A negro occasionally commits a theft, and is handed over to the Freedmen's Bureau and tried, and that is the end of it.

Question. Are negroes more thievish than white men of about that condition?

Answer. I think not. I really do think that the negroes of the south, (and, indeed, it has been the experience of a great many strangers among us,) as a class of servants, really enjoy a higher morality than any other class of the kind on the face of the earth; that is my impression. Situated as they have been in slavery, they have never had the temptation to steal; if they did steal, or take from their masters, as a matter of course it would be noticed.

Question. Are they not generally as veracious, as truth-telling, as the like condition of whites?

Answer. Yes, sir; I must say that they are; there is as much honesty and veracity among them. Since the war I have tried both white and black servants, but I declare that I did not see any difference in morality; my experience is, that the negroes are a great deal better than the same class of whites; I must really decide in favor of the negroes.

Question. Is there any other statement that you desire to make to the committee?

Answer. No, sir, I believe not.

WASHINGTON, February 9, 1866.

Dr. Arthur Watson sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What is your occupation, and where is your residence?

Answer. I have a temporary residence at this time at Petersburg, Virginia; I am a collector of the United States direct tax at that place; my permanent residence is in Accomac county, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. I am.

Question. What are you by profession?

Answer. I am a physician.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance in Virginia?

Answer. I am acquainted with a great many persons in Richmond, having been a member of the legislature some four or five years before the war. I am acquainted with a great many persons in Norfolk, and pretty extensively acquainted on the eastern shore of Virginia, in Accomac and Northampton counties; I have also some acquaintance in other parts of the State; I have a great many acquaintances in Alexandria, having been a member of the State constitutional convention that sat there in 1864; and I have been there frequently other times.

Question. So far as you know, what is the general feeling among the secessionists of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. So far as I know, the feeling of the secession population of Virginia is hostile to the government of the United States; equally as much so, I think, as it was just previous to and during the rebellion.

Question. Do you think that President Johnson's liberality in granting pardons and amnesties has had any effect in either increasing or diminishing their feelings of unfriendliness towards the government of the United States?

Answer. The policy of President Johnson has had a tendency to increase the opposition to the government.

Question. What has been the effect, in your judgment, of his liberal policy upon the minds of the people?

Answer. Directly subsequent to the surrender of the confederate forces, the secessionists were all claiming to be very loyal to the government; that having been subdued, they felt it their duty to acquiesce in the demands of the government, and the idea was, that they intended to be strictly loyal; but the policy of President Johnson has induced them to think that their punishment, if any at all is inflicted upon them, will be very light; and my impression is, that, in consequence of that, they have become more defiant and hostile to the government in their expressions and acts.

Question. What are their expressions towards the government in their ordinary conversation, so far as you have observed—respectful or contemptuous?

Answer. Contemptuous; going so far as to say that they are ready at any moment, if the opportunity presents itself, to take up arms against the government; that expression was used by one secessionist in Richmond, Virginia.

Question. In your presence?

Answer. No, sir; but it was told me by the gentleman who had just heard it, but a few moments afterwards—a gentleman upon whose statement I could rely.

Question. A man of credit and of good character?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you reason to believe that such expressions are frequent among the secessionists?

Answer. I am under the impression that they are among themselves; I do not think they are frequent before loyal men.

Question. Do they express any unwillingness to take office under the government of the United States?

Answer. I have heard no such expressions recently.

Question. You have not?

Answer. No, sir, not recently.

Question. Have you the slightest idea that those leading secessionists would take office under the government of the United States, if they had an opportunity?

Answer. I think some of them would; some of them, I think, would not.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the federal debt, contracted for the prosecution of the war, and the suppression of the rebellion?

Answer. In my presence, when coming before me to pay the direct tax which I have been collecting, they have appeared to pay it very willingly; but, outside, I have heard expressions used in regard to the matter, different from what they express before me. In my presence they seem to be perfectly willing to pay the tax.

Question. I refer to the general feeling of the secession party on the subject.

Answer. I would add, that I was in the office of the editor of the Richmond Enquirer one day, and I heard him say that he was opposed to the assumption of the direct tax by the State of Virginia, for the reason that they had no representation in Congress, and therefore ought not to be taxed. Governor Wise was present at the time and acquiesced; not by using such expressions himself; but he appeared to acquiesce in the sentiments advanced by Mr. Tyler, the editor of the Enquirer.

Question. Did Governor Wise evince any anxiety to have the State of Virginia again represented in Congress, and immediately?

Answer. I never heard him express himself on that point.

Question. He has not been pardoned yet?

Answer. I think not; he has never taken the oath, I believe. When addressing the State guard, now forming in Virginia—now reviving the one in existence before the war—he is represented in the papers as saying that he had not taken the oath, and never intended to take the oath of allegiance to the government of the United States; that was his public declaration as published in the papers of Richmond.

Question. What is the object and purpose of this State guard, of which you have made mention?

Answer. I believe it is for the purpose of protection to the capitol and the public property in Richmond principally. The State has always had a guard there.

Question. Has there been a statute enacted by the legislature of Virginia to keep up this guard, or is it only in contemplation?

Answer. I have seen no act of the legislature during the present session for that purpose.

Question. Upon what ground does it stand?

Answer. I presume there is a law for the purpose of keeping a State guard.

Question. Have you any idea when that law was passed?

Answer. I have not.

Question. Was it an act passed by the secession legislature or convention?

Answer. I think that in all probability the act was in existence before the war.

Question. What is the danger to be guarded against by this State guard?

Answer. I do not know of any particular danger, except that we all know that depredations may be committed upon public as well as private property without some protection over it. The guard was probably intended to protect the public property in Richmond from depredations of any kind.

Question. Of what class of persons does the guard chiefly consist—of rebels or of Union men?

Answer. I cannot say; I presume they are reconstructed rebels, those who have been secessionists, but I do not know their character. I believe the guard has not yet been fully organized; it is in process of formation.

Question. How numerous is the guard to be?

Answer. I think the legislature has the naming of the number; there have been various numbers named, if I am not mistaken; what number has actually been fixed upon I cannot say; it seems to me it was sixty to seventy—somewhere in that neighborhood.

Question. Does that organization extend over the State, or is it confined to the city of Richmond?

Answer. I do not think it extends any further than the city of Richmond; I think it is intended principally for the protection of the public property there.

Question. It was this guard that Governor Wise addressed?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Was the remark of his, which you have referred to, received by that guard with cheers, or in silence?

Answer. I do not know; I was not present when it was made; I only saw the account published in the newspapers.

Question. How do the rebels feel in regard to the payment of the rebel debt?

Answer. I have heard no expression of opinion in regard to that matter; they are not disposed to express themselves freely before me, knowing my position; therefore, I have no positive evidence of their feelings, but I have my opinion about it.

Question. What is the confederate scrip now worth in the city of Richmond?

Answer. Nothing.

Question. Nothing at all?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Is it an article of traffic?

Answer. I think not.

Question. When is that scrip payable?

Answer. I really cannot answer that question; I do not recollect that I have examined into that matter, for I have felt very little interest in it, and cannot tell when it is made payable.

Question. Was it not made payable within a certain time after the conclusion of a treaty of peace between the government of the United States and the confederate government?

Answer. I think that is so, now that you have recalled it to my recollection.

Question. You have no idea, I suppose, that the secessionists of Virginia are really anxious to pay that rebel debt?

Answer. I have no evidence that they are anxious to pay it.

Question. In your opinion, would they take it very hard if they should be absolutely prohibited from paying that rebel debt, or any part of it?

Answer. If I were to give my impressions about the matter—I do not know that they are based upon any reasonable and positive foundation—I would say that they desire that that rebel debt should be paid, and that the federal debt should not be paid. But that is only an opinion of mine, from the fact, simply, that I know they are very disloyal, and opposed to the federal government.

Question. In case of a war between the United States and any foreign power—say England or France, for instance—what would be the general feeling of the secessionists of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. My impression is, that if a favorable opportunity presented itself, when they thought they might be successful, they would unite with France or England in opposition to the federal government.

Question. Suppose we were thus engaged in a war, and the contest should become severe, and the prospect of a favorable termination of the war for the government of the United States should become doubtful, what course would the secessionists of Virginia be likely to take?

Answer. I am satisfied they would take part with any foreign power against the government of the United States; or, if they thought they had the power to succeed, they would again take up arms against the federal government in support of a government of their own.

Question. With reference to a conflict with a foreign power, do you regard the secessionists of Virginia as an element of strength or of weakness to the United States?

Answer. I should regard them as an element of weakness.

Question. You think there would be danger of their joining the enemy?

Answer. I do.

Question. How do they feel, generally, towards the freedmen, and towards the policy of the government which has made the negro free?

Answer. I think their feelings are those of hostility towards the negro, and that they are opposed to the policy which has made him free.

Question. If they had the power, do you think they would again reduce the blacks to slavery?

Answer. My impression is that they would.

Question. How are the freedmen generally treated by them?

Answer. So far as my observation has extended, I have seen no acts of cruelty towards the freedmen.

Question. Have you heard of any acts of cruelty from authentic sources?

Answer. I have heard of acts of cruelty from sources that I could rely upon.

Question. Such as scourging and torturing the blacks?

Answer. I have heard of such only through the papers.

Question. Do you know of any combinations among the secessionists to keep down the wages to be paid the blacks for their labor?

Answer. There was a meeting held some weeks ago at a place called Turkey Neck, presided over by a man named Hill Carter, pretty well known in Virginia. At that meeting resolutions were passed fixing the wages of the blacks, and providing for their punishment in case they did not come up to their contracts, by way of a reduction of wages, and in other respects, of which I do not now recollect the particulars.

Question. Have you reason to believe that such combinations exist throughout the State of Virginia?

Answer. I have heard only of two instances—the one I have mentioned, and one other.

Question. What is the political character of the present legislature of Virginia?

Answer. Their political character is that of secessionists; a large majority of them call themselves democrats. Indeed, I may say that a large majority of them were rebels during the war. I know of but two or three members of that legislature who are considered everywhere as unconditional Union men.

Question. What schemes do those men entertain in reference to the future?

Answer. My impression is that their object is to obtain representation in Congress, and then unite with the democratic party in the north, and thus obtain control of the government of the United States.

Question. And what do you think they propose to accomplish in that event?

Answer. In that event I think they would endeavor to re-establish slavery and repudiate the national debt, if they had the power, and so legislate as to endanger the government of the United States.

Question. Suppose that they should, by combination north and south, elect a President of the United States who, like Mr. Buchanan, held that it was incompetent and unconstitutional for the government of the United States to use the federal army and navy to coerce a State; what would they do?—would they again attempt to go out of the Union?

Answer. My impression is that they would.

Question. For in that event they would not anticipate any war?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Have you any doubt about that?

Answer. Not in my own mind.

Question. Do you think of anything else you deem it important to state?

Answer. I would like to bring to your notice the action of the present legislature. We had a legislature which sat in June, 1865. That legislature was composed of less than thirty members, embracing both houses; although the constitution of Virginia requires that the lower house of the legislature shall consist of not less than eighty nor more than one hundred and four members, and the senate shall consist of not less than one-third nor more than one-half of the number of the lower house, in order to compose a constitutional legislature. That legislature in June last, composed of less than thirty members, passed an act enfranchising those people of Virginia who had been disfranchised by the constitution as amended in Alexandria in 1864; that is, they submitted to the people of Virginia the proposition whether the third article of that constitution should be amended. There was a majority of votes cast in favor of amending that article of the constitution.

The legislature elected in the fall of 1865 assembled in Richmond on the 1st of December, 1865, and they amended the third article of the constitution of Virginia so as to enfranchise and give to themselves the right to hold office as members of that legislature; whereas the third article of the constitution of Virginia expressly provides that no man shall either vote or hold office in Virginia who has ever held office under the government of the Confederate States, or under any State government in rebellion against the government of the United States. By that third article those very men were prohibited either from voting or holding any office under the State of Virginia. But before amending that third article of the constitution of Virginia, which they claimed they had the right to do because of the people of Virginia voting in favor of amending it, they took their seats and removed the prohibition which the constitution placed upon themselves.

Question. That was an unconstitutional proceeding on their part?

Answer. Certainly.

Question. Entirely revolutionary?

Answer. Yes, sir; and I claim that in consequence of that proceeding they have not administered the government in a republican manner—that they were usurpers; I have written an article to that effect, which I intended to have published, but which I have not yet published. I also claim that Governor Peirpoint, in recognizing the illegal legislature of June, 1865, and in recognizing the present legislature before the constitutional prohibition was removed, usurped power which was expressly prohibited to him.

Question. And the result is that the government of the State of Virginia is in the hands of the rebels.

Answer. Entirely so; by their own illegal and unconstitutional acts.

Question. Are you aware that President Lincoln interfered in any way in that respect?

Answer. I am not.

Question. Did Governor Peirpoint remonstrate or protest against any such proceeding?

Answer. He did not. I was told by a reliable gentleman that his attention was called to the fact, but he made no remonstrance. He sent in his messages to that legislature as though it was entirely legal.

Question. He sent his messages to it, and received its acts for his signature as though it was the legal legislature of the State of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, February 9, 1866.

Jaquelin M. Wood sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Lynchburg, Virginia.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. United States assessor. I was formerly engaged in the boot and shoe business.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance in Virginia?

Answer. Not very extensive. It is confined to some two or three counties. I have recently travelled through the western part of the State—for the last twelve months. I was at one time deputy sheriff of the county of Culpeper.

Question. Are you acquainted with the state of public feeling on the part of the secession people of Virginia where you have been?

Answer. I think I have formed some conclusions in reference to it.

Question. What is generally their feeling toward the government of the United States?

Answer. I rather think that the general feeling is hostile; that if they accept the situation it is from necessity rather than choice. Of course there may be some exceptions.

Question. Are you, in your intercourse with them, in the habit of hearing expressions of contempt or hatred toward the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes. I have heard such expressions more than once, sometimes, when persons did not know my real sentiments. Probably they would have refrained from expressing them if they had known. An instance of that sort occurred yesterday. A man said in my hearing that if the State was properly organized and power restored he was in favor of driving out all such men as John C. Underwood and John Minor Botts.

Question. How do they feel towards northern men who come to settle among them and do business?

Answer. I do not think they favor them. They will tell you that they intend to invite immigration; but the real feeling of the people, in my opinion, is averse to it; and the recent legislation at Richmond, in regard to the length of time required for residence in the State before persons are allowed to vote, confirms me in that belief.

Question. Would a northern Union man be safe in attempting to reside among them and to hold property, provided the military restraint was taken off?

Answer. That would depend altogether upon the locality he undertook to reside in. I think that in some localities it would be unsafe for such a man, especially if he was firm and expressed himself freely. If he "sold out" to them, as they say, and decided with them, they might probably allow him to remain. I do not think any free-spoken, decidedly loyal man would be very safe in some parts of the country if the people were not under restraint on account of the troops. I should be very much pleased to see it otherwise; but still facts are facts.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the federal debt?

Answer. That is like their loyalty. They pay their taxes apparently cheerfully in some communities, but, of course, they do it because they think it is the best policy at this time, not because of any particular love that they have for the government or its officers.

Question. Suppose the question were left to them to decide, would they consent to the payment of the federal debt incurred in the prosecution of the war?

Answer. No, sir. I verily believe that if they had the power they would repudiate every dollar of the public debt, and assume instead of it the confederate debt. I think their feeling is ripe for that thing. I do not know that they contemplate doing it, for they do not expect to have the power; but if they had the power they would do it. I believe it is entirely unsafe to trust to these ex-rebels. I do not think that the interests of the government would be safe in their hands.

Question. If they had an opportunity to do so, without danger, do you think they would again go out of the Union?

Answer. I believe that if they thought it would pay, as the saying is, to attempt the thing, they would be ready for another rebellion—that is, if they thought they possessed the power and means. An expression was made use of the other day by a very honorable man, of Irish birth. Some one asked him, playfully, if he was a Fenian. He said he was not; that he did not want to weaken Great Britain, for he was in hopes that some time the British would come and whip the Yankees like the devil. During the war the men who were engaged in the rebellion would have been glad to see a rupture between the United States and France or England; and I believe that their sympathies, instead of being with their country, would be on the other side.

Question. If the United States should happen to be engaged in war with England or France, and the prospect should become somewhat flattering to them of a failure on the part of the government of the United States in the war, what course would they be likely to take?

Answer. I believe they would go against us. That is my judgment. In fact, some of them have said so. There is no concealment of it. Several of the influential rebel generals have gone to Mexico, and have shown by their acts that that was their feeling. I have no doubt they would have followers.

Question. Having in view such an event as a foreign war, would you regard the secession people as an element of strength or of weakness to the United States?

Answer. I do not know that I would be authorized to say they would be a weakness; but I would not like to say the contrary. There are exceptions. Some of them are sick and tired of rebellion. But there is, I fear, a majority on the other side; and the leading people, the people who can and do control public sentiment, would be in sympathy with England or France, or any other government that could break up the government of the United States. Every one acquainted with the southern people knows that during the rebellion the constant way of expressing it was that they would rather be under any monarchical power than under the power of the United States; that they would sooner be attached to any other government than have to come back as a part of the United States government. They were in earnest then just as much as they are now when they say they have reconstructed and are loyal.

Question. Do any considerable portion of the people of Virginia entertain a preference for a monarchical form of government?

Answer. They have not, in my presence, so expressed themselves recently; but I often heard it during the rebellion, and I occasionally hear it now.

Question. Have you heard men of good condition and standing in society make such a remark?

Answer. Only very seldom. That class is more prudent. They are not apt to make observations of that sort if they know there is any person present who differs with them very materially; but they occasionally mistake the party and make such observations.

Question. Is Jefferson Davis popular with the secession people?

Answer. Oh, of course. They frequently make expressions like this: that he is no worse than they; that they elected him and indorsed him. I sometimes say to them that, if that be the fact, I am in favor of their having their rights; that if they claim to be equal with him in every respect, and want to be hanged, I think they should have their rights. In that point they do not exactly agree with me.

Question. What is the political character of the Virginia legislature—of what materials is it made up?

Answer. It is made up almost entirely of disloyal men—men who were disloyal.

Question. Men who actually served in the rebellion?

Answer. Yes, sir; many of them were officers in the rebel army.

Question. What chance does a thorough out-and-out Union man stand to be elected to the legislature of Virginia?

Answer. None whatever, except it were in some border county. They take the broad ground that no man who was a Union man is honest; that a man who did not go with his State is dishonest. Sometimes they hint that a man who is a Union man has no capacity, that he is a weed upon the current, that he has no stability, and that there is nothing honorable attached to him.

Question. They regard him rather as a poor devil?

Answer. Yes; they regard him rather as a poor devil, and one who ought to be banished from the State as soon as circumstances justify it. They have not so expressed themselves, but the conclusion I have come to is that the leading class in Virginia, the former slaveholders, the class that really produced this revolution, intend—while they cannot reorganize slavery exactly as it was, and call it slavery, and buy and sell as they did before—by a hocuspocus arrangement to get the service of their former slaves, and tyrannize over them and the poor white people as formerly. They intend to do so by legislation, by declaring every man who will not make a contract at $4 a month a vagrant, and selling out his services as such. Under the general idea that a good deal of thefts are committed by them, they will organize patrol companies as formerly, and then the negro will have to go and put himself under the protection of some white man who will take him as a sort of master.

Question. Are those gentlemen who entertain these schemes generally remarkable for their own industry and love of industrial habits?

Answer. Certainly not. There is nothing said about a white man being a vagrant if he stands around and begs for drinks; but for a black man there is a great deal of legislation necessary. I have generally told them that it seemed to me, when they were making so much to do about the idleness of negroes, I could see others who did not claim to be negroes doing the same thing, and I did not know that either of them had much capital in bank. In my judgment there is more labor performed by the colored people than by the others.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there are combinations among the negroes for any unlawful purpose?

Answer. I have seen nothing of the sort in my part of the country. The negroes there are not so intelligent as a class as they are in the parts of the State nearer Washington. They hardly realize up there that they are free. In the towns where they are protected by the Freedmen's Bureau it is a little different.

Question. Have you heard of ill treatment and violence by the secessionists toward freedmen?

Answer. In many instances. Thousands of such instances come up in that section.

Question. How do the secessionists feel in regard to the establishment of colored schools among them?

Answer. In Lynchburg General Curtis got up rather a good state of feeling in regard to them. He gave them to understand that if they did not co-operate, others would come in; that it should be done any how, and that they might as well be a party to it as not. They consented. But at Harrisonburg, and other parts of the district, rooms could not be obtained for colored schools. The papers came out and said that rooms for that purpose could not be procured. On one occasion I heard a man, who did not know who I was, make a remark in reply to something that had been said about establishing a school at Wytchville for the teaching of colored children. He said he hoped that the damned rascal who attempted to teach niggers would be shot.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that that feeling prevails very generally?

Answer. I do not know but that the feeling does; but the expression of it is rare, because prudent men would not so express themselves even if they thought so.

Question. How do the secessionists generally treat Union men who are citizens of the State of Virginia?

Answer. For a time they were rather disposed, and are yet, to turn a cold shoulder to them. They have treated me well where I have been, but it is because they think it is policy to do so. I do not think it is from any particular love for me or for the government, but they think it is the best policy to be civil. There are quite a number of men in the western part of the State who have never had anything to do with the rebellion, and, for all practical purposes, were probably loyal, or would be if not ruled by others. But they are not loyal according to our standard. They do not believe that a colored man is fit to vote or to be a citizen. They do not think him fit for anything except to perform subordinate services. That is the sentiment of a great many people who claim to be loyal, and who would be very much offended if it was hinted that they were not loyal.

Question. Suppose the Constitution of the United States should be so amended as to give to the negro race, or certain classes of them, the right to vote, would that amendment be acceptable to the secessionists of Virginia?

Answer. By no means.

Question. What effect would it be likely to produce among them?

Answer. I think they would submit to it under protest, as they do to everything else, as they do to paying the internal revenue tax. I do not think there would be any particular difficulty about it, because the thing is so just that I think after a while it will commend itself even to them, after they have had time to reflect.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the confederate debt?

Answer. They pretend that they have repudiated it by legislation; but they did not do it of their own choice, but because it was necessary for them to do it in order to have the State reconstructed. That was one of the terms. They sometimes say that as the rebellion failed, everything connected with it necessarily failed. But I think that, if not prevented by the general government, they will force the people of the counties to be taxed for the liabilities of those counties in arming and equipping recruits. At this time the bonds issued for that purpose are being held by the citizens of the several counties. The legislature has already authorized the several counties to borrow money, and I have no doubt that it is to liquidate these very debts. The money to be borrowed will be appropriated to pay the bonds now held by parties—the county bonds.

Question. Do you know anything about the State guard at Richmond—the Richmond Blues?

Answer. I do not know anything about them, except that there is such a military organization. I understand they had a meeting recently, and that Ex-Governor Henry A. Wise addressed them.

Question. What did the ex-governor condescend to say to them?

Answer. The report I had of it was that he recalled all the deeds of valor performed by them during the rebellion, and praised them very much for their constancy and bravery.

Question. Did you get this information from a reliable source?

Answer. I thought so.

Question. Did Wise speak of the cause itself in which they had been fighting?

Answer. That was the impression I had from the report I had of it—that he spoke of it as a holy and just cause; that they had fought bravely for it, and stood firmly up to it. He praised them very much. He referred to the fact, wherever he went they followed.

Question. Did he inform them particularly of his performances in western Virginia as a military commander?

Answer. I do not know that he referred to them in particular; but he did speak of wherever he was and where they were with him. There have been quite a number of concerts given and debates had in Lynchburg for the benefit of Stonewall Jackson's widow. They say she is not as rich as she ought to be; that the State owes a great debt to her as the widow of Stonewall Jackson.

Question. Do the secessionists appear to contribute liberally to the fund?

Answer. The papers say that the fund is quite a success.

Question. Do the newspapers speak approvingly of that mode of raising money for that purpose?

Answer. Oh yes, most assuredly; they make strong appeals to the people to encourage it as a debt of gratitude.

Question. Did you know Stonewall Jackson?

Answer. No, sir; I never saw him, although I have seen all the other rebel generals who have figured in that region.

Question. How do they regard Robert E. Lee?

Answer. They look upon him as the greatest man of the nation, and the best man. That is the common expression. They often say that they were conquered by numbers, by the influence of foreigners. They do not admit at any time that their cause was a bad one. They always claim superiority both in the field and elsewhere; but they say that numbers were against them and that they had to yield.

Question. Do they seem to be disappointed in reference to the number of loyal troops that came against them?

Answer. Yes; there was more than they calculated upon in the first place. They account for it by saying that foreigners re-enforced the Yankees, and that their resources gave out. Consequently they came under. Sometimes their manner looks as if they thought it was not hopeless yet; that something might turn up out of it; that war between the United States and another nation might realize the much wished for event at last.

Question. What is the confederate scrip worth in your neighborhood?

Answer. They have been buying it there, but I never could ascertain for what purpose. They have been buying it at a small price.

Question. It is not regarded as a security of superlative value, I suppose?

Answer. No, sir; it is not considered as currency at all. I do not think that anybody who has it considers it of any real value at this time.

Question. Do you recollect at what time that scrip was made payable on its face?

Answer. Yes; all of it that I ever read said that it was payable in six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States. It is not due till then.

Question. So that there is none of it due yet?

Answer. There is none of it due, and never will be, I suppose.

Question. The treaty has not yet been ratified?

Answer. No, sir, and they say that they cannot ratify such a treaty on account of the radicals.

Question. They have an affection for the copperheads, have they not?

Answer. Oh, yes; and they are very fond of Mr. Johnson's policy of reconstruction, and very much in the hope that there will be a wonderful breach between him and Congress; that is their song now. They want to see something like a split take place which will destroy the power of the radical party.

Question. Do they seem to look upon that contemplated breach as a case in which rogues fall out and honest men get their own?

Answer. I think they are hoping something of that sort. I suppose they think that of two evils, President Johnson is the least. They do not exactly like him, but they think he is better than the radicals, and they think that by uniting with him they will throw out of power the radicals.

Question. So that, comparatively speaking, Mr. Johnson is popular among them?

Answer. Yes, for the time being, just as Governor Pierpoint was when they intended to use him; but when the time came that it suited their interests they abused him. I think they will do the same with President Johnson—use him first, and abuse him afterwards.

Question. What has been the general effect of Mr. Johnson's liberal policy in granting amnesties and pardons to rebels: has it increased the respect of those people for the government of the United States, or has it diminished it?

Answer. I cannot say. Judging of the future by the past, they think that as they have got so much in the past, they may probably get more in the future. I think it has had a tendency to make them more impudent and exacting. They were very humble at first, before any pardons were granted. They felt that they deserved severe punishment, and that confiscation and other penalties would be inflicted. But as soon as they found a more lenient policy adopted, and that they were safe in their persons and property, they began to express themselves pretty freely. They are very much pleased, I suppose, with the policy of the President in pardoning them, and not confiscating their property; but they insist upon it that they should get the power over the negroes, and that their State rights should be recognized. They do not feel as though they had been treated properly at all. They call it humiliating if they do not get everything they claim. I suppose they are Union men if you let them have their own way. I have no doubt that Jefferson Davis is a Union man if he had his own way of thinking. Let his views be carried out in every particular, and I would not wonder if he was a good Union man.

Question. The Union to consist of a government subject to his power?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Is there anything else which you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1866.

Rev. Dr. Robert McMurdy sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Alexandria, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; I am a native of Kentucky. I have lived in Virginia during the war for the most part in the service of the government. I am now officiating at Christ church Alexandria. I am an Episcopal clergyman.

Question. Have you a pretty extensive acquaintance with the state of public feeling in Virginia?

Answer. I do not know how extensive it is; I am thrown more or less among the people from my vocation and position.

Question. Are you in the habit of travelling a good deal about the State?

Answer. No, sir; I cannot say that I am. My acquaintance does not extend over the State, except through persons from various parts of it. As an editor of a paper I am brought more or less in connexion with people in all parts of the country.

Question. What, generally, is the feeling among the Episcopal clergy of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. Well, sir, from my connexion with Christ church, I have had no personal intercourse with any clergymen of the church in Virginia, and therefore cannot answer the question from conversation with them. I should judge not favorably of it, however, from the action of the diocese in failing to do as Bishop Gregg, of Texas, did—that is, to act upon the theory of a de facto government, on the church theory that the church, as a church, or the clergy as clergy, cannot interfere with the question of government. Church people consider the government as de facto, and as such it is their duty to pray for that government, and to sustain it in their official and ecclesiastical relations. Bishop Gregg remarked to me a few days ago, in conversation on the subject: "I consulted nobody in regard to my action in forming a southern church, when I supposed that the confederate government was a de facto government; but the moment that the confederate government ceased to be a de facto government, I did not wait to consult the authorities of the southern church, but notified the presiding bishop of the Episcopal church in the United States that we were again in harmony with the national church." The fact that the diocese of Virginia has failed to act on this the church theory, on which the bishop of Texas acted, and on which the diocese of Virginia acted in leaving the national church, and on which every clergyman ought to act—the fact that the diocese of Virginia has failed to put itself in connexion with the national church, (the last that has failed to do so with the exception, perhaps, of South Carolina,) convinces me that there is a good deal of very decided feeling among the clergy and laity against harmonizing with the government, and cordially sustaining the same. It indicates strong feeling and sentiment among the people. This is the inference which I draw. I am told that the bishop of the diocese has been for an immediate Union, and I am satisfied that he would act promptly and decidedly were it not that he is hampered by the express action of the diocese of Virginia in convention assembled. The convention is composed of the clergymen of the diocese, and three lay delegates from each parish, so that the diocesan convention gives a fair representation of the sentiment of the church.

Question. Has there been a meeting of that convention recently?

Answer. There was a meeting at the close of last September; since that time there has been a meeting of the council, as it is called, of the Episcopal church of the Confederate States. At that council, the position of the clergy of Virginia, I am informed, was the most decided in sustaining the continuing of the council, and most opposed to any union with the national church. There is a series of articles publishing in the Southern Churchman, (issued at Alexandria, Virginia, and the main paper of the southern church,) which are vindictory of the southern church. The southern church is not satisfied with the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States being entirely silent concerning the past, but appears to be desirous of creating a sentiment sustaining their own action. The laity of the church, particularly those who have suffered by the war, widow ladies and others who have lost their children, have, in a few instances, begun to show a change of feeling, and seem now like looking at things in their true light. As an evidence of this improved feeling, some of them come to our church now; (it is the Union church of the place, the gathering point for the Union people, and has been open during the whole war.) The fact that there are some who attend that church now, is, perhaps, a pretty good evidence of a change of feeling; but they are very few, and besides the other influences to produce it, the fact that I am from Kentucky has possibly some little effect. But while this is the effect upon a few, they who are politicians, and desire to be politicians and the leaders of social life, manifest a more intensified feeling. The females, those especially whose pride has been humbled, are more intense in their bitterness and endeavor to keep up a social ostracism against Union and northern people. They who are gentlemen, and who have humane feelings, are disposed, I think, to treat the negroes with kindness, and really to consider what is best for them; but they are so few, as in every community, and are so overpowered by others, that their voice can scarcely be heard, and is not heard to any extent. The great trouble about proper composition of matters is the extensively prevailing and operative sentiment that the cause of the Union and the supporters of the Union are not respectable. The mass, for fear of losing social caste, speak and act "southern," so far as they may safely.

Question. Have you formed any opinion as to the effect of President Johnson's liberality in granting pardons and amnesties to rebels?

Answer. I think it has had, in all probability, a very injurious effect. I think that while in some cases, with the generous and open-hearted, it has had the right effect generally, men being selfish, it has had the reverse effect from that which was intended or expected by the President. I am also inclined to think that the southern people are disposed to respect power and the exercise of power, and too often mistake leniency as an evidence of weakness and not an evidence of generosity.

Question. And you think that that has been rather the prevailing influence of Mr. Johnson's liberality?

Answer. Yes, on the minds of the masses, but with some noble exceptions. When General Lee surrendered, and for a brief period thereafter, the southern people were willing to submit to any terms, short of expatriation and death, that might have been proclaimed.

Question. Can you speak in regard to the feeling generally among the other protestant clergy in Virginia?

Answer. The Baptists appear, as a whole, to be, perhaps, the most bitter, and the southern Methodists possibly come next. The southern Methodists in Virginia are modified by the leaven of the Baltimore Conference, which conference extended over the free States, and the preachers of which were in connexion with northern churches till 1861, when they formed a separate body, as it were. The Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church north, within the last few days, in conference at Alexandria, have united formally with the church south. Bishop Early, of the southern Methodist church, is now presiding. While the effect of that union will be, of course, to magnify the southern church, there is another influence that will necessarily result from it, namely: that that leaven will, perhaps, modify the feeling again so as to make it less intense. That will be so, except with those individuals who, forsaking one position and going to another, are generally in advance in zeal for their newly espoused cause, just as northern men at the south, who are disunion men, are generally intensely so. This, perhaps, applies to the present state of things among the Methodists in Virginia. There is a small body of Presbyterians in Alexandria who are true Union people; but such has been the feeling in the church that perhaps a majority of the former whole body of the old church have left the church in which they have been baptized and educated, and have associated themselves with what is called now the Second Presbyterian church—a New School Presbyterian church, reputed to be intensely disloyal—thus giving evidence of their willingness, for the sake of their notions in matters in issue for the last four years, to sacrifice even their ecclesiastical connexions. This feeling of sympathy with the south has been even shown by some of the Quakers at Alexandria, to my perfect astonishment. I learn that they are about as decided in regard to the respectability of secession as any other class of people. The Protestant Methodist church, I am told, is equally divided. The Roman Catholic church I know very little about. I think, however, that the perfect quietness of the priests, and their entire ignoring of the questions at issue, has brought out no development at all in that quarter.

Question. Do you think that, in the main, the Roman Catholic clergy of the rebel States can be called friendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. I should not like to say. My opposition to know-nothingism, as a principle, whether political or religious, led me to investigate this subject a good deal in former days. I am satisfied that the Roman Catholic clergy, as a whole, are exceedingly friendly to our institutions; but that they are so because they imagine our country affords to those who have been oppressed in Ireland a theatre in which they can best serve their church. If you mean to put the question to me, whether they would be devoted to the government as against the papal authorities—

Question. I put the question in that form.

Answer. I should say decidedly, no; because their vows, as well as their education, make obedience to the papal government their first duty. They have no home; they have no residence; the priests are the creatures of the bishops, the bishops of the archbishops, and the archbishops of the Pope; and thus the clergy are the creatures of the Pope.

Question. Suppose a contest should arise between the United States and any papal foreign power, such as Spain or France, what would be the feeling of the Catholic church?

Answer. I think that, in that case, the Catholic clergy, if there was no positive dictum from the Pope, would be for the government of the country, because the people would be, and they like to be sustained by the people where official authority does not interfere.

Question. Suppose there should be a dictum from the Pope?

Answer. I should think they would obey the papal dictum.

Question. They are very likely to obey orders from headquarters?

Answer. I think so; but at the same time I cannot conceive of such an issue.

Question. Had we not something of that kind, during the war, from the Pope, in his encyclical letter to the church in America?

Answer. That was designed for consumption in the Confederate States; that was papal buncombe—the Pope supposing the confederacy would become a nation. The papacy, however, is unquestionably opposed to human liberty and a free government; but there is yet much Catholic verity and the old Catholic love of liberty among the people in the Romish church. When the question was asked me, whether I thought the Roman Catholic clergy were friendly to the government of the United States, I did not hear the modification of the question confining it to the rebel States. I answer that the Roman Catholic clergy were, in my opinion, very unfriendly to the government of the United States, and are now, in portions of the south, proposing a monumental church, at Memphis, Tennessee, to General Polk, once a Protestant bishop.

Question. To return to the Episcopal clergy and the Episcopal church in Virginia, how do they feel in reference to the education of the freedmen?

Answer. The convention of the diocese of Virginia, embracing the clergy of the diocese, which met on the 20th of September, unanimously adopted resolutions, the purport of which was as follows:

1st. Resolved, That, as a diocese of the church, we recognize the relations which we now sustain to the colored people, and that we call on our people everywhere to do their full duty.

2d. Resolved, That to that end our parishes and clergy be requested and urged at the earliest possible moment to organize sundry schools for them, and parochial schools, that they may be taught to read, and that churches be organized for their benefit everywhere. The resolutions were full, going as far as could be wished. I also know the fact that Bishop Johns is very favorable to the education of the colored people. So was Bishop Meade, his predecessor. Dr. Sparrow, of the seminary, rejoices in the abolition of slavery, although he is a strong southern man. The churches are, however, so poor that they are incapable at present, and will be so perhaps for years, to do anything for the colored people. I ought also to state that it is impossible to induce the colored people at present to put themselves under the tuition of the churches of their former masters. Bishop Gregg remarked to me that it was the same in Texas. The entire Episcopal church of the United States, in general convention assembled, have resolved themselves unanimously into a freedmen's commission, so that they have their foreign missions, their domestic missions, and now they have added to those a specific freedmen's commission, in which the whole church takes part. This, however, may be perhaps an ecclesiastical idea, an idea that there is no class of people who may not come under the fostering care of the church, especially the poor, whether white or black. It has nothing to do with the questions that have grown up lately.

Question. You speak of the indisposition of the freedmen to submit themselves to the instruction of the church; do you mean of the Episcopal church particularly?

Answer. No, sir; not particularly.

Question. What does that indisposition arise from?

Answer. I suppose it is a prejudice created in their minds by the previous state of things. They do not think that these churches and bodies have voluntarily and earnestly gone into the advocacy of their rights. They suppose it is simply a matter growing out of church ideas, and not growing out of a heartfelt desire to advance their interests, beyond their interests in a religious point of view, and poor people are especially disposed to regard their minds and souls through the body.

Question. You think that the colored people rather prefer to have their own churches and their own religious instructors?

Answer. While I think they do so at present, I think there is a disposition to advance. I have a service myself on Friday nights for colored people, a special service for them, although they are welcome to my church at all times, and I have met with some encouragement. On Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock I go out occasionally to the Soldiers' Rest, in connexion with agents sent from the north, and address the colored people, and I always find them very much disposed to learn, docile and remarkably anxious to do right. I have seen a great disposition on their part to improve.

Question. You have always lived in the midst of blacks, have you not?

Answer. I have, sir, for nearly thirty years.

Question. And, of course, you have observed them in all their comings and doings?

Answer. Yes; I was in the empire of Brazil for two years. I have also been in the West India islands, and in the south.

Question. You have endeavored to notice what amount of capacity they possess for the acquisition of knowledge generally; have you given especial attention to that?

Answer. I have had more or less to do with education all my life.

Question. So that you are able to present some comparison between the capacity of blacks and that of whites for the acquisition of knowledge?

Answer. Possibly so.

Question. I wish you to state your ideas on that subject?

Answer. In regard to pursuits where imitation is concerned the blacks excel the whites.

Question. You think so?

Answer. Yes; most unquestionably. They learn to read more rapidly, they learn to write more rapidly, and they make better writers. They learn music by ear more rapidly. In short, they acquire everything more rapidly than whites where imitativeness is brought into requisition. But where ratiocination is concerned, where the powers of logic or the powers of induction are concerned, where reasoning is concerned, where mathematics come in, and not mere arithmetic, they are very inferior to the whites. Where mere arithmetic is concerned, adding more rapidly, subtracting, and simple operations, they perform them more accurately than the whites, and their results are more reliable, but are less so where there is complexity and where the logical powers of mind are brought to bear. The slighter association is vastly superior in the black, but the severer association is vastly inferior.

Question. And the result in your opinion would be that they are probably not so far-seeing as the whites?

Answer. No; certainly not.

Question. Are they as provident in their nature?

Answer. No, sir; necessarily not; of course they are not; the blacks are docile. John Wesley, speaking of the blacks in connexion with slavery, said that, were it not for their remarkable docility, they could not be kept in slavery. Their very physical succession, the circumstances under which they have been always placed, their education, all combined, have made them improvident and careless. The black had no motive to save; his motive was to eat and drink and wear out all that he could, provided there was prospect of more, and to have everything he could in the way of enjoyment; he thought it perfectly right to steal from his master, because he regarded it as partly his own, although he would be conscientious about objecting to others stealing from his master; he would protect his master's interests so far as others were concerned, but not so far as he himself was concerned.

Question. He would steal his master's pigs and chickens when he got hungry?

Answer. Yes; the blacks are necessarily improvident, but I see no reason why they may not grow into a provident people under care and protection.

Question. Do they seem to possess a love of money and property to a degree as high as that which characterizes white men?

Answer. No, sir; they appear to love enjoyment, and I think they love spiritual enjoyment first; I use that word in its liberal, not in its theological, sense. I think they love the "spirituelle," as the French say.

Question. They love mental emotions?

Answer. Yes, sir. Dividing the human being into three parts—mind, body, and spirit—I will say in regard to the mind, that they are exceedingly anxious to learn, like children; and my idea is that all children are anxious to learn; and it requires teachers and parents, by their ignorance and want of knowledge of the human mind, to repress all that desire for knowledge which now freshly springs up in their infantile minds; they are really disposed, like children, to learn, and are very anxious to do so. Government and the church and community may, by injudicious measures, repress this.

Question. Are they possessed of much of that quality which we call political ambition?

Answer. I think not; I think they are perfectly regardless of it; as a very rare exception, there are those who possess it. I think they desire to be citizens, as a matter of growing self-respect, as securing their domestic and personal rights, and as calculated to elevate them in the scale of society; they would like to say who shall control their destiny, but they do not care to control it themselves if they have good agents to control it for them. Free negroes voted in North Carolina up to 1835, and it was said that those districts in which there were most blacks always sent the brightest minds to Congress. I found the same to be the case in Brazil, where blacks hold office. It is provided in their constitution that no black man can hold office, yet the public sentiment has actually changed the meaning of the word so that the word "black" means "slave," and "white" means "free," whether a man be black or white. Here there is a fair illustration of the whole question. There is no prejudice against mere color now. You find black men holding the office of juiz do paz, or justice of the peace, an officer having more extensive duties to perform than a justice of the peace in this country. Black men are favorite priests there, and they are becoming the mental power of the nation, simply because they are disposed (especially the mulattoes) to do more work than the whites. It is not because they are ambitious, but because the whites put the mental work upon them just as they put their physical work upon slaves. That, I think, is the true point of the matter.

Question. Do you discover often among them what we call the governing power, the capacity to control men?

Answer. Occasionally; it is developing; it does not occur often. But the best persons to manage the blacks of the south are those blacks who have the capacity to control, for they have so much suavity, so much gentleness with them, and their effort to govern is not so much by force as by expedients and tact; blacks have always succeeded most handsomely when they had that power. On the old plantations in Kentucky and Virginia the blacks have never been governed by the rod; they have been governed by tact and stratagem on the part of the whites; it has been a struggle of stratagem against stratagem; it has been a strategic warfare going on all the time in the more northerly of the slave States—those nearest to the border. This has cultivated, on the part of the blacks, stratagem and cunning to the extent we find it there; and this shows how little danger there is from their desire to govern.

Question. You know, of course, to a certain extent, what is the general feeling among the masses of the secession people of Virginia. What would they be likely to do in the event of a foreign war between the United States and such a government as England or France, provided they saw, or thought they saw, a good opportunity to establish southern independence?

Answer. In that case, especially if they could secure their independence, I do not think there is any doubt at all about the course they would take. I think they would do anything in the world by which that could be secured. I do not think, however, that the southern people have any idea that there is any possibility, even the remotest, of anything occurring through which they can do anything but submit. I think it is universally the feeling that there is no hope and no help for them in this regard. Physically, they are perfectly humbled. It is impossible to make their physical humiliation more complete than it is. A lady recently remarked to a friend of mine, "You cannot expect us to treat the northern people well who come here, or to have any intercourse with them. They have humiliated us, and we cannot buy, or sell, or have any intercourse with them." I can see no hope of an improvement in that respect except by the gradual operation of those causes which are above all opposition—commercial causes, the operation of trade, the demand for capital to come from the north, the emigration of persons from the north moving southward, the moving of southern people to distant points and colonizing and getting into new scenes and under new circumstances. I look for the gradual operation of these causes. I do not see why the south should witness any different results than those which Italy witnessed in the case of her northern conquerors, and which England witnessed in the case of the Normans. The Normans were the better people and went in with the Saxons, controlling the language and institutions of the people; but the masses of the people adhered to the Saxon, and it took many years to effect the coalescing. So with the south. The people of the south esteem themselves a superior people. Northern men going among them with more activity, more business relations, with less luxury, will control in some departments; and there will be dissimilarity until time and the various causes, that are operating in spite of everything, produce homogeneity. There is no miracle to be wrought in this case. Time and nature's laws, not mere legislation of any kind, can effect it. There must be patient waiting. If I were a secessionist; if I had gone with the people of the south; if I had taken the same view of matters which they took; if my judgment, conviction, and conscience had not been all against them; if my church education and my education by my forefathers had not influenced me against them; if, in short, I had taken the course they adopted, I would do just precisely as they are doing; if it were a matter of principle, I should, of course, abide by the principle, and should esteem it something more than even dollars and cents, and political power, and home, and everything else.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I do not know what you wish to find out. If my testimony is to be printed, I should like to have it full enough, so that one part may explain the other. Therefore, while I am not anxious to testify, except so far as may do good, I should be glad to have you probe the matter further.

Question. Doctor, you are a man of reflection, thought, education, and experience. What is your idea as to the ultimate condition of the blacks at the south? What will be their destiny and fate, taking into consideration all the causes that now exist and those that you may foresee?

Answer. Giving my opinion off-hand, I am inclined to think that the immediate result will be a great struggle, which struggle, on the part of the blacks, will have the effect of giving them more character. God designs that people shall grow strong through suffering. This suffering will make the blacks strong and vigorous; will give them a different position from that which they could possibly have had if they were taken care of as mere children. As slaves they would be always children. They have got to grow into men by being allowed, to a great extent, to work out their own destiny. I conceive that the great policy of the government should be simply to protect these people in their rights, and let them be perfectly free to work out the results just as white people work out results. I think that there is danger to them in doing too much for them. I think that the effect of it will be to keep them children. I think that the great policy of the Freedmen's Bureau should be to keep its eye on that point, not to do so much itself, but to help the blacks to do for themselves. I believe that this struggle will be gone through with. I then reason that, after the struggle is passed, and after these blacks are prepared by God's providence, through this very process for their own legitimate work, they will then find their way over to the islands, by the laws of commercial colonization, and from the islands to Africa, and I think I see through it all the regeneration and salvation of a continent. I prepared some views on commercial colonization, which were published at the commencement of the war. I then said:

"Commercial colonization we think preferable to any other, because it relies upon the immutable law of demand and supply—that to the point of demand for laborers will laborers be attracted. It will save the government of the United States the expense of transporting the blacks; it will permit direct intercourse and treaty with the States, as well as with the general government; it will save the expense of maintaining colonies and protectorates; it will cause the coalescing of the blacks of our country with those of their own race living under laws long tested and adapted to their condition.

"The laws of political economy and the considerations suggested point strongly to the West Indies, for a brief period, as the home of the greater part of the blacks, forming a mighty breakwater of an island empire against the attacks upon us from the Old World, if we make the colored race our friends.

"The northern States are not inclined to receive the negroes. They cannot go in great numbers to Africa, for Africa is not prepared to receive them, and humanity would revolt at their being left to perish on her ill-fated shore, or to retrograde into barbarism. To maintain many governments or colonial protectorates would be burdensome.

"Central America, while transportation to this point would be cheaper than to Africa, is on the highway for the whites from the east to the west, and the blacks ought to be removed from their incursions and example. Territory must also be here purchased, a government created, laws made, and all the incidents of pioneer colonization again and again repeated.

"To send them to the West Indies would cost infinitely less in transportation and less in early subsistence. It would involve the purchase of no territory and the creation of no protectorate. They would, in their island home, be freer from incursions, in a climate more salubrious, and in a more favorable commercial locality.

"The governments of the islands are better suited to the negroes in their infantile condition, and, being distributed among the islands, they would readily coalesce and become a homogeneous people, without the evils attendant upon colonization in a new country.

"Immigration to America in 1851 amounted to 500,000 souls for that year, and to 1860 varied from this number to 150,000 per annum. It will take but a few years to transport all the slaves to the islands and replenish them with free white laborers at this rate.

"Hayti has a population of 34 to a square mile; Jamaica, 75; Trinidad, 30; the Windward islands, 265; the Leeward islands, 230; the French, 300; the Dutch islands, 500; the Danish islands, 30; the Swedish island, 350 persons to a square mile. Among the Windward islands, Barbadoes has 900 persons to a square mile; the others, with nearly equal capacity, only 100 to a square mile. In the Leeward islands, Bahamas have only 5 to a square mile, yet with a capacity for hundreds. Jamaica has 75 to a square mile, and wants more laborers. Massachusetts has 170 persons to a square mile; Rhode Island, 150; New Jersey, 100. Leaving out of consideration the superior fertility of the islands, their tropical character, and their capacity for population, to an extent not to be equalled in the northern States, according to the ratio above, Hayti can take 1½ million more, and then only be equal to Jamaica—take all our blacks, and then not equal Massachusetts or New Jersey in density of population; compared with the Windward islands, it could take 7,000,000. According to the estimate above, the West Indies can take 12,000,000 colonists, and then not equal Maryland, with 65 persons to a square mile.

"New York has a population of 3,100,000, and 47,000 square miles; the islands, 100,000 square miles, and a population of 3,500,000. The islands contain more than twice as many square miles as New York, with but one-half of her population. Thus they can take all our blacks, and then not equal New York in population.

"In the foregoing remarks we must not be understood to have any but the most friendly feelings to the colonies of Africa or the American Colonization Society. Let the colonies have all they can take care of, the 2,000 specified by one of the secretaries, this year, and the 5,000 for next year, and so on. Africa must be redeemed, and West India colonization will only help on the work. The remark of the great William Pitt will be realized. He said: 'We may live to behold the nations of Africa engaged in the calm occupations of industry, and in the pursuit of a just and legitimate commerce. We may behold the beams of science and philosophy breaking in upon their land, which at some happier period, in still later times, may blaze with full lustre, and joining their influence to that of pure religion, may illuminate and invigorate the most distant extremities of that immense continent.'

"It has been by commercial colonization that the Germans and Irish came to our shores, not by being sent over here by the governments of the Old World. There was a greater demand here for their labor and less competition in labor. So when we do not need the labor of the blacks, when there is greater demand elsewhere, as there soon will be in the West Indies and in Africa, the blacks will defray their own colonization there, and just as fast as there is such demand. God's laws obeyed by all, all will be at peace and happy and prosperous."

These views were adopted and printed by the Committee on Emancipation in the House of Representatives, and I was appointed by the President to go to Hayti for the purpose of carrying out these views in the islands, and to open negotiations with the southern States directly. It was not that I expected anything from it except to show the people that there was an outlet for the blacks, and that they might be taken off if necessary, (not that I desired or favored it, but as a political idea.) I have no doubt that that is to be the result. I have been in Africa, and in the West India islands, and in Brazil, and although I was a mere boy, comparatively, when in Brazil, I kept a record of all the slave vessels coming in with slaves and going out in ballast. My attention was early called to these matters, and I am inclined to think that that will be the result, though it is not a result that I would attempt to secure.

Question. Then you rather look to a gradual exodus of the black race from the country?

Answer. Yes, sir, by its own voluntary act. I should not favor that exodus at present. I should prefer to retain the blacks. I regard them as essential to the present prosperity of the country. It is to me a beautiful idea of the results of God's providence in this whole matter, not justifying the ways of man, but justifying the ways of God. I think there should be a kind feeling kept up everywhere. While any forced colonization should be opposed by the government, still I think there should be an entente cordiale created between all the black peoples of this country and the world, as a matter of elevated and statesmanlike diplomacy. I may remark in this connexion that the President eventually appointed Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, as commissioner, and the matter hung in the Senate. This whole matter can be adjusted to the interests and feeling of all without the intervention of Congress, and without the expenditure of public money. The principles of commercial colonization will regulate it. While it is desirable that the blacks should remain here for many years, on account of their importance to the industrial interests of the country, still causes in operation, commercial causes, will eventually lead them to seek homes elsewhere. These causes are aided by the temperament and habits of the blacks, which it will take many years to eradicate and change. Being brought into competition with the more active, energetic labor of the nervous whites, the blacks will naturally find egress to homes where they will have less nervous competition. Thus will the prejudice of the white man be relieved, and the whole conduce to the development of the islands of the ocean and the waste places of Africa. It appears to me that God designs in his providence that the colored people shall remain here longer and free until they have become, thus aided by the sufferings through which they must pass, valuable and useful to the immense African world lying in darkness. The colored people of the south ought to be simply protected in the exercise of their full personal rights, but should be inured to struggle and labor as the natural antecedents of strength and success. It is impossible, even if it were desirable, to make of the north a grand eleemosynary institution. The immediate sufferings of the south should be alleviated by philosophical, Christian, earnest minds, who understand the people of the south and the blacks of the south, and who at the same time are their devoted friends, and are unquestioned in their loyalty to the government.

Question. What is your idea in reference to the willingness of the people at the south to pay the national debt?

Answer. I answer, that the south will not consent, if they can help it, to pay any portion of the public debt created to humiliate them, as they say. Not only that, but they will endeavor, as far as they are able, some way or other, to have the country pay all their debt, whether State or confederate. Their struggle now is to preserve as much of the respectability of secession as they can, and they will do it in every way they can, without bringing themselves into conflict with the government. They will do all they can for themselves, and as little as possible for the north. This is human nature. This is to be expected. They do not profess conversion to the principles and cause of the federal government. They do not profess to be sorry for their course in the war. They regret that they did not succeed. They submit to the laws as far as is necessary, and mean to have these laws as palatable as possible to them. All they can effect politically, socially, and ecclesiastically, they will. They have no more use for bullets. They henceforth use the social, the ecclesiastical, and the political ballot.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1866.

Lieutenant W. L. Chase sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What is your official position?

Answer. I am on duty as assistant superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau, in Culpeper county, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. No, sir; of the State of New York.

Question. How long have you been on duty in Culpeper county?

Answer. Since the 20th of December last.

Question. Have you been in command there?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How do the secessionists down there feel toward the government of the United States?

Answer. They feel very bitter and very sore.

Question. How do they treat you?

Answer. Officially they treat me very politely; but behind my back they are very different; they are two-faced.

Question. You think they look one way and row another way sometimes?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is it exactly.

Question. How do they treat the freedmen?

Answer. They do not want to give the freedmen much of a chance; and if it were not for some of us being there I do not think the freedmen would have any show of justice at all.

Question. Would not the Unionists down there be perfectly tranquil and happy in case the troops were withdrawn?

Answer. There are very few Unionists there.

Question. Would the withdrawal of troops increase their security and tranquillity?

Answer. No, sir; it is just the opposite, in my experience.

Question. In case of the withdrawal of the troops, would you anticipate scenes of violence towards the Unionists, towards the people who are loyal?

Answer. I only know of one or two who are loyal.

Question. Do you mean to say that, substantially, the whole of the white people down there are secessionists and rebels?

Answer. From my experience I believe they are just as strong rebels to-day as they were at the beginning of the war. A few of them are disposed to take the thing as it is.

Question. State whether you hear any expressions of disloyalty or discontent against the government of the United States.

Answer. I have had a good many conversations with citizens. I had one gentleman tell me that if the government of the United States went to war with any foreign country the south would go with that foreign country in preference to the Union. I would like to say that on my arrival at Culpeper I found twelve men of the 11th Maine. They have since been withdrawn, and mustered out. Since that time the people, as a general thing—certain classes of them—have grown very turbulent, and threaten sometimes; but their threats do not amount to much.

Question. Do they use insolent expressions towards you and your little force?

Answer. I have no force there now. I am entirely alone. I hear of them. I have been insulted twice. Both parties were drunk. The first time the party came and apologized. The next time the man was of such a low character that I paid no attention to it. An officer without troops is liable to insult at any time. I have sometimes gone out of my way to avoid collisions. There is a class of young men, returned from the army, and who have been with Mosby, who are very bitter against the government, and who are lying around bar-rooms.

Question. They are not a very industrious portion of the population?

Answer. No; there are very few people there who are industrious.

Question. Is it not chiefly that kind of persons who cry out against the negro, and protest that he will not work?

Answer. Yes, sir; there are a great many farmers who tell me that; but there are others who tell me differently. I cannot place a great deal of confidence in what any one tells me, because they are all apparently of one opinion there.

Question. I suppose they all say that they "accept the situation?"

Answer. Yes; they often come to me and want to have a confidential talk with me. They say, "We are good Union people. We never voted for secession. We were forced into this." Still they will go right away and talk differently with their own people.

Question. And glory in having taken part in the rebellion?

Answer. Yes; glory in having assisted the rebellion.

Question. What has become of Mosby?

Answer. The last I heard of him was at Warrenton, where he was practicing law.

Question. In case of war between the United States and a foreign power, what side would these men espouse, do you think?

Answer. I think that a great many of those who entertain these bitter sentiments would go with the foreign country in preference to the United States. My views were in accordance with those of Mr. Johnson when I went there, believing that his policy in reference to reconstruction of the States was just; but, from my experience, I am inclined to be very radical.

Question. What do you think has really been the effect of that liberal policy on the minds and hearts of secessionists there?

Answer. I think it has been the cause of their demanding what they had no right to demand, and of making them more bitter towards the government generally, especially to the people of the north.

Question. Does it make them more outspoken and insolent in their language towards the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes; I believe it does, from what I can learn. After the fall of Richmond and the surrender of Lee's army, people were in a state of terror. They expected almost total annihilation. They found out that nothing of that kind was going to happen; and they turned right around.

Question. Do they not respect the laws of the United States down there?

Answer. They do not like to if they can avoid it. Anything in the shape of military authority they do not like to obey.

Question. Still they have a certain degree of respect for the northern bayonet?

Answer. They are very much afraid of the military?

Question. How do they feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. Certain classes feel very bitter towards them; but the farmers, who cannot get labor otherwise, are very desirous of retaining them. It is policy with them. They use policy, of course, but they are not willing to give them their just rights as laborers. I would state, in extenuation for these people, that the country has been very much devastated. While General Meade's army wintered there in 1863-'64, the timber was cut down, and a great many houses burned and torn down.

Question. His encampment down there, I suppose, was evidenced afterwards by numerous chimney stacks?

Answer. Yes, sir; a great many.

Question. How do these fellows down there talk about the war?

Answer. They glory in the success which they did have—that with a small army they held out so long. A good many of them deprecate the idea of ever giving up. Others—quite a number of young men who have never taken the amnesty oath—feel very sore towards the north, and believe still that they were right in fighting for the south.

Question. Do you think that a great many of them would, if they had a chance, fight again against the United States?

Answer. Not so many; a great many have got tired of facing the music.

Question. They do not think that war is quite as jolly a sport as they did at the beginning of it?

Answer. Not exactly. There is a very bitter feeling, though, against the government. They tell me that they are willing to come in under President Johnson's ideas. They say that they have done all that the government required of them, and now they want to come in and have representation. They are taxed, and they want representation with taxation.

Question. Suppose it were left to these people down there to say whether the confederate rebel debt should be paid; how would they vote upon that question?

Answer. I believe they would vote to pay it.

Question. Suppose the question was submitted to them whether or not they would pay the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war; how would they vote on that question?

Answer. They would not want to pay it. As an instance, Mr. Stiles, the collector, was there collecting the direct tax of 1863; they were very much opposed to paying it, and a great many refused to pay it, saying that the government had no right to tax them for the year 1863. They claimed that they were not under the control of the government of the United States at that time.

Question. Well, they paid their taxes, did they not?

Answer. Yes, sir, a great many of them paid; but it was a very sore thing for them to do. A northern man is not called anything respectable there.

Question. He is not received into society, is he?

Answer. Well, to a certain extent he is.

Question. Is he invited into good families on social occasions?

Answer. I cannot complain of my treatment there. I have had invitations to go to some of the first families, as they call themselves, but I have not availed myself of the privilege, because my duties require my attendance.

Question. How much force have you at Culpeper?

Answer. None at all; I am alone.

Question. You constitute the army stationed at Culpeper?

Answer. Yes, sir; the force has been taken away from all the counties. The nearest force to me is, I believe, one company of regulars at Charlottesville, about fifty miles below, on the Orange and Alexandria railroad.

Question. Do they seem to feel in terror of so formidable an army of occupation as Lieutenant Chase composes down there?

Answer. They are afraid, because I let them know that they must do so-and-so, and must obey the instructions I receive, or else I should report them. But they still do a great many things which I do not know anything about, and which are kept from my ears. I believe that a military force is absolutely necessary down there. There is one loyal man there who is a resident and landholder, but who left when Meade's army left. He is looked down upon by the citizens, and is persecuted to some extent. He is a bricklayer and builder. He was a bachelor, and had a colored woman as housekeeper. The people claim that he is living openly with that woman. He defies them to prove anything of the kind, and I do not believe myself that he is. He is a man thirty-five or forty years of age, a very industrious man, a Swiss by birth, and who refused to take the oath of allegiance to the rebel confederacy, and was obliged to leave when Meade's army left. He is the only resident I know who is truly Union. A great many of them take the oath of allegiance, but I do not think that the oath amounts to much with a great many of them. Some have taken it in good faith.

Question. Are the whites inclined to go to work and repair their fortunes?

Answer. Some are, but others are lying around and bewailing their lot and cursing the Yankees.

Question. Is the latter class very numerous?

Answer. I think they predominate over the other class.

Question. Do you think of anything else which you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. No; except it is that I think it is necessary to have troops to carry out the instructions imposed upon officers by the Freedmen's Bureau, and to keep the peace and preserve order. I had a shooting case in my county the week before last. I bound the parties over to appear before such court as the commanding officer of the State of Virginia might designate. A woman was shot. It was a very peculiar case. She had slandered the family of the man, and in the excitement of the moment, being a very passionate man, he had shot her in the head. His son came in two hours afterwards intoxicated and beat the woman with a pistol on the head and stabbed her. That is her own statement. I took the testimony and forwarded it to the proper authority.

Question. Was any question of Unionism or secessionism connected with that case?

Answer. The woman was a freedwoman—a black woman. She had been a servant in the family, and had said something which was very bad about the family, but it was through jealousy of the servants that it came to the ears of the ladies of the house.

Question. Was the man who shot her a white man?

Answer. The person who shot her was one of the citizens of the county—a very prominent citizen—Dr. Perry.

Question. Are not the civil rights of the people there protected in the State courts?

Answer. I do not think that a loyal man could get his rights in the courts, there is such a prejudice against refugees and against the northern men.

Question. Do you think that prejudice would affect the mind of the court and jury?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think it would.

Question. Do they like to have northern men come and settle among them?

Answer. They tell me that they would like it; but on inquiry I find that northern men have been there to buy land, and that the people refuse to sell because they do not want any Yankees, as they call us, among them. They think that after awhile we might gain the balance of power. I read Carl Schurz's report to the President, and I thought it came nearer the true state of affairs than anything I had seen. Persons travelling there from the north, officially, are very apt to have smooth tales told them.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to say?

Answer. No, sir; except that I believe the rebellion is not crushed yet.

Question. You believe that there wasn't fighting enough after all.

Answer. I believe more in subjugation now than I did ever before.

Question. What were your politics before you went into the army?

Answer. I was a Lincoln man; that is, I believed in Mr. Lincoln's ideas of Republicanism.

Question. Were you ever an abolitionist?

Answer. No, sir; never.

Question. You were an old democrat.

Answer. I inherited from my father what is called the old Hunker democratic principles, but after I became old enough to think for myself I cast them aside. I became what is called a Native American, and attached myself to that party. I was in Illinois at the time that Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Douglas were canvassing the State, and I then became a supporter of Mr. Lincoln's.

Question. Are you a citizen of Illinois now?

Answer. No, sir; New York is my native State.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1866.

Dale Carter sworn and examined:

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Russell county, Virginia, in the extreme southwest part of the State, between Tennessee and Kentucky.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir, I was born there, and have remained there a great part of the time since.

Question. Do you hold any public office in Virginia?

Answer. I am the senator from that district in the Virginia senate.

Question. Have you a pretty general acquaintance with the people of Virginia?

Answer. I was in the convention assembled to frame the constitution in 1850-'51, which formed the constitution of the State previous to the Alexandria constitution; then I have been in the legislature of Virginia; I was in the legislature in 1857-'58; I was then in the house of delegates; I am now in the senate. I can say that I have a tolerable acquaintance with the people of Virginia.

Question. What is the general feeling among that class of the people of Virginia who have been hitherto known as secessionists (I call them secessionists for brevity's sake) towards the government of the United States?

Answer. So far as I am informed on that subject I know of no man anywhere in that quarter who desires to encourage anything like the doctrine of secession. On the contrary, I think that all are heartily tired of any resistance to the government of the United States in any form or shape.

Question. Do they generally feel friendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. I think so, except this fact—that the people, those who pretend to examine into and know anything about the matter at all, complain some that they are not allowed into the possession of their original rights, the right of representation, &c. They think, as they say, that they are at present toward the government of the United States as they should be, and that they ought to be reinstated, and that the government ought not to suspect them from anything they have done at all since the surrender.

Question. How are the Unionists proper—I mean those who have been steadfast in their attachment to the government of the United States during the war and before the war—how are they treated generally by the secessionists?

Answer. The offices are nearly all filled by Unionists; that is, by men who incline that way, and who never gave sanction to the rebellion, but who were opposed to it very often. Out of prudence, men said nothing; I was one of that description myself, I said little and had very little to do with the matter. I was over age. I have been a whig since 1824. Still, when the south went off in mass in that way, men were compelled to join in the movement or be silent.

Question. Have you heard of any scenes of violence that have occurred between old Unionists and secessionists since the war, growing out of disputations about politics?

Answer. I have heard of nothing of the kind, except this: I live in the vicinity of where that class of men who were called secessionists have almost all been banished by the original Union men. There was a good deal of violence at one time in East Tennessee on the part of secessionists, and that made some bitter enemies among the Unionists, because they banished some of them. I believe they did; at any rate this thing reverted in the other direction, and these Union men have got possession of the country again, and have expelled a great many of those who were once secessionists. However, there is no taking up of arms or anything of that kind, because these secessionists have pretty generally left there or tried to conceal themselves. In the State of Kentucky, on the other side of me, where, except those who came out and joined the army, they attempted to be neutral, and did not want to have anything to do with the war at all, in any way, they are perfectly quiet. In the State of Virginia, however, we have had nothing of that kind. I am very well acquainted with the State of Virginia, from where I live to Cumberland Gap. Whenever the war ceased everybody seemed to want to get rid of it, to be done with it, and to return to the Union; when I say everybody, I think I may use that strong expression, almost everybody, at least, desired it. The truth is, that the war was gotten up and forced upon the masses of the people in that region by a few persons. That region of country is not, or was not, a very slaveholding region. They cared very little about slaves, except a few men. Therefore the masses regarding the war as a war somewhat about slavery, were not disposed to join the movement at all, if they could help it. A great many were brought into it in that way, and a great many were not brought into it at all. I live in a district which was not very loyal to secessionism.

Question. How are northern men treated in that part of Virginia who come there to settle?

Answer. I do not think any have come there; if they have, I do not recollect it; but I will say more: if they were to come there they would be received and treated kindly. There are large landholders in that part of the country who are anxious to encourage immigration. I am one of them; I am trying to get northern men to come into my neighborhood. There is no hostility towards northern men there; I can say that in truth.

Question. How do they regard the abolition of slavery?

Answer. I can say in truth that they have given up slavery.

Question. And do not expect to reinstate it?

Answer. Never, sir; I can say most positively, so far as my acquaintance goes, that they have no hopes or desires at all ever there they would be received and treated kindly.

Question. How do they generally treat the emancipated blacks?

Answer. I was a slaveholder to the amount of about thirty-eight or thirty-nine slaves. My neighbors and myself, so far as my acquaintance went, had a sort of common understanding, perhaps owing to the proclamation issued by Governor Peirpoint, that the negroes were free, and we kept our negroes in this way a long while, until they became so thoroughly aware of their condition, and until everybody became so well informed of their condition that they were told, "Here you are as free as I am. I will keep you as you have been living with me, if you stay." Some would say, "If you stay with me I will pay you wages." Others would say, "If you do not stay with me as you have been staying I cannot keep you at all." A great many did leave their old homes. The negroes seemed to get it into their heads that they would not be free unless they left where they had been living; they seemed to regard it that they were only then free. None of my acquaintances have since had any slaves. About the 1st of August my negroes and myself had a sort of treaty on the subject, and they agreed to stay with me until the harvest was over; they told me that they would lease my lands; I did lease land to three of them; they were going on to prepare houses, and I was to aid them in preparing log-cabins to live in and in fencing some land to cultivate, which was clear, and other land which they could clear and open up; but an acquaintance of mine induced my negroes to believe that they could do better about fifteen miles up the country, and they left and went up there; they are now leasing lands up there and intend to farm it. In fact, it was a brother-in-law of my own to whose lands they went; he had a large tract of country and owned slaves, about as many as I did; I do not know whether his own negroes rented land from him, but mine went up there and rented land from him, and are there yet. I have one old woman and two small children (colored) who have staid at my house, and are there yet; but they are as free as I am, and are so treated.

Question. The rest will probably come back to you?

Answer. I believe so; I think they will come back whenever they can better their condition by doing so.

Question. How do the whites feel in that section of the country in reference to the education of freedmen—is there any repugnance to it?

Answer. None at all, if it could be done without expense to them. If the blacks could do it themselves, or if it could be done by any other authority, the whites have no objection to it; but at the same time the country is so ground down that they cannot educate their own children.

Question. And they would therefore feel an unwillingness to contribute out of their own funds to educate the freedmen?

Answer. They would, I think, because they do not consider themselves able to do it.

Question. Suppose that particular difficulty were removed, and that they were in possession of their property, as ordinarily, would they be willing then to assist in the education of the freedmen by a general tax upon property?

Answer. Well, now, sir, I cannot answer that question whether they would or not; perhaps if the tax were a general one—one on whites and blacks both.

Question. Suppose it were imposed on whites and blacks both?

Answer. I do not know; I cannot say what change that might produce, nor can I say that the whites are opposed to educating them at all, except, as I said before, they do not feel able to educate even their own children. There are no schools in the country, and there is very little personal property in the country; fences are burned a great deal and destroyed; the country is in a desolate and unproductive condition everywhere.

Question. Would a person who should come among them and undertake to become an instructor of the freedmen be treated with respect by the whites, provided his character was good?

Answer. Well, now, I cannot answer that either. As I said before, if a teacher was sent there to teach them in a free school, I do not think there would be any objection to it by the people.

Question. Would they receive the teacher of a colored school into society, provided he was worthy of it in other respects?

Answer. I cannot say about that.

Question. You think there is some doubt about it?

Answer. There might be. I dare say that, in some places, remarks would be made about it, particularly if the expenses of the schools had to be defrayed by the white men of the country. If it could be done by taxes levied upon property common to whites and blacks, I do not think they would make any objection. As to the fact that the man was a teacher of colored people, I do not think that would make much difference to the people. However, I live where there never have been a great many slaves, and I am speaking now of what I know about the sentiments of my own acquaintances in my own district.

Question. Have not a large proportion of the members of the Virginia legislature, now in session, been elected by the votes of secessionists?

Answer. Well, sir, I suppose that a majority of them were so elected. I suppose that they were almost all elected by a majority of secession votes, because there were a majority of secession voters almost everywhere in the State. But although the voters themselves were once secessionists, they were not so when they voted for members of the present legislature.

Question. Have you not actually in the legislature of Virginia a large proportion of secessionists?

Answer. I do not think so at all.

Question. I mean men whose political proclivities were decidedly in favor of southern independence at any time?

Answer. I do not know that I can answer that. I can say this—that so far as my acquaintance goes in the Virginia legislature the members are pretty much of the character of men which I described myself to be—men who were not actively engaged in the war at all, and who kept out of it as much as they could.

Question. Have you not in the legislature some members, either in the senate or house of delegates, who actually took part in the rebellion on behalf of the rebels?

Answer. Yes, sir; but they took the oaths required by the reformed government of Virginia.

Question. What proportion of such members do you fancy are in the legislature?

Answer. There are very few of them. I do not know so much about the lower house; but I know that in the senate the members are men who were principally over age, and did not take any part any way in the war. As to the house of delegates, so far as I know, I cannot say that a majority of them were men who took an active part at any time in the rebellion. I can say that some of them were, and that some of them were men who took an active part the other way.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that any portion of the people of Virginia, of the influential classes, still entertain the project of southern independence and ultimate secession?

Answer. I have not any such impression. I do not believe any such idea is entertained in the south. I have no idea of it. I have been in the legislature since the first Monday in December, and I have no thought that the remotest idea of that sort exists in Virginia anywhere. You hear it from the speakers on all occasions, and you hear it in conversation everywhere, that slavery is at an end, and that secessionism is at an end, that the south has been badly whipped, and that they give it up, and are determined to be loyal.

Question. They consider that the question has been settled by the sword?

Answer. Yes, sir. These are the sentiments I hear uttered.

Question. How do they talk—I mean those who were advocates of secession, the preachers of the doctrine, and the dialecticians who have talked to the people on the subject? How do they regard now the abstract question of the right of a State to secede and withdraw?

Answer. That is a question which you hardly ever hear discussed. Men say nothing about it, because no issue can be ever made about it again, as they think, and never will.

Question. You do not think it ever will be?

Answer. I do not believe it ever will be in the United States. There is no other matter of controversy which can, as it seems to me, bring up any such state of things, the slavery question being disposed of. It seems to me that there is no other question which can produce any very material difference in the various sections of the country. And when I say that men seceded and advocated the doctrine of secession I must be permitted to say that at the time a great many of them thought it was right; they thought that the State had the power to secede; they had heard so much of their State-rights doctrine preached to them that they believed it, and they believed that the government itself had not given them their rights under the Constitution, and therefore they went into the movement. But those disputes about what the government had done and was doing were almost altogether in relation to slaves, so that when you give up slavery the whole thing is at an end; and that we are willing to do, I think.

Question. You have, of course, given a great deal of thought and reflection to the causes of the rebellion on the part of the south. Do you think that the great cause of making war upon the United States was a fear on the part of the southern people that they should lose their slaves by the action of Congress?

Answer. I do, sir, think so, and I will tell you why I think so. Politicians would argue in this way: the government has done this, and the government has done that, and this thing will be carried on to an extreme which will amount to this. For instance, these personal liberty bills that were passed in the States all over the country had a powerful effect in producing that impression. I would say further, in relation to that matter, that I believe that it was that almost alone that made them go into the movement at the time they did.

Question. They intended to save slavery by withdrawing from the Union?

Answer. I have no doubt that the south did.

Question. Suppose this contemplated amendment to the Constitution should pass which fixes the basis of representation according to the number of persons in each State, but declares that where a State shall refuse the right of suffrage to any person on account of race or color, then the whole number of people of that race shall be deducted from the number which forms the basis of representation, is it your opinion that the people of Virginia would ever grant the right of suffrage to the blacks?

Answer. That is a question which I cannot answer, for it would be really giving an opinion without the data. I think, however, that a great many of the people of Virginia do not believe that the present generation of negroes in the State are sufficiently intelligent to be intrusted with the right of suffrage. In fact, that is the sentiment prevailing in the State of Virginia pretty extensively at this day in relation to a great many white people; but as to the effect this regulation would have if engrafted upon the Constitution I cannot say. I believe, however, that if the sentiment of the country should at any future time change in that respect from some material change in the condition of the negro, in order to gain this additional share of representation which that ratio would entitle them to, they would grant suffrage to the negroes. They would be inclined, I suppose, to get all the representation they could. I imagine, however, that it would depend upon the fact whether colored people should become improved to the extent that some people think they will improve. I do not think there will then be a disposition in Virginia to pay so dearly for excluding colored men from the polls—that is, to pay by losing that portion of the representation.

Question. Would not the enactment of that amendment imposing this necessity upon the once slave-holding communities create great discontent and dissatisfaction with the federal government?

Answer. So far as I can answer that question I will. I think that having for our first object to limit the right of suffrage to those who have some pretensions to exercise it, and guarding it somewhat, would have an influence no doubt. I think that if the government of the United States were to exclude a part of the representation in that way, it is probable that some portions of the south would regard it as an improper exclusion, because it has generally been the doctrine that the basis of representation is upon all the people together; but still, in regard to the right of suffrage, the States have generally looked, to some extent, to qualifications of some sort or other. I cannot say how they would consider it; I think it probable they would object to it, of course; they would go for the old doctrine, basing representation on the entire population.

Question. They would gain several members by extending the right of suffrage to all?

Answer. Yes, sir; but I do not see that in order to get that they would give up their provisions in regard to the qualifications of the voters; I do not know what they would do about that.

Question. This very amendment, in its very nature, would operate as a sort of constraint upon the southern States to give the right of suffrage to the negro; would not that produce heartburnings, as being an exercise of absolute power without reason and without necessity?

Answer. In that way it would. The political sentiment is, that the basis of representation ought to be, as I think, upon all the people of the State. At the same time, whenever you begin to fix the right of suffrage, the States, having that matter to regulate, ought to have the power to say who of their people shall have the right to vote, and who shall not have the right; this would be a setting aside of that doctrine, and it might be regarded as an unkind imposition; I think it would.

Question. Do you not think that the Henry A. Wises and that class of speakers would make a noise about it on the stump?

Answer. I dare say they would.

Question. Do you think of anything else you desire to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir; I do not.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1866.

John B. Baldwin sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. You are now speaker of the Virginia house of delegates?

Answer. I am.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. I am.

Question. Have you resided in Virginia during the war?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have resided all my life in Staunton, Augusta county.

Question. I think you were an original Union man?

Answer. I was; the most thorough-going I ever knew.

Question. Were you a member of the so-called secession convention in Virginia?

Answer. I was.

Question. Did you attend all its sittings?

Answer. I did.

Question. Open as well as secret?

Answer. I did attend its sessions, except after the ordinance of secession had passed; I was withdrawn by other duties a good deal from the session; but I was kept advised, and aware substantially of all that passed.

Question. Did you sign that ordinance?

Answer. I did.

Question. Can you tell what has become of it, or where it is now deposited?

Answer. I have understood that it is in the city of Washington, in the possession of the government, having been taken when the Union troops entered Richmond.

Question. Did you make a journey to Washington before the firing on Fort Sumter?

Answer. I did. I came here on the night of the 3d of April, 1861; I was here on the 4th day of April, 1861.

Question. Did you have an interview with President Lincoln?

Answer. I did have a private interview with him, lasting perhaps an hour.

Question. Do you feel at liberty to state what transpired at that interview?

Answer. I do, sir; I know of no reason why I should not.

Question. Have the goodness to state it.

Answer. On the 3d of April, 1861, I was in the convention. I was called out by Judge Summers, a member of the convention, who informed me that there was a messenger in Richmond, sent by Mr. Seward, asking him (Summers) to come on to Washington, as the President wanted to have an interview with him, and stating that if for any reason he was unable to come, he would be glad if the Union men of the convention would select and send on some one of their number who enjoyed their confidence, and who would be regarded as a representative man, competent to speak their sentiments, as the President wished to have some communication with them. Mr. Summers told me that he and a number of other members of the convention, Union men, (calling their names over,) had concurred in the opinion that I was the proper man to go, and that he wanted me immediately to get ready and return with the special messenger. I consented to come. A Mr. Allen B. Magruder, who was at that time a lawyer in the city of Washington, turned out to be the messenger. We came to Washington, and arrived here about breakfast time. I went to Mr. Magruder's house. About 10 or 11 o'clock we called at the Department of State, and I was introduced to Mr. Seward. Mr. Magruder informed him that I was the gentleman selected by the members of the Virginia convention—the Union men—in accordance with his request, and that I came indorsed by them as a person authorized to speak their sentiments. Mr. Seward said he would not anticipate at all what the President desired to say to me, but would take me immediately to his house. We went to the President's house, and I was taken to the audience chamber. The President was engaged for some time; and at last Mr. Seward, when the President became disengaged, took me up and introduced me to him in a whisper, indicating, as I thought, that it was a perfectly confidential affair. As nearly as I can recollect, the language he used was—"Mr. Baldwin, of the Virginia convention." Mr. Lincoln received me very cordially, and almost immediately arose and said that he desired to have some private conversation with me; he started through into the back room, opening into the other room; but on getting in there, we found two gentlemen sitting there engaged in writing, and he seemed to think that that would not do, and passed across the hall into a corresponding small room opposite, and through that into a large front room—immediately corresponding with the private audience hall—in which there was a bed; he locked the door, and stepping around into a space behind the bed, drew up two chairs, and asked me to take a seat. Mr. Seward did not go in with us. As I was about sitting down, said he, "Mr. Baldwin, I am afraid you have come too late." "Too late for what?" said I. Said he, "I am afraid you have come too late; I wish you could have been here three or four days ago." "Why," said I, "Mr. President, allow me to say I do not understand your remark; you sent a special messenger to Richmond?"

Question. You got the request to Mr. Summers on the 3d of April?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And you started—

Answer. Within three hours.

Question. And you arrived on the morning of the 4th?

Answer. Yes; and my interview with Mr. Lincoln was about 11 o'clock that day. Said I, "I do not understand you; you sent a special messenger to Richmond, who arrived there yesterday; I returned with him by the shortest and most expeditious mode of travel known; it was physically impossible that I or any one else, answering to your summons, could have got here sooner than I have arrived; I do not understand what you mean by saying that I have come too late." Said he, "Why do you not all adjourn the Virginia convention?" Said I, "Adjourn it!—how? do you mean sine die?" "Yes," said he, "sine die; why do you not adjourn it; it is a standing menace to me, which embarrasses me very much." Of course you will understand that I do not pretend to recollect the language at all, but this is about the substance of it. Said I, "Sir, I am very much surprised to hear you express that opinion; the Virginia convention is in the hands of Union men; we have in it a clear and controlling majority of nearly three to one; we are controlling it for conservative results; we can do it with perfect certainty, if you will uphold our hands by a conservative policy here. I do not understand why you want a body thus in the hands of Union men to be dispersed, or why you should look upon their sessions as in any respect a menace to you; we regard ourselves as co-operating with you in the objects which you express to seek; besides," said I, "I would call your attention to this view: If we were to adjourn that convention sine die, leaving these questions unsettled in the midst of all the trouble that is on us, it would place the Union men of Virginia in the attitude of confessing an inability to meet the occasion; the result would be, that another convention would be called as soon as legislation could be put through for the purpose."

Question. Was the legislature of Virginia then in session in the same city, Richmond?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is my impression. Said I, "As soon as the necessary legislation can be gotten through, another convention would be called, and the Union men of Virginia could not, with a proper self-respect, offer themselves as members of that convention, having had the full control of one, and having adjourned without having brought about any sort of settlement of the troubles upon us. The result would be that the next convention would be exclusively under the control of secessionists, and that an ordinance of secession would be passed in less than six weeks. Now, said I, sir, it seems to me that our true policy is to hold the position that we have, and for you to uphold our hands by a conservative, conciliatory, national course. We can control the matter, and will control it if you help us. And, sir, it is but right for me to say another thing to you, that the Union men of Virginia, of whom I am one, would not be willing to adjourn that convention until we either effect some settlement of this matter or ascertain that it cannot be done. As an original proposition, the Union men of Virginia did not desire amendments to the Constitution of the United States; we were perfectly satisfied with the constitutional guarantees that we had, and thought our rights and interests perfectly safe. But circumstances have changed: seven States of the south, the cotton States, have withdrawn from us and have left us in an extremely altered condition in reference to the safe-guards of the Constitution. As things stand now, we are helpless in the hands of the north. The balance of power which we had before for our protection against constitutional amendment is gone. And we think now that we of the border States who have adhered to you against all the obligations of association and sympathy with the southern States have a claim on the States of the north which is of a high and very peculiar character. You all say that you do not mean to injure us in our peculiar rights. If you are in earnest about it there can be no objection to your saying so in such an authentic form as will give us the force of constitutional protection. And we think you ought to do it, not grudgingly, not reluctantly, but in such a way as that it would be a fitting recognition of our fidelity in standing by you under all circumstances—fully, and generously, and promptly. If you will do it in accordance with what we regard as due to our position, it will give us a stand-point from which we can bring back the seceded States." I cannot follow the conversation through; but he asked me the question. "What is your plan?" Said I, "Mr. President, if I had the control of your thumb and forefinger five minutes I could settle the whole question." "Well," said he, "that would seem to be a simple process." Said I, "I can settle it as surely as that there is a God in heaven, if you just give me the control of your thumb and forefinger five minutes. To let you understand how earnestly I believe it, as God is my judge, if I could get the control of that thumb and forefinger for five minutes, I would be willing, unless my weak flesh would fail me, that you should take me out within the next five minutes and knock me on the head on Pennsylvania avenue." "Well," said he, "what is your plan?" Said I, "Sir, if I were in your place I would issue a proclamation to the American people, somewhat after this style: I would state the fact that you had become President of the United States as the result of a partisan struggle partaking of more bitterness than had usually marked such struggle; that, in the progress of that struggle, there had naturally arisen a great deal of misunderstanding and misrepresentation of the motives and intentions of both sides; that you had no doubt you had been represented, and to a large extent believed, to be inimical to the institutions and interests and rights of a large portion of the United States, but that, however, you might, in the midst of a partisan struggle, have been more or less (as all men) excited at times, occupying the position of President of the United States, you had determined to take your stand on the broad platform of the general Constitution, and to do equal and exact justice to all, without regard to party or section; and that, recognizing the fact without admitting the right, but protesting against the right, that seven States had undertaken to withdraw themselves from the Union, you had determined to appeal to the American people to settle the question in the spirit in which the Constitution was made—American fashion—by consultation and votes instead of by appeal to arms. And I would call a national convention of the people of the United States and urge upon them to come together and settle this thing. And in order to prevent the possibility of any collision or clash of arms interfering with this effort at a pacific settlement, I would declare the purpose (not in any admission of want of right at all, but with a distinct protest of the right, to place the forces of the United States wherever in her territory you choose) to withdraw the forces from Sumter and Pickens, declaring that it was done for the sake of peace, in effort to settle this thing; and that you were determined, if the seceded States chose to make a collision, that they should come clear out of their way and do it. Sir, said I, if you take that position there is national feeling enough in the seceded States themselves and all over the country to rally to your support, and you would gather more friends than any man in the country has ever had." He said something or other, I do not recollect what, but it created the impression upon me that he was looking with some apprehension to the idea that his friends would not be pleased with such a step, and I said to him, "Mr. President, for every one of your friends whom you would lose by such a policy you would gain ten who would rally to you and to the national standard of peace and Union." Said he, rather impatiently, "That is not what I am thinking about. If I could be satisfied that I am right, and that I do what is right, I do not care whether people stand by me or not." Said I, "Sir, I beg your pardon, for I only know of you as a politician, a successful politician; and possibly I have fallen into the error of addressing you by the motives which are generally potent with politicians, the motive of gaining friends. I thank you that you have recurred to me the higher and better motive, the motive of being right; and I assure you that, from now out, I will address you only by the motives that ought to influence a gentleman."

Question. You drew a distinction between a politician and a gentleman?

Answer. Yes, sir; he laughed a little at that. He said something about the withdrawal of the troops from Sumter on the ground of military necessity. Said I, "That will never do, under heaven. You have been President a month to-day, and if you intended to hold that position you ought to have strengthened it, so as to make it impregnable. To hold it in the present condition of force there is an invitation to assault. Go upon higher ground than that. The better ground than that is to make a concession of an asserted right in the interest of peace." "Well," said he, "what about the revenue? What would I do about the collection of duties?" Said I, "Sir, how much do you expect to collect in a year?" Said he, "Fifty or sixty millions." "Why, sir," said I, "four times sixty is two hundred and forty. Say $250,000,000 would be the revenue of your term of the presidency; what is that but a drop in the bucket compared with the cost of such a war as we are threatened with? Let it all go, if necessary; but I do not believe that it will be necessary, because I believe that you can settle it on the basis I suggest." He said something or other about feeding the troops at Sumter. I told him that would not do. Said I, "You know perfectly well that the people of Charleston have been feeding them already. That is not what they are at. They are asserting a right. They will feed the troops, and fight them while they are feeding them. They are after the assertion of a right. Now, the only way that you can manage them is to withdraw from them the means of making a blow until time for reflection, time for influence which can be brought to bear, can be gained, and settle the matter. If you do not take this course, if there is a gun fired at Sumter—I do not care on which side it is fired—the thing is gone." "Oh," said he, "sir, that is impossible." Said I, "Sir, if there is a gun fired at Fort Sumter, as sure as there is a God in heaven the thing is gone. Virginia herself, strong as the Union majority in the convention is now, will be out in forty-eight hours." "Oh," said he, "sir, that is impossible." Said I, "Mr. President, I did not come here to argue with you; I am here as a witness. I know the sentiments of the people of Virginia, and you do not. I understood that I was to come here to give you information of the sentiments of the people, and especially of the sentiments of the Union men of the convention. I wish to know before we go any further in this matter, for it is of too grave importance to have any doubt of it, whether I am accredited to you in such a way as that what I tell you is worthy of credence." Said he, "You come to me introduced as a gentleman of high standing and talent in your State." Said I, "That is not the point I am on. Do I come to you vouchered for as an honest man, who will tell you the truth?" Said he, "You do." "Then," said I, "sir, I tell you, before God and man, that if there is a gun fired at Sumter this thing is gone. And I wish to say to you, Mr. President, with all the solemnity that I can possibly summon, that if you intend to do anything to settle this matter you must do it promptly. I think another fortnight will be too late. You have the power now to settle it. You have the choice to make, and you have got to make it very soon. You have, I believe, the power to place yourself up by the side of Washington himself, as the savior of your country, or, by taking a different course of policy, to send down your name on the page of history notorious forever as a man so odious to the American people that, rather than submit to his domination, they would overthrow the best government that God ever allowed to exist. You have the choice to make, and you have, in my judgment, no more than a fortnight to make it in." That is about as much as I can gather out of the conversation now. I went to Alexandria that night, where I had telegraphed an acceptance of an invitation to make a Union speech, and made a speech to a large audience, which, I believe, was the last Union speech made in Virginia before the war; and I went on to Richmond and reported to these gentlemen.

Question. You received from Mr. Lincoln no letter or memorandum in writing?

Answer. Nothing whatever.

Question. No pledge? no undertaking?

Answer. No pledge; no undertaking; no offer; no promise of any sort. I went back to Mr. Seward's from the President's house that afternoon and had a long talk with him. I found Mr. Seward extremely earnest, as far as mortal man could judge from his manifestations, in the desire to settle the matter. He seemed to have a shrinking from the idea of a clash of arms, and the impression that he made upon me was, that he thought the days of philosophic statesmanship about to give way to the mailed glove of the warrior, and that he was earnestly engaged in the effort to secure peace and union, as the means of averting the military era which he thought he saw dawning upon the country. I had a good deal of interesting conversation with him that evening. I was about to state that I have reason to believe that Mr. Lincoln himself has given an account of this conversation, which has been understood—but, I am sure, misunderstood—by the persons to whom he talked, as giving the representation of it that he had offered to me, that if the Virginia convention would adjourn sine die he would withdraw the troops from Sumter and Pickens. I am as clear in my recollection as it is possible to be under the circumstances that he made no such suggestion, as I understood it, and said nothing from which I could infer it, for I was so earnest and so excited—the matter involving what I thought would give a promise of settlement to the country—that I am sure no opening of that sort, (although I would not have thought it a practicable scheme,) no overture of any sort could have escaped me. I am sure that I would have made it the foundation, if not of direct negotiation, at least of temporizing, in connexion with others. But I have reason to believe that persons have derived that impression from conversation with Mr. Lincoln. Whether Mr. Lincoln intended to convey that impression to them or not, of course I have no means of judging.

Question. Did Mr. Seward send by you any letter or memorandum in writing?

Answer. None whatever—no letter or memorandum in writing, nor any message to anybody, except his respects and compliments to Judge Summers.

Question. One object of your visit to the President was to obtain from him some assurance that he would take some step in the interest of peace, or to prevent a collision of arms?

Answer. No, sir. That was one of the objects of the interview; but my visit there was at the instance of the President himself, who, without at all indicating the purpose of conference, expressed a desire to have a conference with some gentleman who would be a recognized exponent of the Union sentiment in the Virginia convention.

Question. You entertained the hope, at that interview, of getting from him some assurance, some encouragement, by which the collision of arms might be prevented?

Answer. That was my object and purpose earnestly.

Question. Was it not your main object and purpose?

Answer. It was the only object that I had. The object I had in going on was to meet what I regarded, and what our friends in the convention regarded, as an overture to what we had long desired—an understanding with Mr. Lincoln. We thought that if we could get into communication with him, and could convey to him a clear and honest exposition of the sentiments prevailing in Virginia, we could influence his policy in such a way as to enable us to bring about a settlement of the affair. At the time I was here I saw, and was introduced to, in the President's room, a number of governors of States. It was at the time the nine governors had the talk here with the President—the time when there was an immense outside pressure brought to bear upon the President. We thought in Virginia that if we could only present fairly to the mind of Mr. Lincoln the necessities of our situation, the difficulties with which we were surrounded, and the prospect of success on the line of policy which we could suggest, that we could accomplish something towards settling the question. I came on to Washington, not with any defined purpose at all, but with the general purpose of trying to establish a good understanding with him, and inducing him, as far as possible, to take the views which universally prevailed among Union men in the Richmond convention.

Question. Do you possess a good memory?

Answer. My literal memory is not good. I cannot say that it is peculiarly bad; but, in reference to results, as bearing on a line of policy or argument which I pursued, I think my memory is unusually good.

Question. You are by profession a counsellor-at-law?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Accustomed to listen to the details of testimony?

Answer. I am, sir. My habit is to take no notes of testimony at all; and I habitually conduct cases with forty or fifty witnesses, taking no minute whatever except of the name of the witness. My memory is sufficiently accurate, and is so recognized by my associates at the bar, that when a bill of exceptions in regard to facts developed on the trial is to be made, they very often call upon me to write the testimony from my memory in preference to writing it from such notes as were taken by the bar. But I do not recollect it in the way the witnesses gave it. I recollect it as it elusters around the course of argument which I am preparing in my own mind during the case as it fits upon the line of my own thought. I recollect all that a number of witnesses said on the same subject, and not a continuous recollection of what each witness said.

Question. You recollect the substance and the result?

Answer. Yes, sir; the substance and result.

Question. Is it, in your opinion, in any degree likely that in this narrative you are mistaken as to any material fact that transpired in the conversation?

Answer. I think not. I may have omitted entire branches of what occurred. It may be that entire subjects which I have not mentioned at all might be brought to my mind; but as to the subjects which I have touched I have as much confidence in the recollection which I have of them as I can have in my recollection of anything transpiring that far off. It was a subject of more interest to me than anything that ever happened to me, and when I returned I repeated it over and over again to the gentlemen who had concurred in sending me, and it impressed itself deeply on my mind.

Question. You think you cannot be mistaken when you say that Mr. Lincoln did not assure you, in any form, that it was his purpose to withdraw the garrison from Sumter and Pickens at that time?

Answer. Of course I would not be willing to say, if I heard that Mr. Lincoln had given a different representation of it, that it was impossible he should have done so. I have no reason to believe that Mr. Lincoln was a man capable of intentional misrepresentation in a matter of that sort; therefore I would not, of course, undertake to say that it was impossible he could have intended to convey that impression. If I were certified that Mr. Lincoln had said he intended to give me that impression I should be bound to concede it, although at the same time I should be bound to say that the idea never occurred to me, and that when I first heard that such an idea had been suggested I was as much surprised as I was ever in my life?

Question. What is the state of feeling on the part of the secessionists of Virginia towards the government of the United States?

Answer. Well, sir, I believe the feeling that it is and is to be our government is universal. If there is any feeling of dissatisfaction, (and there is a feeling of dissatisfaction in reference to the delay and the refusal of representation,) it is more like the feeling which a political party out of power has toward the political party in power, in a government recognized by both and intended to be recognized by both, than anything else. It has no kinship whatever with the idea of resisting or overthrowing the government.

Question. You have no ground to suspect any combination as still existing in Virginia, having in view the overthrow of the government?

Answer. Not only have I no ground to suspect it, but I think I can say I know it is not so, because I have been in intercourse with the most bitter, determined, obstinate, and violent of all the men in Virginia who were concerned in the whole affair, and I not only do not know of such a thing, and do not suspect it, but anybody who would tell me that he did know it I would suspect of being a liar.

Question. You understand the contemplated amendment of the Constitution relating to the basis of representation now pending in the United States Senate.

Answer. Yes, sir; I think I do.

Question. If that amendment should be ratified, and become a part of the Constitution of the United States, would the people of Virginia, in your apprehension, ever be willing to grant the blacks the right of voting?

Answer. Of course no man can tell what would be the wearing effect of generation, of agitation of a subject of that sort; but I think it is clear as any proposition in the world, that if you place the people of Virginia in the attitude that they are to be diminished in consideration and in influence, and in their due power in the government, because of their unwillingness to place the negro on the ground of political equality, it will plant a root of bitterness such as has not been known even in the bitterness of the war. That is my judgment and belief. It would lead to political combinations of every sort. We would have advocates of suffrage of women, of minors, and foreigners, and negroes, in every shade of combination and confusion. I would regard it as being the entering wedge of more mischief, more trouble, more ill will, more dissatisfaction and disloyalty to the government of the United States, than all other causes that have ever combined together.

Question. So that you are fully of opinion that, instead of being a measure of peace, conciliation, and tranquillity, it would be a renewal of the agitation in another form still more bitter than that which existed before the war?

Answer. So thorough is my conviction on that subject that, while I believe I have local attachment and State attachment as strong as any man living, the moment that amendment was adopted I should feel bound, as a matter of ordinary self-protection, to quit Virginia, to avoid every southern State as I would a pest house, and to seek to make my living somewhere else.

Question. Would not the State, in case of such a ratification, evade, in some degree, the effect of it by prescribing property qualification for voters, or the qualification of intelligence?

Answer. I have no doubt at all that if that constitutional amendment were adopted, all the expedients which ingenuity and chicanery could suggest would be resorted to to get around it and evade it in every possible way; and I do consider that one of, by no means the least of, the objections to it.

Question: Do you think that in old Virginia a convention or legislature could be assembled which would restrict the right of suffrage, narrow it from what it is now, in the case of whites?

Answer. I do not think there could. After the passage of the ordinance of secession, when the people were all engaged in war, the convention went on and tried that thing to some extent, not so much in reference to suffrage as in reference to elections, &c.—at all events going back on the track—and it failed, even with all the advantages they had then. I do not believe that, if you give fair notice, you can go back of universal suffrage. The fact is that a great many of the most conservative men in Virginia, as far as I know, are universal suffrage men, as a conservative idea—the idea of getting to the bottom and knowing what is under you. I am one of them myself. I have been always a universal suffrage man.

Question. Has there ever existed any considerable party at the south that has favored the establishment of a monarchial form of government at the south?

Answer. I do not think I ever saw more than one or two men—and they were generally these old fellows with ruffled shirts and knee-breeches—who were of that opinion, until during the war. During the war we could hear a great many suggest monarchy and everything else, as a means of escaping from the Yankees. They were fighting us, and the idea was if we could not whip them we would dodge them; do anything in the world for that purpose. I heard that sort of talk; but I never regarded it as anything serious, because I suppose that a monarchy would be just as easily planted in this country as you could get a cactus to grow in Canada.

Question. Have you not an idea that Jefferson Davis rather contemplated to make himself a monarch?

Answer. Not the least in the world. Jefferson Davis is one of the most curious men I ever studied. I never was intimate with him, but I had opportunities of observing him a good deal. He was a thorough tyrant in the sense that he exercised to the full extent every power that he thought he had. But he was the least of a usurper of any man I ever saw. He had no desire to extend his powers; on the contrary, he rather desired that they should be diminished. I think he was a conscientious man; a man of rather narrow, (as I thought,) contracted views of constitutional construction. A straw of construction across his path would stop him from the most darling wish of his heart.

Question. In his temper I suppose he was arbitrary?

Answer. I think he was. I do not know his personal peculiarities on that point. I have had very little personal intercourse with him. You (Mr. Howard) take the distinction I draw between a man who exercises what he believes to be his powers, fully, and the man who seeks to have other powers.

Question. Do you think he could be convicted of treason in Virginia?

Answer. Well, sir, I do not see why he could not be convicted of treason in Virginia just as well as any other man could be convicted of any other offence, if the law is laid down distinctly to the jury, and if you happen to get an honest jury. I do not see why not. In Virginia 999 out of every 1,000 people, at least, were in the same boat with Jefferson Davis. I do not exaggerate when I say 999 out of every 1,000. And, of course, you would find it difficult to get any confederates of his, those who were with him, and fighting for him, and hurrahing for him all the time, to desire to convict him. They would not do it if they could help it; but that you can find enough honest men in Virginia or any other southern State to respond to a question of fact, I am as well satisfied as I am of anything. Take my own case: I never believed in the right of secession. I do not believe in it now. I always looked upon the whole thing as an absurdity and humbug. I always believed, and believe now, that, as a question of law, right, and power, the government had a right to hang Jeff. Davis and me too. The question of power and the question of policy are different questions. If I were to sit as a juror on Jeff. Davis's case, or my own, or Keen's, I would not need any instructions from a judge to make me say that he ought to be hanged—not a bit. These are my views of the law and of the facts. There are a great many people in Virginia of the same way of thinking. I went into the rebellion as a rebel, with my eyes wide open, to take the consequences. I was not a secessionist. I never acknowledged the name of secessionist. I was a rebel.

Question. You never set up the right of a State to secede?

Answer. I never thought of it.

Question. You put it simply on the ground of revolution?

Answer. Of revolution. I thought if we succeeded that it would be all right; and if not, I expected to have a hard road to travel.

Question. You really found a much easier one than you expected?

Answer. Yes, sir. I expected to be hanged; and all that I have saved over and above that I consider as clear profit.

Question. Please make a statement to the committee in reference to the acts of your legislature.

Answer. There is a general feeling manifested in the legislature to go over our laws and to strike out the peculiar distinctive features separating the black and white races before the law. That is the tendency of the legislature. For instance, the other day the subject of apprentices was brought up, and apprentices, white and black, were placed on the same footing, and in respect to both the employer is required to have them taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, including the rule of three. There is no discrimination at all. In reference to rape, abduction, and offences of that sort, all discrimination has been withdrawn as between offences committed on persons of one or the other color. And so, as you go on, we are wiping out gradually all distinctions; they are not very numerous in our laws. You would be surprised, in going over our legislation, to find how thoroughly the free negro has been the equal of the white man before the law in Virginia. He has always had the same right to sue, to sue as a pauper or as a paying suitor. His cases have been all tried in the same way. He has always had the same right to call witnesses as a white man. He has had the same right to acquire property, except in slaves; and it is only of late years that he has been prohibited from acquiring slaves. That was one of those retaliatory or preventive measures that were adopted.

Question. Dbl the right of inheritance attach to the colored man?

Answer. Yes, sir; there was no distinction whatever. The free negro had all the rights of a free man. There was some difference in regard to the mode of trying minor offences committed by a free negro; but the distinction was in favor of the negro. As, for instance, it requires the verdict of a jury to acquit a white man of an offence in a capital case; but in the case of a negro, slave or free, tried before the court of oyer and terminer, the dissent of one magistrate out of five cleared him. It is a matter perfectly well understood by lawyers, who have practiced as criminal lawyers in Virginia, that a slave or a free negro had always the decided advantage over a white man in criminal defences.

[Mr. W. T. Jaynes, heretofore examined as a witness, mentioned here, as an illustration of this fact, that in a capital case which he once tried, and where one of the magistrates refused to find a verdict of guilty, he had sentenced the accused, a colored man, to transportation, and that the court of appeals had set aside the sentence, and discharged the prisoner.]

Witness: A white man, who is tried before a jury, in case the jury disagree, is tried over again; but a negro, tried before the court of oyer and terminer, where one of the five judges dissents, is acquitted. Whenever you come to a class of offences in regard to tampering with slaves, or withdrawing them from their obligations to their masters, or anything of that kind, the laws were severe, and the free negro was placed, in some respects, in a worse condition than a white man, but those cases are very few; and now the universal sentiment and feeling of the people is to give to the negro, in law, all the results of the fact of his freedom. In regard to negro testimony there is a diversity of sentiment among our people. I believe everybody agrees that one of the effects of freedom will be, sooner or later, to place the negro and the white man, in this matter of testimony, on a perfect equality before the law, and that this ought, and necessarily will be so; but there is a diversity of opinion in reference to the expediency and safety of undertaking to do that thing all at one job. I think the more prudent of our people are disposed to do that gradually, taking a step at the time, and ascertaining how it works. I think the feeling now is to place in the hands of the negro the right to testify in all matters affecting his person, his property, or his family; to testify in his own case, as a white man would do; and to testify in criminal prosecutions for offences against his person, his property, or his family. I think that the disposition is to let that be the first step, and to go on gradually. You, gentlemen of the north, who have not a mass of 300,000 or 400,000 suddenly emancipated negroes in your midst, can hardly appreciate the caution which we feel to be necessary in dealing with any of these problems. However much we may be determined to do them justice, there are questions of safety and expediency which must be considered by prudent and discreet men. I have no hesitation in saying that the desire and determination is, as rapidly as possible, to remove all those differences before the law, and to place the blacks on an equal footing of equality before the law. That is my judgment and the temper of the legislature—to allow them all the civil rights, the same as white men. There are several things to be taken into consideration. In the first place, we must let the public feeling of the white people mature. Our local government must conform to the judgment and opinion of our own people, and they must have time to make up their mind to this thing. If you attempt to force the matter, you will see that it will bring about an enmity between the races. There is, as Mr. Grattan remarked, no unkind feeling towards the negro in a position where he is not asserting an equality; but the best friend a negro ever had in the world, the kindest friend he ever had, a young boy or girl raised by a negro mammy, and devotedly attached to her, would become ferociously indignant if the old mammy were to claim equality for a moment. This feeling is found in the northern people as well as in the southern people. The idea that this equality was now to be asserted and claimed would have a bad effect; but go on gradually to remove these different distinctions, and the people will find that it amounts to nothing in the end but what is just and right in itself, and they will come to it without any shock to their feelings. I think I can say with perfect confidence that our people will deal with the negro in all respects as kindly, and extend privileges to him as rapidly, as if he had been manumitted by the judgment of our own people, without any foreign influence at all: that is my belief.

I do not like the negro as well free as I did as a slave, for the reason that there is now between us an antagonism of interest to some extent, while, before, his interest and mine were identical. Then, I was always thinking of how I could fix him comfortably. Now, I find myself driving a hard bargain with him for wages; and I find that sort of feeling suggested directly by motives of interest coming in between the employer and the employed.

Question. You find the negro loves money as well as the white man?

Answer. Certainly; he loves money; but he knows nothing about taking care of it. My negroes, when they draw their month's wages now, give a blow-out and have a dance in my kitchen, and we find it necessary to put a clause in our contracts with them, giving the employer the right to procure them decent clothes out of their wages.

(Mr. W. T. Joyner here stated as a remarkable fact that when negroes get money they cease working till their money is all spent. Hence they flock into towns, where they can work by the job. They have not got the idea of laying up anything for a rainy day, and they always spend their wages before their next wages come due, to which the witness assented.)

Question. Do you think that this results in a great degree from the fact that they have been slaves?

Answer. It is to some extent the intrinsic character of the animal. It is characteristic of the free negroes as a class, although there are here and there exceptions.

Question. In the case of a compulsory change in the constitution or laws, by which the right of suffrage should be given to the blacks of Virginia, would you anticipate scenes of violence between the two races there?

Answer. It is very difficult to anticipate. I think that in the absence of interference from the government there is not much prospect of anything like armed collision between the two races. I think that the white and black races are so intermingled in the busyness of life that the black race is under the influence of the white, and I think that as a result they like the white people better than they do their own. I think it would be hard to unite the blacks together as a race. I think the greatest danger they are in is that they will be oppressed by the keenness of competition for employment, and by the superior sharpness of white persons in individual cases getting the advantage of them. I do not think there is any prospect of armed collisions, except the negroes are organized for some aggressive movement from without. If that is the case I believe there would be.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that any such organization exists in Virginia on the part of the blacks?

Answer. There are organizations of a benevolent character; but I have no reason to believe that they have any organization for any sinister purpose.

Question. Have you any idea that they have collected arms together for protection?

Answer. I have not the least idea of anything of the sort. I think they would be very slow to do it. They are the best and kindest people I know of.

Question. Is not the negro, after all, in the main, submissive to authority and inclined to be orderly? Is he not as truthful as the same class of whites?

Answer. It is extremely hard to compare classes. My own impression is that in the moral and affectionate dispositions the negro is, perhaps, the equal of the white person up to a certain point and under similar circumstances. As, for instance, the negro nurse is more affectionate, more attached, and more devoted than the white. The negro servant is, perhaps, more faithful and has less thought of self in his devotion to his master and employer. I believe that in reading, and writing, and spelling, negroes learn almost as quickly as whites; but I believe that when you have said that, you have given them about the highest position they can get. I do not believe that, as a race, they will ever have the persistence of purpose, or the energy, or the intellectual vigor to rise to anything like intellectual equality with the white race. I think that they will get along very well in the ordinary domestic relations, as servants and inferiors.

Question. You think, then, that in point of intellect they are inferior to the white race?

Answer. I do, decidedly; that is, in certain qualities of the mind, the qualities which go to build up a government, or to build up a race, or to accomplish any great results requiring persistent effort and combinations, I believe they are greatly inferior to the white race. But in the little affectionate and moral attributes which go to make them amiable in their intercourse, kind, indulgent, obedient to the orders of other persons, I think they are just as good as white men.

Question. What is their capacity for acquiring a knowledge of music and painting?

Answer. I do not know about painting; but a negro is a born musician, after a certain fashion. I have rarely known a negro who ever acquired any great excellence as a musician. They learn to play the fiddle by ear and to pick the banjo, and they do it remarkably well; but I never knew a negro who made a really fine musician, except Blind Tom, who was an idiot. Blind Tom is the best performer I ever heard of on the piano, except Thalberg himself; but that is an exception, for Blind Tom has not sense enough to take care of himself. He is blind and idiotic. I do not think negroes have intellect enough to acquire superiority in any art requiring continuity of purpose.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 14, 1866.

William J. Dews sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. State your residence and occupation.

Answer. Staunton, Virginia; professor of music.

Question. Are you a native Virginian?

Answer. Yes; I was born in Isle of Wight county, near Richmond.

Question. Have you been a secessionist?

Answer. No, sir; thank Heaven.

Question. You have been uniformly a Union man?

Answer. I have.

Question. What have been your opportunities for observing the state of feeling in that part of Virginia where you reside, during the war and since the war?

Answer. I remained in the south until July, 1864, when I left Richmond and got through the lines into West Virginia.

Question. And since the close of hostilities you have been residing at Staunton?

Answer. Yes, sir; I went there as soon as communication was open.

Question. What is the feeling among the ex-rebels there towards the government of the United States?

Answer. As a general thing, the feeling is one of opposition, as far as my knowledge extends.

Question. How are they in the habit of speaking of the government?

Answer. Disrespectfully. Of course there are exceptions.

Question. Are they understood as speaking against the present administration, or against the government as a government?

Answer. I understand that it is against the United States government. Some have reference to the present administration; but generally—my impression is from observation—it is directed against the United States government.

Question. Do you hear expressions among them indicating their wish for a renewal of the war?

Answer. Well, sir; I cannot say that.

Question. Or a wish for southern independence?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are such expressions frequent among them?

Answer. They are not very frequent in my presence. A good many things of that character do reach my ears from those who are bold enough to say what they think on all occasions, but from others I hear them indirectly.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the emancipation of their slaves?

Answer. Generally speaking, they do not recognize it, only just so far as they are compelled. Some few do.

Question. How do the ex-rebels treat Union men?

Answer. As a general thing, they look upon them with contempt.

Question. Do they exhibit in their intercourse bitterness and hostility towards the Union men?

Answer. They do.

Question. Are you aware of any scenes of violence recently growing out of feelings of Unionism and rebellion?

Answer. I am; of attempted violence and of direct violence.

Question. Narrate such circumstances as occur to you as illustrations of the state of feeling.

Answer. A gentleman named Davis, a returned refugee and well-known Union man, was insulted on the cars about three weeks ago, near the village of Mount Sydney, and a fight got up. Two Union men were attacked at Mount Sydney (quite a strong Union place too) on the day of an election for magistrates, and an attempt was made to put them out of the hotel. They had been both in the federal army and had been discharged. But they drew their revolvers and held their assailants at bay. Some government officers who were passing at the time (the assistant superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau among them) were insulted. Some of them were for stopping and settling it then, but better counsels prevailed. Several other cases have been reported to me, but the names have escaped my memory. I have not heard a complaint against a Union man for having attempted reviling against secessionists, or anything of that sort.

Question. How is it in regard to social intercourse between ex-rebels and Unionists?

Answer. There is not much. There is some. Where ex-rebels regard a Union man as having simply exercised his judgment and acted conscientiously, they look at the matter fairly.

Question. State whether the ex-rebels in your vicinity outnumber the Unionists?

Answer. Yes, sir; probably eight or ten to one in the county.

Question. The Unionists are in a very small minority?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Can Unionists be elected to any office in that county?

Answer. Oh no, sir; on the occasion when the difficulty occurred at Mount Sydney the magistrates who were elected were, as I was informed, ex-rebels.

Question. How are northern men treated in that vicinity by ex-rebels?

Answer. They are regarded pretty much in the same light as Union men of the county; perhaps the latter are thought even less of.

Question. Are northern men welcome as settlers down there, when they go to transact business or to purchase property?

Answer. They are, to a certain extent, as a matter of business.

Question. What chance does a Unionist stand to get justice in the State courts?

Answer. I should not suppose, with perhaps a few exceptions, that he would have any chance; that is the impression of all the Union men. Union men are preparing a petition to Congress to have all their lawsuits, of every description, referred to a military court or some other tribunal, because they are convinced that they cannot have justice done them on account of the prejudice against them; probably two hundred and fifty persons in the county have already signed the petition.

Question. Is that feeling very extensive among the Union people there?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is universal. I learn that there are only two Union men in the county who refuse to sign the petition, and they decline from a fear of being interfered with.

Question. What effect has the President's liberality in granting amnesties and pardons to rebels had upon their minds generally?

Answer. So far as my knowledge extends, I cannot say that it has had any good effect; it has made them more contemptuous, if anything.

Question. How do they generally regard the oath of amnesty, when they take it?

Answer. With some few exceptions they feel as if they were simply constrained to do it, just as a man might be compelled to give his money to a robber to save his life.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there exists in Virginia, or elsewhere in the rebel region, any secret society or combination having in view southern independence, in any future contingency?

Answer. I have no positive reason to suppose that such exists in the form of combinations or associations, although I have heard such intimations.

Question. That such clubs did exist?

Answer. No; but that such was the feeling in individual cases; for instance, speaking of the probable disagreement of the north in relation to acts of Congress, and hoping that such differences might arise and might produce an appeal to arms in the north.

Question. Do you mean to say that the apprehension is entertained by anybody in the south that there is to be an appeal to arms at the north?

Answer. Yes, sir; that it is to eventuate in that, from disagreement between the republican party and the President.

Question. And in that case, the secessionists are going to do what?

Answer. They would then have a chance for another trial for independence. Such an opinion was advanced to me by the corporation attorney of Staunton, not two weeks since; he avowed himself as a secessionist, and that he was proud of it.

Question. What do they say generally in reference to a war between the United States and some foreign power?

Answer. In many cases they intimate their desire for it.

Question. From what you know of their temper and inclinations, have you reason to apprehend that, in the case of a foreign war, many of them would join the common enemy of the United States?

Answer. My opinion is, that very many would; but as to what proportion of them I am not prepared to state; I think that a great many of the thinking men would discourage it.

Question. Suppose it should become apparent that the rebel States stood a pretty good chance to succeed in establishing their independence by allying themselves with a foreign enemy, in the course of a foreign war, what would they do?

Answer. I am of opinion that many of them would ally themselves with the foreign enemy. I do not know what feeling might arise when such a contingency occurred; the feeling might change, and all might rally around the flag.

Question. How do they feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. Very bitter; but, to use their own terms, they regard the Union man about as they do the nigger. Since I went back to Staunton I have been invited to act as a commissioner in the bureau of refugees, in my leisure time. Some five days since, Mr. Tukey, assistant superintendent, was absent in Richmond on business, and the business of the office was left in my charge. I had some difficulty with a magistrate there, an ex-rebel, who interfered with me; I threatened him with the military if he did not desist; he refused to desist, and I went to the mayor and requested him to do what I wanted, and he instantly did so; it was to take a man out of jail, who had been put in without a hearing; there was nothing at all against the man, and he was simply held in a small amount to keep the peace; the same corporation council appeared there, and argued that they should arrest me for interfering; the town sergeant, who is a loyal man, spoke up and said, that I had done nothing in the world but my duty; the corporation attorney suggested that I should be arrested first and examined afterwards; the magistrate, after hearing the town sergeant, said there was nothing against me; the attorney seemed very much choppfallen, and used some insolent language towards me, which stirred up my anger; he offered to make a test case of it in some other manner, and I told him just walk out of the office and make a test case of it in any way he chose, which settled the matter.

Question. Whereupon he did not walk out?

Answer. He did not. Another man, named Bunch, a well-known rebel, also appealed to the crowd to excite it against me; I was alone, but armed; some few Union men gathered around, and some loyal blacks also; I told them to be quiet, and under no circumstances to disturb the peace. The affair produced so much excitement that I dropped a line to the commander of the troops at Charlottesville, asking him whether, if it became necessary, he would be prepared to start some troops up to Staunton by the train. He immediately answered that he was prepared.

Question. The ex-rebels have no special fondness for the Union troops in their midst?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Would the whites in that part of Virginia willingly contribute for the education of all classes, blacks and whites?

Answer. My impression is that they would not. The papers discountenance it, and make fun of the negro schools and school teachers and Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. How are teachers of colored schools treated by ex-rebels?

Answer. They are not treated with any respect, with some few exceptions; there are probably not more than one or two families where they visit.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the blacks? Are they willing to promote it, or do they discourage it?

Answer. They discourage it. A collection was being made to build a church for the blacks; Mr. Sandy (Alex. H. H.) Stuart subscribed five dollars, but remarked to the colored man that he would give five dollars toward building the church, and would give five dollars more if the bureau would leave, and if Mr. Tukey would leave; it was either Mr. Stuart or Mr. John B. Baldwin who said this; I believe it was Mr. Stuart.

Question. Mr. Stuart ran for Congress on the secession ticket?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Who was his competitor?

Answer. Mr. Lewis, a Union man.

Question. Which was elected?

Answer. Mr. Stuart.

Question. Did Mr. Stuart issue a card during the canvass in reference to the test oath?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What did he say in that card?

Answer. He said, in substance, that he could not and would not take the oath.

Question. That was before the election?

Answer. Yes, sir, if I am not mistaken.

Question. By the oath, you refer to what?

Answer. To the test oath.

Question. Contained in the President's proclamation?

Answer. I presume so.

Question. By what majority was Stuart elected over Lewis?

Answer. I am not aware; but if my memory serves me right, it was a pretty good majority.

Question. Are you able to say whether or not Mr. Stuart took any part in the war, on the part of the rebels, encouraged, aided, or abetted it?

Answer. I do not think he was in the army, because his age kept him out; he was regarded as a tolerably good Union man during the war; but the Union men were fearful of him; they did not give him their confidence entirely, but he was looked upon as a little friendly to the Union men.

Question. Was he trusted by either party?

Answer. I cannot say positively.

Question. Did either party look upon him with any reliance?

Answer. My impression is, that men who changed, like him, were not looked upon with confidence, except they took up arms direct in defence of secessionism; they were not looked upon with such respect as if they had.

Question. Do you think a jury could be got together in that county that would convict a ringleader traitor of making war against the United States?

Answer. I do not think so.

Question. Is your opinion founded on your knowledge of public feeling?

Answer. Yes, sir, on my knowledge and on what I hear daily. I was told of a man the other day in the country who said he would not sit as juror in a case between a Union man and an ex-rebel, because he would be prejudiced against the Union man.

Question. Does any other matter occur to your mind which you wish to state?

Answer. I may state that the signers of the petition of which I spoke feel so fully confident that they can get no justice in the State courts that they refuse to take any case there, waiting for something to turn up in their favor. Knowing the position that I hold, I have received hundreds of messages from Dunkards and other Union men to that effect.

Question. Are the Dunkards numerous in that county?

Answer. Yes; they are quite numerous; and, possibly, ninety-nine out of every hundred of them are Union men, except that they paid $500 each to the confederate government for exemption from military service; they were required to pay it.

Question. How do the ex-rebels feel down there towards General Lee?

Answer. They regard him as a saint, so far as my knowledge extends.

Question. How do they feel towards Jefferson Davis?

Answer. They regard him as a persecuted friend, as a general thing. I do not know that I ever heard one say he was justly punished.

Question. Did you ever hear anything said about his connexion with the assassination of Mr. Lincoln?

Answer. I have not, further than what I saw in the newspapers.

Question. How do the most pronounced among the secessionists feel in regard to the assassination of Mr. Lincoln? Do they think it was an atrocious act or a justifiable act?

Answer. So far as my knowledge extends, they consider it an atrocious act generally; it would be exceedingly dangerous to express any different feeling, if they felt it; I am not prepared to say, whether they mean what they say, or not. I heard a few say that they had no regret about it, but the generality of them denounce the act. A lawyer named Hill, from Highland county, came into the office recently and made a complaint that a white man who had been arrested for theft, tried, found guilty, and punished by the provost marshal, and who had received a certificate of the fact, had been brought before one of the civil courts on the same charge, and that the court had refused to recognize the certificate of the provost marshal, indorsed by Colonel Clay, commanding the post. The corporation counsel got up and asked, contemptuously, who Colonel Clay was; and he treated the certificate with the utmost contempt. The trial is in progress now. The man managed to get bail, and his lawyer applied to the office of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. What was the ruling of the court?

Answer. Mr. Hill, the counsel for the prisoner, said that the certificate was disregarded entirely.

Question. Is Mr. Hill a credible, respectable man?

Answer. Yes, so far as my knowledge extends. The facts are now being laid before General Terry. In reference to the popular feeling I will give another illustration: After my return to Staunton, about a month or six weeks since, an article appeared in the Staunton Spectator, copied from the Metropolitan Record, in reference to Union men, returned refugees, &c.—very bitter and outrageous. Several Union men applied to me to reply to it. The editor of the Spectator reluctantly agreed to publish my reply, and in the same number of the paper he came out with a violent editorial in regard to the petition of which I have spoken. The other two papers took it up and pitched into me in regard to the petition and other matters. I waited upon the editors of those papers and requested permission to reply to their articles, which permission they accorded me; but the editor of the Spectator refused me the same privilege, treating my letter with contempt, and telling the bearer that he would receive nothing from me.

Question. Is the Spectator a secession journal?

Answer. It is; and probably the most bitter in Staunton.

Question. How large a place is Staunton?

Answer. A place of probably seven thousand inhabitants. The other day a flour inspector remarked to a white man, who had appealed to the Freedmen's Bureau against an unjust imprisonment, that any white man who would go to the bureau was no better than a nigger, nor so good. This man holds the position of flour inspector at Staunton under the State government, and is known as a notorious rebel.

Question. By whom was he appointed?

Answer. By Governor Peirpoint.

Question. What is the political character of the Virginia legislature?

Answer. From all I can learn they seem to be rebels—inclined that way.

Question. What public service has Mr. John B. Baldwin rendered?

Answer. He was a member of the rebel Congress.

Question. House of representatives or senate?

Answer. I cannot say.

Question. How long did he serve?

Answer. I presume he served all the time. He was serving when I left the confederacy.

Question. Did he serve in the rebel army at all?

Answer. I do not think he did. I may state in this connexion, that during General Hunter's raid I was within ten miles of Staunton, hiding, and happened to be in the vicinity of the battle-field at Piedmont. When the wagon train came along I made the acquaintance of a colonel and stated my position. He advised me to go to the mountains, as they would probably have a heavy fight at Lynchburg. I went to Staunton with him, and rode in front of the column into the town, where my little boy was. Next morning Mr. Baldwin came down out of the mountains, coming from Richmond, and harangued the people in Staunton, advising them to resistance, and to make all efforts to rally. He said that the President had told him that the valley should be held at all hazards; that the people should have no fear of Hunter or any one else. A large crowd had gathered around him. He was on horseback near the hotel. He did not make any loud speech, but it was conversation. This was in the summer of 1864.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 15, 1866.

John Minor Botts sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. In the county of Culpeper, State of Virginia.

Question. Were you a member of the secession convention of Virginia ?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Where were you at the time ?

Answer. I was run for the convention as a Union candidate, but was beaten by a secession candidate, the late rebel secretary of war, G. W. Randolph.

Question. Where were you during the session of that convention ?

Answer. I was in Richmond.

Question. Were you well acquainted with their proceedings ?

Answer. I was tolerably familiar with them. I very seldom attended their discussions, but I had a good deal of intercourse—constant intercourse—with the Union members of the convention.

Question. Are you acquainted with George W. Summers, of Virginia ?

Answer. Very well.

Question. Was he a member of the convention ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Was he a Union member ?

Answer. He was.

Question. Have you any recollection of John B. Baldwin, of Virginia, who was a member of that convention, paying a visit to President Lincoln just before the firing on Fort Sumter ?

Answer. I know nothing of it except what I derived from Mr. Lincoln himself, and from a subsequent interview with, and admission on the part of, Mr. Baldwin, of the material portions of Mr. Lincoln's statement to me.

Question. Go on and state the substance of Mr. Lincoln's statement to you.

Answer. I arrived in Washington on the 5th day of April, 1861. On Sunday afternoon, the 7th, I received a note from Mr. Lincoln, saying he would be glad to see me during the evening. I went up to his house and spent from seven o'clock until eleven o'clock in company with Mr. Lincoln, during which time we had a great deal of conversation upon the general affairs of the country, and especially in reference to the condition of things in Virginia. During the conversation Mr. Lincoln said to me that he had, about a week or ten days before that, possibly a fortnight, written to Mr. Summers, with whom we had both served in Congress together, asking him to come to Washington without delay, as he had a most important proposition to make to him, and that if he could not come himself he would send some other prominent influential Union man of the convention to him; that he had not heard from Mr. Summers until the Friday preceding, which was the 5th; that on that day Mr. John B. Baldwin, a member of the convention, had presented himself to him as having been sent up by Mr. Summers on the invitation of Mr. Lincoln; that when he made this announcement Mr. Lincoln said to him: "Ah, Mr. Baldwin, why did you not come here sooner? I have been waiting and expecting some of you gentlemen of that convention to come to me for more than a week past. I had a most important proposition to make to you. I am afraid you have come too late. However, I will make the proposition now." Said he, "Mr. Baldwin, we have in Fort Sumter with Major Anderson about eighty men, and I learn from Major Anderson that his provisions are nearly exhausted—that he has so much beef, so much pork, so many bushels of beans, potatoes, &c., but that his bread will not last longer than a particular day. I forget whether he said the next Wednesday or the Wednesday after, but at that time his bread would give out. I have not only written to Governor Pickens, but I have sent a special messenger to him to say that if he will allow Major Anderson to obtain his marketing at the Charleston market, or if he objects to allowing our people to land at Charleston, if he will have it sent to him, that I will make no effort to provision the fort; but that if he does not do that, I will not permit these people to starve, and that I shall send provisions down—that I shall send a vessel loaded with bread," (that was his expression, by which, of course, I understood provisions generally,) "and that if he fires on that vessel he will fire upon an unarmed vessel loaded with nothing but bread; but I shall at the same time send a fleet along with her, with instructions not to enter the harbor of Charleston unless that vessel is fired into; and if she is, then the fleet is to enter the harbor and protect her. Now," said he, "Mr. Baldwin, that fleet is now lying in the harbor of New York, and will be ready to sail this afternoon at five o'clock; and although I fear it is almost too late, yet I will submit, anyway, the proposition which I intended when I sent for Mr. Summers. Your convention in Richmond, Mr. Baldwin, has been sitting now nearly two months, and all that they have done has been to shake the rod over my head. You have recently taken a vote in the Virginia convention on the right of secession, which was rejected by ninety to forty-five, a majority of two-thirds, showing the strength of the Union party in that convention; and if you will go back to Richmond and get that Union majority to adjourn and go home without passing the ordinance of secession, so anxious am I for the preservation of the peace of this country, and to save Virginia and the other border States from going out, that I will take the responsibility of evacuating Fort Sumter, and take the chance of negotiating with the cotton States which have already gone out." "Well," said I, "Mr. Lincoln, how did Mr. Baldwin receive that proposition?" Raising his hands up in this way, (illustrating,) he said: "Sir, he would not listen to it for a moment; he hardly treated me with civility. He asked me what I meant by an adjournment; did I mean an adjournment sine die. 'Why, of course, Mr. Baldwin,' said I, 'I mean an adjournment sine die. I do not mean to assume such a responsibility as that of surrendering that fort to the people of Charleston upon your adjournment, and then for you to return in a week or ten days and pass your ordinance of secession after I have given up the fort.'"

As a matter of course I felt very much incensed that Mr. Baldwin should have rejected a proposition which, it was manifest, as I thought at that time, would be the only means of saving the country from the calamities through which it has passed; and I said at once: "Mr. Lincoln, will you authorize me to make that proposition to the Union men of the convention? I will take the steamboat to-morrow morning and have a meeting of the Union men to-morrow night, and I will guarantee, with my head, that they will adopt your proposition, and adopt it willingly and cheerfully." "Oh," said Mr. Lincoln, "it is too late; the fleet has sailed, and I have no means of communicating with it." "Well," said I, "will you authorize me to mention this circumstance for your own benefit? because the attempt will be made by all the demagogues in the southern country to impose the responsibilities of this war upon your shoulders; and they will say that you have come here for the purpose of making war upon the institutions of the south, and that you cannot be driven from it." His reply was: "Well, not just now, Botts; after awhile you may." The inference I drew from it was this: that Mr. Lincoln was assuming a responsibility which would, at that day, have been extremely distasteful to those who had elevated him to the presidency, but which I think it is due now to history and to the character of Mr. Lincoln to make known, for it should elevate him in the minds of all men, to see how anxious he was, and what personal sacrifices he was prepared to make, in order to save the country from that ruinous and destructive war which he foresaw.

Question. Did you take any memorandum of that conversation?

Answer. I did not. There was no necessity for it. It was impressed so strongly upon my mind that it could never be obliterated.

Question. Was anybody else present at that conversation?

Answer. There was not; but Mr. Lincoln has made the same statement to others, whose names I will give you before I conclude.

Question. Did Mr. Lincoln say anything about issuing a proclamation, calling a convention of the States, with a view to settle these difficulties?

Answer. He did not.

Question. Are you quite sure of that?

Answer. I am quite sure he did not.

Question. Are you perfectly sure, according to your best recollection, that Mr. Lincoln told you that he had made that proposition to Mr. Baldwin to evacuate Fort Sumter on this condition?

Answer. I know it as well as I know you are standing before me and that I am answering your question.

Question. Are you blessed with a good, retentive memory?

Answer. I think that is pretty generally conceded by those who know me best; but it needs no distinct recollection on that subject, for I will proceed to show that the truth of this conversation was admitted to me in the presence of another gentleman. Although there was no person present when Mr. Lincoln made this communication to me, there was another gentleman present when Mr. Baldwin admitted it.

Question. Go on with your narrative.

Answer. Of course, as Mr. Lincoln had declined to give me authority

Question. He did not wish you to mention the conversation just then?

Answer. Just at that time; after awhile I might. I was very much surprised that, after we got into the war, he did not make it known. I thought Mr. Lincoln would introduce the subject, and make that representation in his first communication to Congress. I thought it was due to himself that he should. Inasmuch as Mr. Lincoln expressed a desire that I should not say anything about it at that time, of course I did not, in a general way. I remained in Washington until Monday morning, the 15th day of April, which was the day his proclamation was issued. The next evening—my house in Richmond being, as it were, something like the headquarters of the Union party when I was at home—quite a number of gentlemen called upon me. In the course of conversation I mentioned it in rather a private way, because I did not feel myself at liberty then to make it a general communication to the gentlemen in the room. I mentioned, in a private way, to Mr. J. F. Lewis, of Rockingham county, who was a very warm and zealous friend of Mr. Baldwin, and who had the most unlimited confidence in his loyalty and patriotism, this conversation that I had with Mr. Lincoln, and I asked Mr. Lewis if he had heard anything of it. He said he had not heard a word of it, and "moreover," said he, "I do not believe it. I would not believe any man that I was not entirely familiar with, who would charge that John Baldwin had taken upon himself such a responsibility as to have rejected the proposition, or to have withheld it from his Union colleagues in the convention, who would most gladly have adopted it. And," said he, "if you do not object to it, I would like to ask Mr. Baldwin about it." Said I, "so far from my objecting to it, I prefer that you would ask him, as you have intimated a doubt of the veracity of Mr. Lincoln." Mr. Lewis left my house at the usual bed hour, and I think he visited Mr. Baldwin that night; whether it was that night or the next morning, I am not prepared to say; but before I was out of bed the next morning Mr. Lewis came to my room and told me that he had seen Mr. Baldwin, and that Mr. Baldwin had acknowledged to him that the proposition was made, and that, upon his telling him that I felt very much concerned about his having taken such a responsibility upon himself, Mr. Baldwin said he would like to see Mr. Botts and make an explanation on the subject, and of the reason why he had rejected it. "And," said Mr. Lewis, "he has consented to come up with me immediately after breakfast, and as soon as I can have breakfast I shall bring him up here in a hack." Shortly after I had finished my breakfast, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Baldwin were announced. I went into the front room, and Mr. Lewis, Mr. Baldwin being present, said to me, after the exchange of salutations, "Well, Mr. Botts, Mr. Baldwin has come up here to make some explanation to you about the circumstances connected with the conversation with Mr. Lincoln, and why he declined to accept the proposition." "Well," said I, "Mr. Baldwin, is it true that Mr. Lincoln did propose to you that if the convention would adjourn and go home without passing the ordinance of secession, he would evacuate Fort Sumter?" "Yes," said Mr. Baldwin, "he did." "My God," said I, "Mr. Baldwin, why did you reject such a proposition as that?" The only answer he made me was by taking out his watch and saying, "it only wants twenty minutes of the hour of meeting of the convention, when a most important vote is to be taken," (which I knew to be the vote on the ordinance of secession;) "I am obliged to be there punctually at the hour, and I have not time to make the explanation I desire, but I will avail myself of the earliest opportunity to make a full explanation of the whole of it." From that day to this I have not hid my eyes on Mr. Baldwin, nor have I heard any explanation from him, nor have I had directly any communication from him. I have been informed that Mr. Baldwin gets very much excited whenever the subject is mentioned in his presence; and I have also been told that his brother-in-law, Mr. Robert Gray, of Rockingham county, has said that, on one occasion, when he spoke to Mr. Baldwin about it, he became very much excited indeed, and threatened what he would do towards Mr. Botts if Mr. Botts should attempt to use that against him. It was not until about two or three weeks ago that I ever heard of any denial on the part of Mr. Baldwin. Mr. Alexander Rives was at my house and communicated the fact to me that Mr. Baldwin's friends, in his neighborhood, (Charlottesville,) were saying that Mr. Baldwin denied this conversation between Mr. Lincoln and himself, when I replied, "I do not believe it. I believe that John Baldwin is too honorable a man to make a denial of anything so palpable and so true, and which he knows could be proved upon him." But on hearing this from Mr. Rives, I immediately wrote to Mr. Lewis, saying to him, in substance, "You know, Lewis, that I have written a history of this war for thirty years before it broke out, and that I have given this circumstance as an incident connected with the war, as due to history and due to the memory of Mr. Lincoln, which I think will go to elevate him in the eyes of all good men for the sacrifice he was willing to make for the good of his country; and you are the only person by whom I can prove Mr. Baldwin's admission; therefore I want to fortify myself with the proof in the event that hereafter Mr. Baldwin may deny it. You must write me a letter giving me substantially everything that you recollect about it." Mr. Lewis promised me to do it; but he has never done it. I have met with him once or twice since, and have said to him, "You have forgotten to write me that letter, and I must be fortified with proof." One day during last week I met with Mr. Lewis at Willard's hotel, and in the course of our conversation I said, "Lewis, you have never written me that letter yet, and, as life is very uncertain, I do not mean to let you die without leaving it behind you, and I do not mean to leave you now until you give me that letter." To which he replied, "There is no occasion for it. I have put it all down in my testimony before the Reconstruction Committee on oath;" so that instead of Mr. Lewis coming to sustain me, I am now coming here to sustain Mr. Lewis. I want to mention further, that there was some other gentleman whom I met here during the winter, whose name I blame myself very much for forgetting, (names and figures I never can recollect, but circumstances and conversations that come under my observation, if they leave an impression upon my mind at all, are very distinct, and are as fresh in my memory, I believe, for forty years past, as they would have been had they occurred yesterday,) and who told me that Mr. Lincoln had mentioned the same thing to him. Within the last four weeks, in conversation with Governor Peirpoint on this subject, expressing my surprise at having it intimated that Mr. Baldwin denied it, Governor Peirpoint remarked to me that Mr. Lincoln made the same statement to him. I may have confounded the conversation of Governor Peirpoint with that of the gentleman who spoke to me at Willard's; but it was one or the other of them, and I think Governor Peirpoint, who said that Mr. Lincoln communicated the same facts to him, with this addition, that Mr. Baldwin also demanded the surrender of Fortress Monroe; to which I replied, "Mr. Lincoln made no such communication as that to me."

Question. There are two circumstances, then, tending to corroborate your statement—that made by the gentleman at the hotel, and that made by Governor Peirpoint. Is there any other circumstance of a corroborative nature? Did Mr. Lincoln repeat this conversation to anybody else?

Answer. Not that I am aware of. I have talked very little about this thing. There was no occasion for it during the existence of the rebellion. I always intended—for the book which I have written was written in 1861—communicating it in that history of the war, or the antecedents of the war, and there has been little opportunity to do it since. I have conversed with very few persons on the subject.

Question. If there be any other circumstance connected with that particular transaction going to corroborate the statement which you have made, will you relate it?

Answer. I do not recollect any, except I believe that the fleet did sail about that time, and it can be readily ascertained whether Mr. Lincoln did send a messenger to Governor Pickens with that communication, which would be a corroborating circumstance.

Question. Have you ever heard of the existence of such a communication?

Answer. I think I have seen some mention of it in the papers; but I do not recollect exactly when or by whom. There is another circumstance which is partially corroborative. In an interview which I had with Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, now Chief Justice of the United States, I made some allusion to Mr. Lincoln's proposition, and Mr. Chase asked me what proposition I alluded to. I said "his proposition relative to the action of the Virginia convention." Said he, "I do not know what that is; what is it?" To which I replied, "Well, Mr. Chase, if you don't know it, it is not for me to communicate it." I had taken it for granted that it had been mentioned; but I suppose that Mr. Lincoln had forbore to mention it to his cabinet until he ascertained whether it would be successful or not. Another circumstance presents itself at this moment to my mind which does serve to corroborate this statement. Mr. John Lewis was the colleague in the convention of Mr. Algernon S. Gray, and they occupied the same room. Mr. Lewis told me that when he mentioned to Mr. Gray the conversation which had passed between him and myself in reference to Mr. Lincoln's proposition to Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Gray exhibited the most extraordinary surprise, that he sprang out of bed and said, "Where in the world did you get that from?" Mr. Lewis told him that Mr. Botts had just returned from Washington, and had communicated it to him that night, to which Mr. Gray replied, "I did not suppose there were more than three men in the city of Richmond who know of it." Mr. Gray has informed me that he has been summoned to appear before this committee, and that would be a very proper subject of interrogation. You asked me if I were certain that Mr. Lincoln said nothing about a proclamation calling a national convention. I am sure of it, because it was a proposition which I had myself submitted to Mr. Lincoln at an early day. I came here—I do not recollect the date—during the agony under which we were laboring everywhere, and I submitted to Mr. Bates, the Attorney General, with whom I was very intimate, a proposition which he requested me to submit at once to Mr. Seward. I submitted it to Mr. Seward, and Mr. Seward requested me at once to lay it before the President, and he gave me a note to the President, saying that I had a most important suggestion to make to him. I went at once to Mr. Lincoln, and I made the suggestion. It was this: that he should issue his proclamation calling a national convention so to amend the Constitution as to give to the cotton States that had already seceded leave to go out, and thereby to save the question of the right of secession; the object of which was, as I explained to Mr. Lincoln, to make this a foreign and not a civil war, to save Virginia, and the other border States which would be influenced by her action, to the Union, and that if they did not come to their senses and ask for readmission within a certain limited time, it would be a capital occasion to apply the principle of the Monroe doctrine or the doctrine of the Ostend manifesto to them, to give them a little of their own physic, to conquer them and hold them as conquered provinces until they were fit to come in again as States. This I afterwards submitted in a correspondence to Mr. Bates. Therefore, if Mr. Lincoln had said anything about the proclamation, it would have been so entirely in accordance with the proposition submitted by me to him that I could not have forgotten it. When I mentioned the matter to Mr. Lincoln he said that it was a proposition worthy of the highest consideration, and that it should have his attention.

[The testimony of John B. Baldwin, hitherto taken before this committee, in reference to his interview with President Lincoln, was here read to the witness.]

Question. Do you wish to say anything in reference to the statement of Mr. Baldwin?

Answer. I cannot undertake to account for the discrepancy between Mr. Baldwin's recollection and Mr. Lincoln's, or between Mr. Baldwin's recollection and that of Mr. Lewis and myself; nor will I undertake to express an opinion on the question of veracity which would be raised between Mr. Lincoln's statement and Mr. Baldwin's admission, about which I do not think it is possible that either Mr. Lewis or myself can be mistaken. I have had so little disposition to do Mr. Baldwin an injury by making a public statement of this terrible responsibility, which I have always felt rested on his shoulders, that in the historical account I have given of it I had left the name of Mr. Baldwin in blank, and should not have given the name, as it was not material to the truth of history that the name should be given, until I heard that Mr. Baldwin had denied it, and then I determined to give Mr. Baldwin the benefit of a public denial by inserting his name, which I have done.

Question. You then resided in Richmond?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You were personally known, perhaps, to every member of the convention; they were your acquaintances, were they not?

Answer. I was living in Richmond, and I suppose that, either personally or politically, I was known to every member of the body, although I think that there were perhaps some members in the convention with whom I had formed no particular personal acquaintance, but my acquaintance with both parties was very general.

Question. If Mr. Baldwin had returned to Richmond, and, as he remarks in his testimony, had reported the interview which he had with President Lincoln to many persons, members of the convention, is it not likely you would have known of that report?

Answer. If he had reported it as Mr. Lincoln had reported it to me, I unquestionably should have known it; and I think there is no doubt whatever that if it had been mentioned to those gentlemen with whom I had communication, the Union men of the convention, it is scarcely possible it would have been withheld from me. But Mr. Gray's declaration, who was on terms of as close intimacy with Mr. Baldwin as any gentleman in the convention, shows, I think, that it could not have been mentioned, as Mr. Gray expressed the supposition that it had not been known to more than three persons in the city of Richmond.

Question. And if the report of that interview of Mr. Baldwin with President Lincoln had been made, as he has given it here in his testimony, would you not have been just as likely to have known it?

Answer. I think that in the event of any communication of that kind being made to the Union men I was obliged to have heard it, because they came to my house every night to consult and confer together as to the condition of things in the convention, and as to the course to be pursued in reference to the various questions constantly arising. It is hardly possible to suppose that some one or more of them would not have mentioned the interview. But I never have heard any member of that convention speak of the interview, except Mr. Lewis, Mr. Gray, and Mr. Baldwin himself, that I recollect.

Question. Can you fix the date on which you first heard of Mr. Baldwin having had an interview with President Lincoln?

Answer. Most distinctly; it was on Sunday night, the 7th of April, 1861.

Question. Then you first heard of it?

Answer. Then I first heard of it.

Question. From Mr. Lincoln?

Answer. Yes.

Question. You had not heard of it before?

Answer. I had not heard of it before. I know that Mr. Baldwin was here to see Mr. Lincoln, but under what circumstances and for what purpose I did not know.

Question. You heard it on the 7th?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Mr. Baldwin testified that the interview took place on the 4th of April; where were you on the 5th and 6th?

Answer. I reached the city of Washington on the morning of the 5th or the evening of the 5th, I cannot recollect which; but my impression is that I left home on the night of the 4th, and reached here on the morning of the 5th.

Question. Suppose that proposition had been made fairly and openly to the Unionists of the Virginia convention, what effect would it have had—I mean Mr. Lincoln's proposition as stated to you?

Answer. I have no hesitation in saying that it would have met with, in my opinion, the very general concurrence of the Union men, with whom I was in constant association; and that the democratic members themselves, not knowing the cause of the movement to adjourn, would all have voted for an adjournment, for the very reason that they had just been beaten so very badly on the resolution touching the right of secession that they were themselves anxious for an adjournment, having despaired of being able to carry an ordinance of secession through the convention.

Question. Do you apprehend that the adjournment of that convention would have prevented the State of Virginia from going out of the Union and joining the southern confederacy?

Answer. Most unquestionably. I have no idea that a majority, or anything approximating a majority, of the people of Virginia, were, at the time of the passage of the ordinance of secession in convention, in favor of it.

Question. Suppose that proposition had been made, and suppose the convention had adjourned sine die, do you think that the calling of a national convention by the President would have prevented war?

Answer. I do, sir. I do not know that it would have prevented it ultimately between the United States and the States which had already seceded; but I think it would have prevented Virginia from going out, and I think that the action of North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, and Missouri all depended in a very material degree on the action of Virginia.

Question. If this whole proposition had been communicated to the Unionists of the Virginia convention, together with a call for a national convention, would that have prevented the breaking out of civil war?

Answer. I think it would, for the reason that, although the democracy, which never meant to be satisfied with anything but war, despairing of being able to carry the ordinance, would have voted for the adjournment; whilst the Union men, who wanted peace, would also have voted for an adjournment.

Question. You are well acquainted with Mr. Baldwin?

Answer. I never had any personal intimacy with Mr. Baldwin. I have known him for a number of years, but we have had no particular personal intimacy.

Question. How did he vote in the convention upon the final question of secession?

Answer. On the first vote on the ordinance of secession he voted against it.

Question. State what his general course was?

Answer. Mr. Baldwin voted against the ordinance of secession on the 17th of April, 1861. Within some two or three days after the passage of the ordinance, and before the ordinance had been submitted to the people, (who had reserved to themselves the right to pass upon any ordinance of the convention touching the organic law of the land, by a vote of 56,000 majority,) which did not take place till some five weeks afterwards, Mr. Baldwin, as I always understood, accepted a military commission in the service of the confederate government, which he retained till the close of the war. He subsequently signed his name to the ordinance of secession, which was characterized at that day as a second declaration of independence, and which I had always characterized as a declaration of war against the United States. He also, I believe, voted for the ordinance when it was submitted to the people, and he was then elected to the confederate congress, and was, as I learned, by a special act of the confederate congress, permitted to occupy that seat without surrendering his military commission.

Question. Did he serve in the congress during the war?

Answer. Throughout the war, from that time until the close of it. I think he was elected in 1861 a member of congress, and occupied that position until the end of the war.

Question. What post did he occupy on committees in congress?

Answer. I did not pay sufficient attention to the matter to know.

Question. Do you know what his general course was as a member of that congress?

Answer. As far as I saw or heard anything about it, I always considered him as being as ultra in his hostility to a restoration of peace without its being accompanied by a recognition of the independence of the southern States, as any gentleman in the body.

Question. Such was his reputation?

Answer. That was the position he occupied, so far as I could draw an inference from the proceedings in congress when I saw them; and I think it was his general reputation among the loyal and disloyal men in Virginia. At the time of the passage of the ordinance of secession by the convention, I thought a large majority of the people were utterly opposed to secession, while it was voted for five weeks afterwards. If you would like to know the reason of the change in public sentiment between the passage of the ordinance by the convention and its being submitted to the people, I will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, sir, proceed.

WITNESS. Notwithstanding the people had decided, by a majority of 56,000, to make this a convention of limited powers, over which they reserved a revisory power, the authorities—whether by direction of the convention or the State authorities I am not informed—proceeded next day after the passage of the ordinance by the convention to involve the State of Virginia in actual and active war with the United States by seizing Harper's Ferry, the post office and custom-house in Richmond, the custom-house and post office in Norfolk and Portsmouth, the Gosport navy yard and all the material of war therein contained, and by sinking vessels in the channel of Elizabeth river to prevent the escape of United States vessels then lying at or near Gosport navy yard, and thereby securing them to their own purposes, and then by introducing a large number of troops from other southern States and making a general camping ground throughout Eastern Virginia. They then very quietly turned to the people, when they had to vote on the ordinance, and said: "Now we are involved in war, and the rejection of the ordinance will not stop the war; so you can vote for the ordinance of secession or against it, as you like. But, in the language of the Emperor Napoleon's friends, we advise you to vote for the Emperor." You know that expression was made use of when Louis Napoleon was voted an imperial diadem. The people found that it would be utterly useless, and at the same time extremely dangerous for them to exercise the privilege of freemen; and there was a general and almost universal acquiescence in what they could not prevent.

Question. Was the final vote of the people on the ordinance as large as usual?

Answer. I never saw the vote, and I have often inquired why the vote was not published. If it ever was published I have not seen it.

Question. Where are the returns kept?

Answer. Among the select few, I suppose.

Question. They never have been published?

Answer. I do not say that. I have never seen the vote, nor have I seen anybody who has seen it. I have no doubt that a large majority of those who did vote voted for the ordinance; but whether that vote constituted a majority of the legal voters of the State of Virginia I have never had any means of ascertaining. I know that the vote against it was very small, because in the city of Richmond, which had given me some seventeen or eighteen hundred votes against my competitor, and could therefore, I suppose, have given some fifteen or sixteen hundred votes against the ordinance of secession, actually gave only two votes against it. To illustrate the farce and mockery of the vote taken at that time, I will mention that there were assembled at that time a large body of troops at and around Norfolk, among them a regiment then commanded by Colonel Roger A. Pryor. This regiment was composed principally, if not entirely, of Union men, and when it was found they were voting against the ordinance, they were disbanded and not allowed to vote. This was the statement frequently made, and I have never heard contradicted, and I believe it to be true.

Question. What is the present feeling of the ex-rebels in Virginia generally towards the government of the United States?

Answer. At the time of the surrender of General Lee's army and the restoration of peace I think there was, not only a general, but an almost universal, acquiescence and congratulation among the people that the war had terminated, and a large majority of them were at least contented, if not gratified, that it had terminated by a restoration of the State to the Union. At that time the leaders, too, seemed to have been entirely subdued. They had become satisfied that Mr. Lincoln was a noble, kind-hearted, generous man, from whom they had little to fear; but when he was assassinated, and Mr. Johnson took his place, they remembered Mr. Johnson's declarations in the Senate of the United States before the war, his own treatment during the war by the secession party, and his declarations after he came to Washington as the Vice-President of the United States, in one or more speeches, but especially in a speech in which he declared that treason was a crime which must be punished. They felt exceedingly apprehensive for the security of their property, as well as for the security of their lives; and a more humble, unpretending set of gentlemen I never saw than they were at that time. But from the time that Mr. Johnson commenced his indiscriminate system of pardoning all who made application, and from impositions which, I have no doubt, were practiced upon Mr. Johnson in pardoning the worst class of secessionists among the first, they became bold, insolent, and defiant; and this was increased to a very large extent by the permission which was, immediately after the evacuation of Richmond, given by General Patrick, the democratic copperhead provost marshal of the army of the Potomac, to the original conductors of the public press before the rebellion to re-establish their papers, I believe, without restriction or limitation, upon any of the proprietors; since which time, I think, the spirit of disloyalty and disaffection has gone on increasing day by day, and hour by hour, until among the leaders generally there is as much disaffection and disloyalty as there was at any time during the war, and a hundred-fold more than there was immediately after the evacuation and the surrender of the army. This is the conclusion to which my mind has been brought by the licentiousness of the press, and by communications which are made to me from all parts of the State, either verbally or by letter, from the most prominent and reliable Union sources. If I were to judge from anything I have ever heard personally from these gentlemen, I should not think there was any very great difference between their loyalty and yours or mine; but I hear of it elsewhere, and I see evidence of it daily, not only in the public press, but in the proceedings of the so-called legislature of the State. It is no more a body of legislature than we compose one here now. I believe if the leaders and the public press could be restrained in their expressions and inculcations of disloyalty, with the masses of the people we should have no trouble whatever. As indicative of the character of the letters I often receive, I give you the following extract of a letter from a prominent Union man of the State, received last night:

"As an individual, and I think not a very timid one, I have no hopes of future loyalty unless the President and Congress can relieve the masses of the political incubus now weighing them to the ground. Hour after hour the democracy here are becoming more bold, more intolerant, more proscriptive. Was the war in all its horrid consequences designed to establish a democratic oligarchy here in the south and eventually turn over the general government with all its patronage and power to this pack of bloodhounds? Or was it designed to preserve the Union, maintain liberty, and wipe out forever all sectional parties? If for the former, then the prevailing policy will soon effect it; and when it does, I pray that God will cause a universal earthquake and blot out that portion of his footstool comprised within the United States. Under democratic rule again, hell would be a garden of Eden compared to the southern States, and I should assuredly select it as a permanent place of abode if forced to choose between the two."

In this latter conclusion I think I should rather dissent from my friend. Bad as democratic rule is, I would rather bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of. But it is bad enough in all conscience; and from the tone of that and other letters, of a similar character to a great extent, received from different parts of the State, and conversations which I have had with gentlemen from every portion of the State, whose opinions are reliable and trustworthy, there must be, I conclude, a very intolerable state of things existing.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that there are in existence now, among the leaders of the late rebellion, any schemes, secret or open, for renewing the war or again asserting the principle of secession?

Answer. I have no idea that there is any purpose of renewing the war, without money, without arms, without men, and without materials of war; but that there are many political leaders who, in the event of a war with any foreign power, would throw every obstacle and every impediment in the way of the success of the United States, if they did not join that foreign power outright, I can entertain no doubt, from all the representations which have been made to me by those who have heard such opinions expressed, although I have heard no such opinion expressed in my presence.

Question. In the event of a war between the United States and any foreign power, such as France or England, and under circumstances which would seem to hold out a fair hope of success on the part of the rebels, would you anticipate that many of them would join the army of the enemy against the United States?

Answer. I have no reason to suppose that the enemy would be joined by any except some of the more reckless and mortified, chagrined political leaders, and who claim that their vocation exempts them from participating in the fight, and who would always be able to carry with them a portion of the masses who have been for so many years under their influence; if not under their absolute control; but among the officers of the late rebel army, and among the masses of the people, who do the fighting as a general thing, I have no reason to believe that any such feeling exists. I believe that the most constant and earnest prayer of many of these political leaders is that the United States shall be involved in a foreign war; and they hope for it from some indiscretion on the part of the civil authorities in Washington, or from some inadvertent step that may be taken by the military authorities on the Rio Grande.

Question. You would regard the southern States in their present condition and with their present feeling towards the United States as a source of weakness to the government, and not of strength, in the event of a foreign war?

Answer. I should consider those who manage the affairs of state, generally, as very unsafe custodians of the public liberty or the public interests, and that you would be a great deal better off if they were in France instead of in this country.

Question. You are acquainted with the proposed amendment of the Constitution now pending in the Senate of the United States?

Answer. I understand it.

Question. What is your opinion about any of the southern States ever adopting that amendment by their legislature?

Answer. I have no idea that any one of them would in the present temper of the public mind.

Question. Is it probable that they would during future ages?

Answer. Oh, yes; I think that the fact of the slaves being emancipated will lead to their ultimate education and improvement and fit them for the exercise of qualified suffrage in the course of years, and that then the States would be very glad to avail themselves of the increased representation which could be based on that population, but not now.

Question. Is it practicable in Virginia, either by act of legislation or by an amendment of her constitution, to restrict the right of suffrage in the case of white persons; for instance, to introduce a property qualification or an intelligence qualification?

Answer. I think there is a very general desire to do it, and for the reason that I think that class of voters which would be excluded constitutes by far the most loyal portion of the State—the men who have seen service and have had enough of war.

Question. Would those who might be excluded vote for it?

Answer. No; but the leaders would adopt a constitution without submitting it to the people in order to get rid of them.

Question. How would it be in regard to numbers; would they have numbers enough to adopt such a restriction?

Answer. Of course a very large majority of the people have been involved in the rebellion.

Question. Is there any contemplated purpose to hold a convention in Virginia?

Answer. I have been informed by many persons, embracing members of the present so-called legislature of Virginia, that it was the purpose of some leaders of that body, before they adjourned, to call a convention which would, under regulations to be adopted by the legislature, insure an overwhelming majority of those persons who sympathized with or participated in the war, which would lead to the most violent proscription that they dared to practice toward all Union and loyal men who had not participated in the war, as has been exhibited by the action of that body now in session, in removing from office every loyal man whom they could reach, and putting in their places men who had no other recommendation than their sympathy for, or participation in, the rebellion. Their purpose is supposed to be, if he has not more wisdom than to lend his assent to it, to place General Robert E. Lee, who was at the head of the rebellion, in the gubernatorial chair. This was indicated by an expression of Mr. John B. Baldwin, of whom we have been speaking, and who is now speaker of the house of delegates, when he descended from his chair a short time back, on the election of a subordinate officer, and declared that he hoped the day was near at hand when General Robert E. Lee would fill that position; which, the papers stated, was received with great applause, both in the galleries and on the floor.

Question. How are Unionists treated generally in the State, whether native Unionists or parties from other States which have come there?

Answer. During the war they were treated generally with great unkindness by the government, and there were a great many political prisoners kept in the same prison house, or negro jail, with me; they were treated very harshly and unkindly. Since the rebellion, I have known of no instance of actual violence having been resorted to on the part of any portion of our people towards any Union man, whether of northern or southern birth; but there is a social ban put upon them; there is scarcely a recognition of acquaintanceship, to say nothing of friendly feeling, on the part of secessionists and their families towards the Union people in the cities. And when the officers now stationed at Richmond, under command of General Terry, have, on several occasions, given social parties, or "hops" as they are called, with the hope and for the purpose of introducing a better state of feeling among these two classes of people, the parties were not only not attended by the ladies of Richmond generally, but even those of Union families seemed to be apprehensive of presenting themselves at such places, because of the effect it would produce on their social position, and because it was the custom of a part of the press of the city to attach ridicule and discredit to every lady who attended these parties, and who were mentioned by name. There is a good deal more of this feeling in the cities than in the country. In my immediate neighborhood there is not a great deal of it.

Question. How much chance does a Union man stand in your State courts to obtain justice?

Answer. Well, sir, I have no reason, from anything that has yet transpired there, to think that the courts would not do justice to a Union man. I think it would create a decidedly unfavorable effect upon the standing and character of any magistrate upon the bench who would be supposed to be influenced by such a consideration.

Question. How would it be with the juries?

Answer. Well, sir, I have nothing to do with the courts, and cannot speak with any certainty on that subject further than this: I received a letter from a gentleman a short time since, who was not personally known to me, but who represented himself to be a native Virginian, a refugee during the war, and to be now connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Staunton, saying that they had gotten up a memorial in Augusta county, which had been signed by some five hundred of the most respectable people of the county, asking that Congress should require that, in all cases coming before the courts in which Union men were concerned, they should be transferred to a military court, for the reason that a Union man could not obtain justice in the State courts, and asking me whether, if that memorial was sent to me, I would indorse it; to which I replied that I could not promise my indorsement to a paper which I had not seen, and without knowing the character of the persons who had signed the memorial; but that, if he thought proper to send his memorial to me, I would give it the proper direction, and let the parties to whom it was sent make those inquiries for themselves.

Question. What is the political character of the present legislature of Virginia?

Answer. My opinion is, from observations made during my recent visit to Richmond, that that body is composed of a majority of respectable, orderly, intelligent farmers, and others who have not heretofore had any experience in legislation, who are wholly unaccustomed to meeting in debate with practiced politicians and lawyers of reputation, and that, although they constitute, if they had any organization among themselves, a majority of conservative men, yet from the want of that organization, and from the want of a leader, they suffer themselves to be carried away on every question of party interest by a few leading and designing politicians on the other side. I found gentlemen, when I went there, sitting side by side, day by day, who knew nothing of the political sentiments of each other. I think that if the people at the elections in October last meant any one thing more particularly than another, it was that they were tired of the misrule to which they had been so long subjected, and for which they had paid so dearly by the results of the war, and were determined, so far as their action was concerned, to place the control of the government in safer and better hands, but that their views and desires had been entirely frustrated, from the causes I have already mentioned.

Question. What is the general feeling of the white people of Virginia in regard to the education of the blacks?

Answer. I think that the more intelligent classes of the people would be very glad to see information and education diffused among the blacks, as being calculated not only to benefit their own condition, but to make them better citizens among themselves.

Question. Would they consent to contribute of their own means to educate the blacks?

Answer. There are a great many who would, and a great many who would not. I think, as a general thing, however, that it would be a difficult matter to get up a very large subscription for that purpose.

Question. I mean in the form of legislation and taxation.

Answer. That comes in a different shape, and men do not feel it so sensibly as when it comes directly out of their pockets.

Question. Do they generally feel kindly towards the freedmen, and willing to allow him the privileges of his industry?

Answer. I think that among the educated, well-informed, and better classes of the people there is a disposition to do them justice. But there are other classes with whom, as a matter of course, there are very strong prejudices existing, which time alone can probably cure, and which may be increased or diminished according to circumstances. I think that one of the great difficulties in Virginia, in regard to the colored people, arises from the organization of the Freedmen's Bureau—not that the Freedmen's Bureau is not in itself a proper, and perhaps in some localities an indispensable institution, but that it stands very greatly in need of reformation.

Question. In its administration?

Answer. In its administration, and in its officers. I have heard of a great many difficulties and outrages which have proceeded in some instances, if the truth has been represented to me, from the ignorance and fanaticism of persons connected with the Freedmen's Bureau, who do not understand anything of the true relation of the original master to the slave, and who have, in many instances, held out promises and inducements which can never be realized to the negroes, which have made them entirely indifferent to work, and sometimes ill-behaved. On the other hand, there are many of the persons connected with the Freedmen's Bureau who have conducted themselves with great propriety; and where that has been so, there has been no difficulty between the whites and blacks that I know of.

Question. Do you think that the liberality of President Johnson, in granting pardons and amnesties, and using other measures, which appertain to him personally, towards the rebel community, has had a greater tendency to restore peace and harmony there, than the contrary?

Answer. Very far from it. I think that if Mr. Johnson had held his pardons up until the State was reorganized and placed in the hands of the loyal men of the State, there would have been no difficulty; but they have seemed to think, when they got the pardons, that they not only had the penalties of death and confiscation of property remitted to them, but that they were restored to all their political rights, State constitution and congressional enactments to the contrary notwithstanding, which were all overridden and trampled down by Mr. Johnson's pardons. Mr. Johnson has said, in his recent interview with the delegation from the Virginia legislature, that he thought if there were five thousand loyal men, or even a smaller number, in a State, they were entitled to exercise a controlling influence over that State in its legislation, in which I entirely concur with him. But Mr. Johnson's opinions on that subject do not help the loyal men much unless he will help to put them on the track, when they will keep the machinery in motion.

Question. The difference being the difference between saying and doing?

Answer. If he will carry that view into effect, to the extent of his civil and military power, they will bring the State back to its proper moorings, but they can do nothing without either the aid of Mr. Johnson or of the law-making power of the United States.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I should like to say that I think Mr. Johnson has been actuated in his policy by too much confidence and liberality towards people who did not appreciate it, and did not meet it in the spirit in which his liberality was tendered, and that the sooner he retraces his steps, so far as is possible, in that particular, in holding out hopes of aid from him to those who have brought all these calamities upon the country, the better it will be for himself, the better for the south, and the better for the nation.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 15, 1866.

Colonel Orlando Brown sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. My home is in Massachusetts.

Question. Where have you been recently residing?

Answer. I have been residing since the 15th of June in Richmond, Virginia. Previous to that time I had resided in Norfolk. I had been on duty in Norfolk since February, 1862.

Question. What official position do you hold?

Answer. Assistant commissioner in the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands.

Question. And as such you have been stationed at Richmond?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How do you find the state of feeling in Richmond towards the freedmen? How are they treated?

Answer. There is a disposition on the part of citizens to secure, as far as possible, the same control over the freedmen by contracts which they possessed when they held them as slaves.

Question. Is there much ill-feeling towards the freedmen in that vicinity?

Answer. I hardly know how to answer that question. It seems to me more a feeling of irritation, perhaps, than of hatred. They seemed disposed to regard the freedmen almost universally as unfit to care for themselves. They think that a wrong has been done them in taking their slaves. They have not lost the feeling that they have a right to hold slaves, and they are not disposed—a large number of them—to forgive the negro for being free. But, on the other hand, there is a class—numerically small, but comprising some of the ablest and best men in the State—who are disposed to acknowledge them as free and to treat them as free men.

Question. Do they entertain generally an expectation that they will get pay for their slaves?

Answer. No, sir; I think not. In a few instances I have heard men who have been loyal throughout express that expectation, that they were entitled to compensation for their slaves.

Question. Are the freedmen willing to work generally for fair wages?

Answer. Yes, sir; for what any northern man would consider fair wages.

Question. Is there a disposition on the part of their white employers to allow them fair, living wages?

Answer. That disposition might exist if they had the means. They have not the means to allow them what would be considered living wages—wages to support a man and his family. It is unnecessary to say that they are wholly exhausted. A great deal of the land in Virginia is very poor, and on that poor land the farmer cannot afford to pay more than ten dollars per month to a laborer, even with the disposition to pay more. There is little other business in the State than agriculture.

Question. Do you find an abundance of money and personal property down there in Virginia among the secessionists?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. What is the state of things in that respect?

Answer. Most of the State having been overrun by our troops, the fences destroyed, the farming utensils used up during the war, the currency that they had worthless, and not being able to collect their notes, they have not the means to carry on agricultural pursuits so as to afford to pay the freedmen.

Question. Are they sufficiently supplied with horses, mules, &c.?

Answer. No, sir; they are not, although large numbers have been supplied by our army.

Question. Do you not find there great destitution in point of stock?

Answer. Yes, sir. Some of the best land on the James river will remain uncultivated this season because the owners have not the means to buy stock, hire laborers, buy tools, seeds, &c., and put the land under cultivation.

Question. How is it with the whites? Do they go to work individually and try to retrieve their fortunes, or do they lead a lazy, idle life?

Answer. I do not think they have fully settled yet what they will do.

Question. Do they go to work as our people at the north do?

Answer. No, sir; it is not in them to go to work as our people at the north. They have not so much energy.

Question. As a general thing, they and work do not particularly agree?

Answer. No, sir. As for manual labor, that is out of the question. The owners of plantations are not disposed to go to work with their hands; but they are being forced to do it, and they do it very unwillingly. They choose that rather than suffer.

Question. Is that generally the case wherever you have been acquainted among the farming community?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How much loyalty is there down there in Richmond, and how are loyal people treated?

Answer. If you mean a willing submission to the government—

Question. I mean loyalty in its general acceptation, a friendship for the government under which they live, and a disposition to uphold and maintain it.

Answer. They consider themselves in the Union by compulsion. A majority of them think that the cause they fought for was just; that in failing to accomplish their object they have been defrauded of their just rights, and that they had a right to secede. That sentiment has been expressed to me a great many times.

Question. Do you hear among them many regrets for having taken up arms against Uncle Sam?

Answer. Not so much as regret at the result. That seems to be the cause of regret. Governor Wise says he has been for the Union all through, and he adds: "Had we succeeded, we would have shown you what the Union was." He said to me a day or two ago, "I never fought under the confederate flag. It may have been carried in my brigade; but I have gone under the Virginia flag." And he showed me his buttons, Virginia buttons, which he said he had worn all through the war.

Question. Is there generally prevalent down there a feeling of disaffection or dislike towards the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir, I think there is.

Question. In what class is it strongest?

Answer. I think in the higher class. The lower classes, I think, are thankful to be out of the war under any consideration.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that there are any combinations among the secessionists there to renew the war or to make another attempt to secure southern independence?

Answer. No, sir, I have not. A conversation was repeated to me on the cars last night of Mr. Pollard's, whose paper has just been suppressed in Richmond. He stated that three hundred men had wished to drive the guard from his office and take possession of it, but that he dissuaded them from the attempt. This is hearsay evidence. It was reported to me by a gentleman from Philadelphia.

Question. Of what paper was he the editor?

Answer. The Richmond Examiner.

Question. What is, or has been, the political character of that paper?

Answer. Violent and saucy against the government of the United States; insolent, defiant, and false. It has carried along this vein of submission—that they submitted to the government.

Question. Is its editor related to the historian Pollard?

Answer. He is a brother.

Question. Do you know whether both, or either of them, served in the rebel army?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Both of them have been traitors, I suppose?

Answer. I think there is no doubt about that.

Question. What was the Examiner stopped for?

Answer. I heard here to-day that it was stopped by orders from General Grant for its disloyalty.

Question. Has that paper a large circulation?

Answer. I am unable to say what its circulation is. The true feeling in Virginia is well illustrated by an interview which I had with a gentleman in Richmond. I had received a letter from a gentleman in Boston, Mr. Stearns, in regard to the purchase of real estate in Virginia. I called upon a gentleman belonging to a very wealthy firm in Richmond, which held a large quantity of real estate, and inquired of him whether he had such property for sale. He said yes, and that he was obliged to sell it. I said that northern capital was looking for investment in Virginia; and I added that I thought that it would be for the best good of the country to get northern capital down there, as northern men would come with it; and that, from constant business intercourse, the feeling of hostility caused by the war would more readily pass away. He replied: "That can never be, sir; we have suffered too much. The atrocities and barbarities practiced by your army can never be forgotten by any true southern man. I have on file now a copy of one of Sheridan's official reports, and I expect when my children grow up they will read it, and will feel toward you northern men just as I do." It was shortly after the publication of Mr. Beecher's sermon, taking conservative ground. I referred him to that, showing him what the feeling of the men who had been considered radical in the north was. Said he, "Were I drowning in the most filthy ditch, and were Henry Ward Beecher to hold out his hand to draw me out I would not take it."

Question. He was the "last-ditch" man?

Answer. No; I think Ruffin was the only "last-ditch" man—the only consistent one.

Question. Did this person refuse to sell land to you?

Answer. No, sir, he did not. Their necessities were such that they were obliged to sell.

Question. How are northern men treated in Virginia?

Answer. Northern men are treated better than Union Virginians. I do not think they would be well treated if the troops were withdrawn.

Question. Would they not be generally driven out by threats, violence, and mobs?

Answer. I think they would in isolated localities. I might refer you to Norfolk, which has been for a long time in our possession. A great many northern men had come down there and commenced business. After the surrender of General Lee the owners of property immediately put up their rents so high that nearly all the Union men were compelled to leave.

Question. Did the owners afterwards rent their premises to southern persons?

Answer. The premises then fell into the hands of southern men.

Question. At lower rates?

Answer. Perhaps at lower rates, but I cannot say. The feeling among the northern men seemed to be that this was a plan to get rid of them; otherwise I can hardly conceive that the owners would be so blind to their own interests. Still it may have been simply an attempt at extortion.

Question. Are northern men and ladies, who happen to be visiting at Richmond, invited into society by the residents?

Answer. I think not to any extent.

Question. Have you ever been invited to visit a secession family?

Answer. I cannot say that I have.

Question. And you have been there how long?

Answer. I have been there eight months. I am not inclined to go much into society under any circumstances. I am not aware that the officers generally have been invited into families. I think they have not been.

Question. You think, so far as your observation goes, that there is a feeling of unfriendliness toward the government of the United States among the people of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you hear anything said among them in regard to a foreign war?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And as to what they would do in that case?

Answer. I recollect that one gentleman, Captain Pegram, formerly of our navy, who commanded the Nashville and some other rebel vessels, seemed to think that a foreign war would cement the relations between the two sections. I think that, in case of a foreign war, they would take up arms with the federal government, unless there was a chance of securing their independence.

Question. But suppose there were such a chance?

Answer. Well, sir, they would avail themselves of it. I do not think their sentiments are at all changed in that respect. They are loyal by compulsion.

Question. What effect has President Johnson's liberal policy in giving pardons and amnesties to them had upon their minds and hearts?

Answer. It has had the effect of making them admire President Johnson.

Question. Has it made them more, or less, friendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. They are disposed to think that Mr. Johnson stands between them and the Congress of the United States.

Question. They look to him?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do they talk about running him for the next presidency?

Answer. I have not heard talk of that.

Question. How do they seem to regard General Lee?

Answer. With the highest affection. I know no man who has more fully the hearts of a people than he has the hearts of Virginians.

Question. Suppose the Freedmen's Bureau were discontinued and the troops withdrawn, what would be the treatment of the secessionists towards the black people?

Answer. By vagrant laws, and by availing themselves of the ignorance of the negroes in the making of contracts, by getting them in debt, and otherwise, they would place them, I think, in a worse condition than they were in when slaves. I speak of the majority. The sentiment towards the freedmen in Virginia is changing, I think, and becoming more favorable to them; I hear the expression frequently that they would prefer, now that the blacks are free, that they should remain so; there may be something that smacks of dollars and cents in that. The slave system in Virginia has been such as to exhaust very largely the able-bodied laborers; I have been informed that twenty thousand of that class were annually sold from Virginia; consequently, a very large proportion of the colored population there is composed of the aged, infirm, women and children, and the being freed from the necessity of supporting them is really a great relief in the present poverty of the people—a relief to their former owners.

Question. Do they appear to be willing that the negro should acquire property, and have houses and homes, and school-houses?

Answer. I think they are coming to feel that the negro will make a better citizen educated; that is not generally the sentiment, but it is improving in that direction. We have now some fifteen thousand children in school, and there is very little hostility evinced to the teachers; occasionally there are unpleasant remarks made about them, but still there is comparatively little hostility. We have schools now in localities remote from troops which are not broken up. They recognize the freedom of the negro as a fixed fact.

Question. If they had an opportunity, would they reduce the negro again to slavery?

Answer. If I can believe their assertions, I should hardly think they would; I think they would prefer to hold him, by their laws, &c., in a situation which would be slavery in effect but not in name, so as to have the benefit of his labor without the responsibility of supporting him.

Question. That smacks of a piece of Yankee ingenuity?

Answer. Why, sir, in that respect, they out-Herod Herod.

Question. How do the secessionists feel in regard to the payment of the debt of the United States contracted in prosecuting the war?

Answer. I have not heard them express any opinion in that regard, nor have I talked with them on that subject.

Question. Are they nervously anxious to pay the confederate debt contracted in the prosecution of the rebellion?

Answer. I think not in Virginia.

Question. You do not think it would distress them much if they should be relieved from payment of that debt?

Answer. I think not. I do not think that repudiation would trouble any of these southern men; I think that they would prefer to pay the southern debt rather than the northern debt.

Question. Do you hear frequent complaints among them that they are not admitted to participation in the political power of the government?

Answer. Yes; they attribute that to your radical Congress; they seem to hope for a more conservative state of things hereafter—what they term "conservative."

Question. They seem to regard themselves as entirely fit for readmission into the government which they have been endeavoring to overthrow?

Answer. I think they do; I have heard of no case in which the ministers who preached secession during the war have publicly acknowledged the error.

Question. Do their ministers pray for the President of the United States, or for Congress, or for any other functionary of the government?

Answer. I have not attended their churches, because there is not one of their ministers, to my knowledge, who has publicly renounced his error as publicly as he has preached it.

Question. Do you hear, in your intercourse with secessionists, expressions of dislike and contempt towards the government of the United States?

Answer. No sir.

Question. Do you hear of them?

Answer. I hear of them.

Question. Frequently?

Answer. Perhaps I may say frequently.

Question. How are they pleased with the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. I think they are anxious to have it out of the way.

Question. Would they be likely to oppress the freedmen if that bureau were removed and the troops were removed?

Answer. I think they would.

Question. Would the negro stand any chance of obtaining justice in the courts?

Answer. I have the assurance of one of the first lawyers in the city of Richmond that his opinion is that the negroes could not obtain justice before a Virginia jury?

Question. Justice to the negro and justice to the white man are different articles, I suppose; it changes with the complexion?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Your bureau exercises jurisdiction over cases in which freedmen are parties?

Answer. Yes, sir; in all cases where his rights are involved.

Question. Is much of the time of the bureau at Richmond occupied in settling these controversies?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is occupied most of the time in every county in the State in settling controversies and aiding the negroes to make contracts; but it is very largely occupied in settling controversies.

Question. Have you heard of any cases of violence between whites and blacks down there?

Answer. Yes, sir, I have.

Question. Are they of frequent occurrence?

Answer. Of nearly every day occurrence in the State.

Question. Can you relate some instances of violence on the part of whites towards the blacks?

Answer. A case came before me yesterday. A negro was shot through the head and killed while sitting by his fire in his cabin, near Suffolk; circumstantial evidence points very strongly toward a white man with whom he had had an altercation, and who had shot at him before.

Question. Was the white man arrested?

Answer. I sent officers for him at once. A few weeks ago, near Fredericksburg, a negro, who had been a soldier, was making some remarks in a boasting manner of his having served in the federal army; he was overheard by a citizen, who said he would not allow him to boast of having served in the federal army—that he considered it an insult. The negro said he had served, and was not ashamed to say so; that he felt it something to be proud of. The man drew a revolver and fired at him, the ball going through the negro's clothing; then he overtook him and struck him over the head with the but end of the revolver, laying the skull bare. A physician who was sent for said, in the preliminary examination before the Freedmen's Bureau, that he considered the insult strong enough to justify the outrage; we have arrested the physician, but have not been able to catch the other yet.

Question. Was the physician a secessionist?

Answer. Oh! of course, yes. I might multiply instances of the kind to any extent. Outrages have increased very much since the diminution of our troops in the State; perhaps there is a little holding up now as they find that, even with few troops, we are determined to reach them; the bureau has not the power to reach all cases that occur; it wants more men; it wants the opportunity of selecting its officers, which it now has not; it has to take such as it can get.

Question. In case of the removal of that bureau, would you apprehend a great increase of those scenes of violence towards the blacks?

Answer. I should.

Question. What would it result in?

Answer. I think it would eventually result in an insurrection on the part of the blacks; the black troops that are about being mustered out, and those that have been mustered out, will all provide themselves with arms; probably most of them will purchase their arms; and they will not endure those outrages, without any protection except that which they obtain from Virginia; they have not confidence in their old masters, notwithstanding their great love for them, in which they have tried to make us believe.

Question. Are there many arms among the blacks?

Answer. Yes, sir; attempts have been made, in many instances, to disarm them.

Question. Who have made the attempts?

Answer. The citizens, by organizing what they call "patrols"—combinations of citizens.

Question. Has that arrangement pervaded the State generally?

Answer. No, sir; it has not been allowed; they would disarm the negroes at once if they could.

Question. Is that feeling extensive?

Answer. I may say it is universal; they have no confidence in the negroes, and they have every reason for not having it. They apprehended very much an insurrection during the holidays; I was called on by gentlemen from every section of the State about it, but there was at that time no disposition at all on the part of the negroes to make any difficulty.

Question. Have you reason to believe that there have been combinations among the negroes with a view to insurrection?

Answer. No, sir, I am satisfied there were no such combinations; there have been combinations to secure their suffrage, and other things of that kind, but nothing further. They have a great disposition to form secret combinations for very trivial objects; for instance, I recollect one charitable association called "The Holy Sons of God;" they get up such names. Their object was simply to take care of the sick and helpless, bury the dead, &c.; their meetings were all secret.

Question. Have you ever seen negro troops under fire?

Answer. No, sir, I have not.

Question. What is your idea about their courage in active operations in the field?

Answer. I can only base my opinion on what I have heard and read; I think they make good soldiers; I think that in case of insurrection, they would fight desperately.

Question. How would they fight the Union troops, in case Union troops were brought against them to put down an insurrection?

Answer. They were examined on that subject by my officers when there was talk of an insurrection at the holidays, fearing that they might have such ideas, although we had no confidence in the report; but there was so much alarm expressed that we took occasion to talk to them on that subject, and told them that federal troops would be brought against them if any such attempt were made. I think that a regiment of federal troops would create more demoralization among them than a brigade of confederates would—far more.

Question. Do you hear anything said among the whites in Virginia about expelling the blacks from their midst?

Answer. No, sir; I think, though, they would prefer to have them away; they would not expel them, but it would be their fancy to have them away.

Question. With what kind of people would they supply their places?

Answer. An attempt was made a few months ago to introduce foreign labor, but, from the best evidence I can get, it proved a failure; those who employed foreigners were perfectly willing to go back to the negroes; still the feeling was very general when they were first freed, and is not done away with yet, that "if we cannot have them as slaves, take them away; we don't want them."

Question. Is not that rather the result of a feeling of mortification that the negroes are made free—mere spite?

Answer. I do not know how to analyze the feeling they seem to have; they have been always in the habit of having this control over them, and now the negro comes and asserts his rights and says, "I am free as well as you;" that creates an irritation, a dislike; I hardly know what it is.

Question. And they think they would be glad to get rid of the negro?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And when they think of the labor which they find it necessary to have performed, they want the negro to stay with them?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is it.

Question. So that really, between the two motives—the motive of spite, ill-will, and disappointment, and the other, a sort of respect for him because he is a good laborer—they are divided?

Answer. That is it, sir.

Question. They do not propose to do the labor themselves?

Answer. No, sir; and they do not propose to break up their large estates if they can help it. That is one thing which keeps them back; they seem indisposed to sell their real estate; they do not like to part with it. I remember seeing an editorial article in one of the Richmond papers containing such an expression as this: "If the estates were to be broken up so as to destroy the old Virginia gentleman, Virginia would cease to be Virginia."

Question. "One of the olden time?"

Answer. "One of the olden time."

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to state?

Answer. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1866.

Robert E. Lee sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where is your present residence?

Answer. Lexington, Virginia.

Question. How long have you resided at Lexington?

Answer. Since the first of October last; nearly five months.

Question. Are you acquainted with the state of feeling among what we call secessionists in Virginia, at present, toward the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not know that I am. I have been living very retired, and have had but little communication with politicians. I know nothing more than from my observation, and from such facts as have come to my knowledge.

Question. From your observation, what is your opinion as to the feeling of loyalty towards the government of the United States among the secession portion of the people of that State at this time?

Answer. So far as has come to my knowledge, I do not know of a single person who either feels or contemplates any resistance to the government of the United States, or, indeed, any opposition to it. No word has reached me to either purpose.

Question. From what you have observed among them, is it your opinion that they are friendly toward the government of the United States, and that they will co-operate to sustain and uphold the government for the future?

Answer. I believe that they entirely acquiesce in the government of the United States, and, so far as I have heard any one express an opinion, they are for co-operating with President Johnson in his policy.

Question. In his policy in regard to what?

Answer. His policy in regard to the restoration of the whole country. I have heard persons with whom I have conversed express great confidence in the wisdom of his policy of restoration, and they seem to look forward to it as a hope of restoration.

Question. How do they feel in regard to that portion of the people of the United States who have been forward and zealous in the prosecution of the war against the rebellion?

Answer. Well, I do not know. I have heard nobody express any opinion in regard to it. As I said before, I have not had much communication with politicians in the country, if there are any. Every one seems to be engaged in his own affairs, and endeavoring to restore the civil government of the State. I have heard no expression of a sentiment toward any particular portion of the country.

Question. How do the secessionists feel in regard to the payment of the debt of the United States contracted in the prosecution of the war?

Answer. I have never heard any one speak on the subject. I suppose they must expect to pay the taxes levied by the government. I have heard them speak in reference to the payment of taxes, and of their efforts to raise money to pay the taxes, which I suppose are for their share of the debt. I have never heard any one speak in opposition to the payment of taxes, or of resistance to their payment. Their whole effort has been to try and raise the money for the payment of the taxes.

Question. From your knowledge of the state of public feeling in Virginia, is it your opinion that the people would, if the question were left to them, repudiate and reject that debt?

Answer. I never heard any one speak on that subject, but from my knowledge of the people I believe that they would be in favor of the payment of all just debts.

Question. Do they, in your opinion, regard that as a just debt?

Answer. I do not know what their opinion is on the subject of the particular debt. I have never heard any opinion expressed, but I have never heard any expressed contrary to it. Indeed, as I said in the beginning, I have had very little discussion or intercourse with the people. I believe that the people would pay the debts they are called upon to pay. I say that from my knowledge of the people generally.

Question. Would they pay that debt, or their portion of it, with as much alacrity as people ordinarily pay their taxes to their government?

Answer. I do not know that they would make any distinction between the two. The taxes laid by the government, so far as I know, they are prepared to pay to the best of their ability. I never heard them make any distinction.

Question. What is the feeling of that portion of the people of Virginia in regard to the payment of the so-called confederate debt?

Answer. I believe, so far as my opinion goes, (I have no facts to go upon, but merely base my opinion on the knowledge I have of the people,) they would be willing to pay the confederate debt too.

Question. You think they would?

Answer. I think they would if they had the power and ability to do it. I have never heard any one in the State with whom I have conversed speak of repudiating any debt.

Question. I suppose the confederate debt is almost entirely valueless, even in the market of Virginia?

Answer. Entirely, as far as I know. I believe the people generally look upon it as lost entirely. I never heard any question on the subject.

Question. Do you recollect the terms of the confederate bonds—when they were made payable?

Answer. I think I have a general recollection that they were made payable six months after a declaration of peace.

Question. Six months after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the United States and the confederate government?

Answer. I think they run in that way.

Question. So that the bonds are not due yet by their terms?

Answer. I suppose, unless it is considered that there is peace now, they are not due.

Question. How do the people in Virginia, the secessionists more particularly, feel toward the freedmen?

Answer. Every one with whom I associate expresses kind feelings towards the freedmen. They wish to see them get on in the world, and particularly to take up some occupation for a living and to turn their hands to some work. I know that efforts have been made among the farmers, near where I live, to induce them to engage for the year at regular wages.

Question. Do you think there is a willingness on the part of their old masters to give them fair, living wages for their labor?

Answer. I believe it is so. The farmers generally prefer those servants who have been living with them before. I have heard them express their preference for the men whom they know, who had lived with them before, and their wish to get them to return to work.

Question. Are you aware of the existence of any combination among the whites to keep down the wages of the negroes?

Answer. I am not. I have heard that, in several counties, land owners have met in order to establish a uniform rate of wages; but I never heard, nor do I know, of any combination to keep down wages, or establish any rate which they did not think fair. The means of paying wages in Virginia are very limited now, and there is a difference of opinion as to how much each person is able to pay.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the blacks? Is there a general willingness or a general unwillingness to have them educated?

Answer. Where I am, and have been, the people have exhibited a willingness that the blacks should be educated, and they express an opinion that that would be better for the blacks and better for the whites.

Question. General, you are very competent to judge of the capacity of black men for acquiring knowledge: I want your opinion on that capacity, as compared with the capacity of white men?

Answer. I do not know that I am particularly qualified to speak on that subject, as you seem to intimate; but I do not think that he is as capable of acquiring knowledge as the white man is. There are some more apt than others. I have known some to acquire knowledge and skill in their trade or profession. I have had servants of my own who learned to read and write very well.

Question. Do they show a capacity to obtain knowledge of mathematics and the exact sciences?

Answer. I have no knowledge on that subject. I am merely acquainted with those who have learned the common rudiments of education.

Question. General, are you aware of the existence among the blacks of Virginia, anywhere within the limits of the State, of combinations having in view the disturbance of the peace, or any improper and unlawful acts?

Answer. I am not. I have seen no evidence of it, and have heard of none. Wherever I have been they have been quiet and orderly, not disposed to work, or rather not disposed to any continuous engagement to work, but just very short jobs, to provide them with the immediate means of subsistence.

Question. Has the colored race generally as great a love of money and property as the white race possesses?

Answer. I do not think it has. The blacks with whom I am acquainted look more to the present time than to the future?

Question. Does that absence of a lust of money and property arise more from the nature of the negro than from his former servile condition?

Answer. Well, it may be, in some measure, attributable to his former condition. They are an amiable, social race. They like their ease and comfort, and, I think, look more to their present than to their future condition.

Question. In the event of a war between the United States and any foreign power, such as England or France, if there should be held out to the secession portion of the people of Virginia, or the other recently rebel States, a fair prospect of gaining their independence, and shaking off the government of the United States, is it, or is it not, your opinion that they would avail themselves of that opportunity?

Answer. I cannot speak with any certainty on that point. I do not know how far they might be actuated by their feelings. I have nothing whatever to base an opinion upon. So far as I know, they contemplate nothing of the kind now. What may happen in the future I cannot say.

Question. Do you not frequently hear, in your intercourse with secessionists in Virginia, expressions of a hope that such a war may break out?

Answer. I cannot say that I have heard it. On the contrary, I have heard persons (I do not know whether you would call them secessionists or not—I mean those people in Virginia with whom I associate) express a hope that the country may not be led into a war.

Question. In such an event, do you not think that many of that class of persons whom I call secessionists would join the common enemy?

Answer. It is possible. It depends upon the feelings of the individual.

Question. If it is a fair question, (you may answer it, or not, as you choose,) what, in such an event, might be your own choice?

Answer. I have no disposition now to do it, and I never have had.

Question. And you cannot foresee that such would be your inclination in such an event?

Answer. No. I can only judge by the past. I do not know what circumstances may produce. I cannot pretend to foresee events. So far as I know the feeling of the people of Virginia, they wish for peace.

Question. During the civil war, was it not contemplated by the government of the confederacy to form an alliance with some foreign nation, if possible?

Answer. I believe it was their wish to do so if they could. It was their wish so have the confederate government recognized as an independent government. I have no doubt that, if it could have made favorable treaties, it would have done so. But I knew nothing of the policy of the government. I had no hand or part in it. I merely express my own opinion.

Question. The question I am about to put to you you may answer, or not, as you choose: Did you take an oath of fidelity or allegiance to the confederate government?

Answer. I do not recollect having done so; but it is possible that, when I was commissioned, I did. I do not recollect whether it was required. If it was required, I took it; or, if it had been required, I would have taken it; but I do not recollect whether it was or not.

By Mr. BLOW:

Question. In reference to the effect of President Johnson's policy, if it were adopted, would there be anything like a return of the old feeling? I ask that because you used the expression "acquiescing in the result."

Answer. I believe it would take time for the feelings of the people to be of that cordial nature to the government that they were formerly.

Question. Do you think that their preference for that policy arises from a desire to have peace and good feeling in the country, or from the probability of their regaining political power?

Answer. So far as I know the desire of the people of the south, it is for the restoration of their civil government, and they look upon the policy of President Johnson as the one which would most clearly and most surely re-establish it.

Question. Do you see any change among the poorer classes in Virginia in reference to industry? Are they as much, or more, interested in developing their material interests than they were?

Answer. I have not observed any change. Every one now has to attend to his business for his support.

Question. The poorer classes are generally hard at work, are they?

Answer. So far as I know, they are; I know nothing to the contrary.

Question. Is there any difference in their relations to the colored people—is their prejudice increased or diminished?

Answer. I have noticed no change. So far as I do know the feelings of all the people of Virginia, they are kind to the colored people. I have never heard any blame attributed to them as to the present condition of things, or any responsibility.

Question. There are very few colored laborers employed, I suppose?

Answer. Those who own farms have employed them more or less—one or two. Some are so poor that they have to work themselves.

Question. Can capitalists and workmen from the north go into any portion of Virginia with which you are familiar and go to work among the people?

Answer. I do not know anything to prevent them. Their peace and pleasure there would depend very much on their conduct. If they confined themselves to their own business, and did not interfere to provoke controversies with their neighbors, I do not believe they would be molested.

Question. There is no desire to keep out labor and capital?

Answer. Not that I know of. On the contrary, they are very anxious to get capital into the State.

Question. You see nothing of a disposition to prevent such a thing?

Answer. I have seen nothing, and do not know of anything. As I said before, the manner in which they would be received would depend entirely upon the individuals themselves. They might make themselves obnoxious, as you can understand.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Is there not a general dislike of northern men among secessionists?

Answer. I suppose they would prefer not to associate with them. I do not know that they would select them as associates.

Question. Do they avoid and ostracise them socially?

Answer. They might avoid them. They would not select them as associates, unless there was some reason for it. I do not know that they would associate with them until they became acquainted. I think it probable they would not admit them into their social circles.

By Mr. BLOW:

Question. What is the position of the colored men in Virginia with reference to the persons they work for? Do you think they would prefer to work for northern men or for southern men?

Answer. I think it very probable that they would prefer the northern man, although I have no facts to go upon.

Question. That having been stated very frequently in reference to the cotton States, does it result from a fear of bad treatment on the part of the resident population, or from the idea that they will be more fairly treated by the new-comers? What is your observation in that respect in regard to Virginia?

Answer. I have no means of forming an opinion; I do not know any such case in Virginia; I know of numbers of the blacks engaging with their old masters, and I know of a good many who prefer to go off and look for new homes. Whether it is from any dislike of their former masters, or from a desire of change, or that they feel more free and independent, I do not know.

Question. What is your opinion in regard to the material interests of Virginia? Do you think they will be equal to what they were before the rebellion under the changed aspect of affairs?

Answer. It will take a long time for them to reach their former standard. I think that after some years they will reach it, and I hope exceed it; but it cannot be immediately, in my opinion.

Question. It will take a number of years?

Answer. It will take a number of years, I think.

Question. On the whole, the condition of things in Virginia is hopeful, both in regard to its material interests and the future peace of the country?

Answer. I have heard great hope expressed, and there is great cheerfulness and willingness to labor.

Question. Suppose that this policy of President Johnson should be all that you anticipate, and that you should also realize all that you expect in the improvement of your material interests, do you think that the result of that would be the gradual restoration of the old feeling?

Answer. That would be the natural result, I think, and I see no other way in which that result can be brought about.

Question. There is a fear in the public mind that the friends of the policy in the south adopt it because they see in it the means of regaining the political position which they lost in the recent contest: do you think that that is the main idea with them, or that they really look to it, as you say, as the best means of restoring civil government and the peace and prosperity of their respective States?

Answer. As to the first point you make, I do not know that I ever heard any person speak upon it. I never heard the points separated. I have heard them speak generally as to the effect of the policy of President Johnson. The feeling, so far as I know, now is that there is not that equality extended to the southern States as is enjoyed by the north.

Question. You do not feel down there that while you accept the result, that we are as generous as we ought to be under the circumstances?

Answer. They think that the north can afford to be generous.

Question. That is the feeling down there?

Answer. Yes, and they think it is the best policy—those who reflect upon the subject and are able to judge.

Question. I understand it to be your opinion that generosity and liberality towards the entire south would be the surest means of regaining their good opinion?

Answer. Yes, and the speediest.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. I understood you to say, generally, that you had no apprehension of any combination among the leading secessionists to renew the war, or anything of the kind?

Answer. I have no reason in the world to think so.

Question. Have you heard that subject talked over among any of the politicians?

Answer. No, sir; I have not. I have not heard that matter even suggested.

Question. Let me put another hypothetical state of things: Suppose the executive government of the United States should be held by a President who, like Mr. Buchanan, rejected the right of coercion, so-called, and suppose a Congress should exist here entertaining the same political opinions, thus presenting to the once rebel States the opportunity again to secede from the Union, would they or not, in your opinion, avail themselves of that opportunity, or some of them?

Answer. I suppose it would depend upon the circumstances existing at the time. If their feelings should remain embittered, and their affections alienated from the rest of the States, I think it very probable they might do so, provided they thought it was to their interest.

Question. Do you not think that at the present time there is a deep-seated feeling of dislike towards the government of the United States on the part of the masses of the secessionists?

Answer. I do not know that there is any deep-seated dislike. I think it is probable there may be some animosity still existing among some of the people at the south.

Question. Is there not a deep-seated feeling of disappointment and chagrin at the result of the war?

Answer. I think that, at the time, they were disappointed at the result of the war.

Question. Do you mean to be understood as saying that there is not a condition of discontent against the government of the United States among the secessionists generally?

Answer. I know of none.

Question. Are you prepared to say that they respect the government of the United States and the loyal people of the United States so much, at the present time, as to perform their duties as citizens of the United States and of the States faithfully and well?

Answer. I believe that they will perform all the duties that they are required to perform. I think that is the general feeling, so far as I know.

Question. Do you think that it would be practicable to convict a man in Virginia of treason for having taken part in this rebellion against the government, by a Virginia jury, without packing it with direct reference to a verdict of guilty?

Answer. On that point I have no knowledge, and I do not know what they would consider treason against the United States. If you mean past acts—

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

WITNESS. I have no knowledge as to what their views on that subject in the past are.

Question. You understand my question: Suppose a jury was impanelled in your own neighborhood, taken up by lot; would it be practicable to convict, for instance, Jefferson Davis for having levied war upon the United States, and thus having committed the crime of treason?

Answer. I think it is very probable that they would not consider he had committed treason.

Question. Suppose the jury should be clearly and plainly instructed by the court that such an act of war upon the United States, on the part of Mr. Davis, or any other leading man, constituted in itself the crime of treason under the Constitution of the United States; would the jury be likely to heed that instruction, and if the facts were plainly in proof before them, convict the offender?

Answer. I do not know, sir, what they would do on that question.

Question. They do not generally suppose that it was treason against the United States, do they?

Answer. I do not think that they so consider it.

Question. In what light would they view it? What would be their excuse or justification? How would they escape in their own mind? I refer to the past.

Answer. I am referring to the past and as to the feelings they would have. So far as I know, they look upon the action of the State, in withdrawing itself from the government of the United States, as carrying the individuals of the State along with it; that the State was responsible for the act, not the individual.

Question. And that the ordinance of secession, so-called, or those acts of the State which recognized a condition of war between the State and the general government, stood as their justification for their bearing arms against the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir. I think they considered the act of the State as legitimate; that they were merely using the reserved right which they had a right to do.

Question. State, if you please, (and if you are disinclined to answer the question you need not do so,) what your own personal views on that question were?

Answer. That was my view; that the act of Virginia, in withdrawing herself from the United States, carried me along as a citizen of Virginia, and that her laws and her acts were binding on me.

Question. And that you felt to be your justification in taking the course you did?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. I have been told, general, that you have remarked to some of your friends in conversation that you were rather wheedled or cheated into that course by politicians?

Answer. I do not recollect making any such remark. I do not think I ever made it.

Question. If there be any other matter about which you wish to speak on this occasion, do so freely.

Answer. Only in reference to that last question you put to me. I may have said, and I may have believed, that the position of the two sections which they held to each other was brought about by the politicians of the country; that the great masses of the people, if they understood the real question, would have avoided it; but not that I had been individually wheedled by the politicians.

Question. That is probably the origin of the whole thing?

Answer. I may have said that; but I do not even recollect that. But I did believe at the time that it was an unnecessary condition of affairs, and might have been avoided if forbearance and wisdom had been practiced on both sides.

Question. You say that you do not recollect having sworn allegiance and fidelity to the confederate government?

Answer. I do not recollect it, nor do I know that it was ever required. I was regularly commissioned in the Army of the Confederate States, but I really do not recollect that that oath was required. If it was required, I have no doubt I took it; or if it had been required, I would have taken it.

Question. Is there any other matter which you desire to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir; I am ready to answer any question which you think proper to put to me.

Question. How would an amendment to the Constitution be received by the secessionists, or by the people at large, allowing the colored people or certain classes of them to exercise the right of voting at elections?

Answer. I think, so far as I can form an opinion, in such an event they would object.

Question. They would object to such an amendment?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Suppose an amendment should, nevertheless, be adopted, conferring on the blacks the right of suffrage, would that, in your opinion, lead to scenes of violence and breaches of the peace between the two races in Virginia?

Answer. I think it would excite unfriendly feelings between the two races. I cannot pretend to say to what extent it would go, but that would be the result.

Question. Are you acquainted with the proposed amendment now pending in the Senate of the United States?

Answer. No, sir; I am not. I scarcely ever read a paper. [The substance of the proposed amendment was here explained to the witness by Mr. CONKLING.] So far as I can see, I do not think the State of Virginia would object to it.

Question. Would she consent, under any circumstances, to allow the black people to vote, even if she were to gain a larger number of representatives in Congress?

Answer. That would depend upon her interests. If she had the right of determining that, I do not see why she should object. If it were to her interest to admit these people to vote, that might overrule any other objection that she had to it.

Question. What, in your opinion, would be the practical result? Do you think that Virginia would consent to allow the negro to vote?

Answer. I think that, at present, she would accept the smaller representation. I do not know what the future may develop. If it should be plain to her that these persons will vote properly and understandingly, she might admit them to vote.

By Mr. BLOW:

Question. Do you not think it would turn a good deal, in the cotton States, upon the value of the labor of the black people—upon the amount which they produce?

Answer. In a good many States in the south, and in a good many counties in Virginia, if the black people now were allowed to vote, it would, I think, exclude proper representation; that is, proper, intelligent people would not be elected; and rather than suffer that injury they would not let them vote at all.

Question. Do you not think that the question, as to whether any southern State would allow the colored people the right of suffrage in order to increase representation, would depend a good deal on the amount which the colored people might contribute to the wealth of the State in order to secure two things: first, the larger representation, and, second, the influence derived from these persons voting?

Answer. I think they would determine the question more in reference to their opinion as to the manner in which those votes would be exercised, whether they consider those people qualified to vote. My own opinion is, that, at this time, they cannot vote intelligently, and that giving them the right of suffrage would open the door to a great deal of demagogism, and lead to embarrassments in various ways. What the future may prove, how intelligent they may become, with what eyes they may look upon the interests of the State in which they may reside, I cannot say more than you can.

Question. Is there any sympathy felt in the south for those schemes of emigration to Mexico?

Answer. I believe that the masses of the people have not any sympathy with them. There are individuals who think that their interest would be benefited, and, indeed, that their prospects at home are so poor now that it is like losing their lives to remain. That feeling was stronger at the first cessation of hostilities than it is now. At this time it seems to be subsiding.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. I will put one question to you to which you may respond or not, as you please: I wish to inquire whether you had any knowledge, while you were in command at Richmond, of the cruelties practiced towards the Union prisoners at Libby prison and Belle Isle?

Answer. I never knew that any cruelty was practiced, and I have no reason to believe that it was practiced. I can believe, and I had reason to believe, that privations may have been experienced among the prisoners, because I know that provisions and shelter could not be provided them.

Question. Were you not aware that those prisoners were dying from cold and starvation?

Answer. I was not.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire that you shall speak your mind fully and freely on this subject, for it is useless to conceal from you the fact that those scenes have created a sad feeling in the hearts of the people at the north.

Answer. As regards myself, I never had any control over the prisoners, except those that were captured on the field of battle. Then it was my business to send to Richmond to the proper officer, who was then the provost marshal general. In regard to their disposition afterwards I had no control. I never gave an order about it. It was entirely in the hands of the War Department.

Question. And not in your hands?

Answer. Not in mine.

Question. Did these scenes come at all to your knowledge?

Answer. Never. No report was ever made to me about them; there was no call for any to be made to me. I did hear (it was mere hearsay) that statements had been made to the war department, and that everything had been done to relieve them that could be done; even, finally, so far as to offer to send them to some points (Charleston was one point named) if they would be received by the United States authorities and taken to their homes; but whether that is true or not I do not know; it was merely a report that I heard.

Question. Were you in the same ignorance of the scenes at Andersonville and Salisbury?

Answer. I never knew who commanded at Andersonville until I saw by the papers, after the cessation of hostilities, that Captain Wirz had been arrested on that account, nor do I know now who commanded at Salisbury.

Question. And of course you knew nothing of the scenes of cruelty, about which complaints have been made, at those places?

Answer. Nothing in the world. As I said before, I suppose they suffered from the want of ability on the part of the Confederate States to supply their wants. At the very beginning of the war I knew that there were sufferings of prisoners on both sides, but, as far as I could, I did everything in my power to relieve them, and urged the establishment of the cartel which was established.

By Mr. BLOW:

Question. It has been frequently asserted that the confederate soldiers feel more kindly toward the government of the United States than any other portion of the people of the south. What is your observation on that point?

Answer. From the confederate soldiers I have heard no expression of any other opinion. They looked upon the war as a necessary evil and went through it. I have seen them relieve the wants of federal soldiers on the field. The orders always were that the whole field should be treated alike. Parties were sent out to take in the federal wounded as well as the confederate, and the surgeons were told to treat the one as they did the other. These orders have been given by me repeatedly on every field.

Question. Do you think that the good feeling on their part toward the rest of the people has continued since the close of the war?

Answer. I know nothing to the contrary. I made several efforts to exchange the prisoners after the cartel was suspended; I did not know why it was suspended; I do not know to this day which side took the initiative; I knew that there were constant complaints made on both sides; I merely knew it from public rumor. I offered to General Grant, around Richmond, that we should ourselves exchange all the prisoners in our hands. There was a committee from the Christian Association, I think, which reached Petersburg and made an application to me for a passport to visit all the prisons at the south. My letter to them I suppose they have. I told them that I had not that authority; that it could be only obtained from the war department at Richmond, but that neither they nor I could relieve the sufferings of the prisoners; that the only thing to be done for them was to exchange them; and to show that I would do whatever was in my power, I offered then to send to City Point all the prisoners in Virginia and North Carolina, over which my command extended, provided they returned an equal number of mine, man for man. I reported this to the war department, and received an answer that they would place at my command all the prisoners at the south, if the proposition was accepted. I heard nothing more on the subject.

Question. Has there been any considerable change in the number of the negro population in Virginia during the last four years?

Answer. I suppose it has diminished, but I do not know.

Question. Diminished in consequence of more negroes going south than was made up by the natural increase?

Answer. My general opinion is that the number has diminished, and for the reason you give.

Question. I suppose that the mass of the negroes in Virginia, at the present time, are able to work; that there are not many helpless ones among them?

Answer. There are helpless ones, certainly, but I do not know to what extent.

Question. What is your opinion about its being an advantage to Virginia to keep them there at all. Do you not think that Virginia would be better off if the colored population were to go to Alabama, Louisiana, and the other southern States?

Answer. I think it would be better for Virginia if she could get rid of them. That is no new opinion with me. I have always thought so, and have always been in favor of emancipation—gradual emancipation.

Question. As a question of labor alone, do you not think that the labor which would flow into Virginia, if the negroes left it for the cotton States, would be far more advantageous to the State and to its future prosperity?

Answer. I think it would be for the benefit of Virginia, and I believe that everybody there would be willing to aid it.

Question. Do you not think that the State of Virginia is absolutely injured and its future impaired by the presence of the black population there?

Answer. I think it is.

Question. And do you not think it is peculiarly adapted to the quality of labor which would flow into it, from its great natural resources, in case it was made more attractive by the absence of the colored race?

Answer. I do.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1866.

Doctor Charles S. Mills sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Richmond, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native Virginian?

Answer. Yes.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. Fifty-three years.

Question. State whether you have been a Unionist or the opposite?

Answer. I was opposed to secession.

Question. Have you taken any part in the war?

Answer. No, sir; I have taken no part in it.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance in Virginia?

Answer. My acquaintance is principally local. It is not very extensive, having no connexion with politics in any manner. I was a private citizen, a practitioner of medicine, up to the commencement of the war, and I afterwards took charge, as president, of a large coal-mining company.

Question. State what is the feeling among the secessionists generally, so far as your observation extends, towards the government of the United States?

Answer. There is a feeling, as they express it, of acquiescence in the determination of the war. I believe there is no disposition at all on their part to recommence hostilities. They see, in the first place, the utter futility of such a thing. Their condition is such that there is no hope of success, and no means to carry on the war. As to their feeling towards the United States, so far as my acquaintance goes, they feel very sore on the subject. I think they have no real love for the Union of the States.

Question. Suppose they had another opportunity to get out of the Union, would they embrace it?

Answer. With regard to the people generally, uninfluenced and unbiased by the politicians who have had control of Virginia, I think they would not; and the politicians I think would not, provided they had the control of the federal government. I believe they would be satisfied under any circumstances, provided they had the control.

Question. They would consider that reasonable, I suppose?

Answer. Yes, sir; but I believe that a great many of them would be glad of an opportunity to rid themselves of their allegiance and obligations to the United States government.

Question. You heard the question put to General Lee on the subject of war between this country and a foreign power?

Answer. Yes.

Question. And you heard his answer?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What is your idea about that?

Answer. It is pretty much the same. I believe that many at the south would be very glad to embrace an opportunity to go to war if there was a prospect of their throwing off their allegiance to the United States government. To what extent that feeling prevails through the country I am unable to say, because for the last six years I have been confined principally to Richmond and the immediate neighborhood.

Question. Have you reason to believe that that feeling is pretty extensive?

Answer. It is pretty extensive, I think, in Richmond.

Question. Can a Union man be elected to office anywhere in Virginia?

Answer. I do not believe that a man who has occupied the position of a Union man during the war can be elected to any office, either of profit or honor, in Virginia; that is, if the people are left entirely to exercise their own preference on the subject, unrestrained by any other influence.

Question. How large a proportion of the people in that State are Unionists, so far as your observation has extended—one out of a hundred?

Answer. No, sir; I hardly think as many as that. In Richmond I know a good many who were Unionists, who were opposed to secession, but who were compelled from necessity to be very quiet during the existence of the war, from prudential considerations. Still, they knew each other and spoke their sentiments very freely to each other, and in that way I knew most of those who were Union men. I was in the habit of speaking more freely myself than almost any one else during the war, and consequently I was generally known as a Union man throughout. In 1861, having occupied some little position in Richmond, and being personally popular there, I was, at the suggestion of some friends, brought out as a Union candidate for the mayoralty of the city. I believe that up to that time, and on any other issue, I could have been elected to almost any post in the city; but I was, of course, defeated. I knew that I would be on that issue.

Question. Were you defeated by a large majority?

Answer. Yes, sir; by a very large majority. Those who voted for me were, I believe, one-third of the whole number of voters. To show the extent of the feeling which existed at that time, I may mention that a good many who voted against me were my warmest friends, and stated that on any other issue they would have voted for me.

Question. Is there any other fact or circumstance occurring to your mind, and which you would like to relate.

Answer. Nothing at all, sir.

Question. How do the secessionists in Virginia feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. I do not know that there is any feeling of hostility against them at all, although they think that they have been at a very heavy loss in having their slaves taken from them.

Question. Is there an unwillingness among them to have the blacks educated?

Answer. I am unable to say. There is a diversity of opinion on the subject. I believe that the more intelligent portion of the community desire to have them educated.

Question. Would they consent to be taxed for that purpose?

Answer. I would not like to say.

Question. You think not?

Answer. I think that they would not be willing to be taxed.

Question. Suppose they were taxed in common with the blacks, or suppose the blacks should bear their fair proportion, and even more than their fair proportion, of the taxation which might be necessary to promote education among the blacks, would they consent even to that?

Answer. I do not know that I can answer that question. I never had much conversation on the subject. But I believe there is a disposition generally among the former owners of the blacks to have them educated. I say that from the fact that I know several members of families who are now educating their former slaves, teaching them to read and write. It generally devolves upon young ladies. They are now devoting a portion of their time, at intervals, to this purpose.

Question. Do you think it practicable to have a convention called in Virginia, and your constitution and laws amended in such a way as to restrict the right of suffrage, as now exercised among the whites, by imposing qualifications which would exclude portions of the white population from the right of suffrage which they now enjoy?

Answer. I do not know. The question has been discussed to a limited extent with regard to limiting the franchise; and the disposition to do so is pretty extensive—to carry it back as near as possible to the basis which prevailed previously to 1829.

Question. What was that?

Answer. That was a freehold basis, I think, of twenty-five acres of land, or the value of one hundred dollars. I am not sure in regard to that. It was in the first constitution that existed in Virginia up to 1829. It was then changed, and the franchise extended. I believe there is a general disposition now among the people, not among the politicians, to limit the franchise.

Question. Do you think the blacks can be allowed the privilege of voting in Virginia by any convention or legislature that may be got together?

Answer. No, sir. I do not think that any convention would ever extend the right of suffrage to the blacks, of its own accord, voluntarily.

Question. Is that feeling of repugnance to the exercise of the right of suffrage by the blacks apparently increasing or diminishing among the people of Virginia?

Answer. I do not know that any change has taken place. There has always been opposition to the right of suffrage being enjoyed by the blacks.

Question. Is that feeling apparently universal among the whites?

Answer. Pretty universal. If the right were to be universal suffrage, I dare say the feeling would be universal; but if there was a property qualification connected with it, I think a great many would probably be willing to admit the blacks to vote on a property qualification.

Question. You think they would consent to that far more freely than to universal suffrage?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How would they regard a qualification based on education—for instance, on a knowledge of reading and writing among the blacks?

Answer. I do not know. They would prefer that, of course, to universal suffrage among the blacks; but I think that they would prefer a property qualification. I think that if there should be any limit put to the franchise it would be with a view rather of excluding the blacks—that is, to raise the franchise so that very few blacks would obtain it, although a good many whites might be excluded with them; but I do not know that even that is practicable in Virginia at present. I think that those who control the State are disposed to continue the system of universal suffrage, at least so far as the whites are concerned, because, by that system they keep in power.

Question. How are Union men generally treated among the secessionists in Virginia—I mean the native Unionists?

Answer. I do not know that any change has taken place at all with regard to them socially, excepting in a few instances.

Question. Are they not almost universally proscribed so far as political honors are concerned?

Answer. Oh yes, completely.

Question. How are Unionists from the northern States treated there?

Answer. I can only tell you from what I know of the federal officers who are there. I believe there is no social intercourse at all between them and the citizens. In the few instances in which they have been admitted into families there has been a very bad feeling created on the part of the rest of the citizens towards the members of those families. That I know to exist to a great extent in the city of Richmond.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the settlement of northern people among them?

Answer. I think they would generally prefer any other settlers. They would have no objection to them; but I think that, generally, in many portions of Virginia, their situation would be unpleasant.

Question. Would they be subjected to ill-treatment or violence?

Answer. No, sir, not at all; merely to social proscription.

Question. What degree of justice would northern people be likely to obtain in the State courts?

Answer. I think they would obtain justice.

Question. Can a jury be impanelled in Virginia which would convict a ringleader, who had been a traitor during the past war, of treason?

Answer. I think not.

Question. What schemes do the leading secessionists harbor down there? What is their idea? What is their great object?

Answer. I am not sufficiently acquainted with political men to say. I have very little intercourse with them. They profess to sustain President Johnson's policy, whatever that is.

Question. They like President Johnson much better than they do the loyal people of the north?

Answer. President Johnson states very distinctly that none but loyal men shall be elected to office. I think he stated that in his interview with the Virginia committee that came on recently; and, of course, they sustain President Johnson in that opinion. At least they profess to do so. But that depends on the interpretation put upon the word "loyal."

Question. What interpretation do they put upon it?

Answer. I think that they consider a man who has taken the oath of allegiance as not only a reconstructed citizen of the United States, but a loyal man.

Question. And a Unionist who has not had occasion to take that oath at all, they consider as what?

Answer. I do not know. They proscribe him.

Question. They do not consider that he belongs to the category, do they?

Answer. I do not know that they would consider him disloyal at all.

Question. But they would not like him much?

Answer. I think the majority of them would not; that is, they would not be willing to confer upon him any post of honor or profit.

Question. You have observed something of the effect which Mr. Johnson's liberal policy towards the rebels and the rebel States has had on the minds of the secessionists. State the effect. Has it made them more, or less, respectful to the government of the United States?

Answer. I have been so long observant of the course of the politicians of Virginia that I expected it would have exactly the effect it has had. They are willing, I believe, to adopt any policy, almost, that will keep them in power, and give them power. I think that it would have been better (and I so stated to Governor Peirpoint and others) to have kept things in abeyance, as it were, some time at least; to have withheld amnesty from those who had been active in thrusting the State of Virginia out of the Union; to have withheld their pardons until the State was restored. I think that they would have co-operated much more cordially, would have worked more heartily, for a proper restoration of the State, than they have done since, or will do since they obtained their pardons.

Question. Has this liberality made them more, or less, contemptuous towards the government and laws of the United States—not towards President Johnson?

Answer. I do not know that it has really changed their feelings at all. But the pardon has given them an opportunity to give utterance to, and exhibit the true state of, their feelings, more than they could have done or would have done had they not been pardoned.

Question. Have you any reason to apprehend that any portion of them still entertain the scheme of secession from the United States, or the repudiation of the debt of the United States, or the assumption and payment of the confederate debt?

Answer. No, sir. I think there is no feeling in favor of secession now. They consider that as a matter perfectly settled, unless probably the country were to become involved in a foreign war. Then, I think, it is probable that a great many of them would like to embrace the opportunity of throwing off their allegiance to the United States. To what extent that feeling exists I cannot say. In my intercourse with the people I have heard it frequently uttered. With regard to the repudiation of the debt, the people of the south are scarcely in a condition to pay taxes at all at present. It is very burdensome on them. They have lost nearly everything they had. I think they would be almost as willing to repudiate the confederate debt as the United States debt.

Question. Would they get rid of them both if they could, think you?

Answer. I think they would get rid of both if they could.

Question. Do you think that that is their ultimate aim?

Answer. I have heard an expression of opinion to that effect, not among the men of influence but among the people, that if the south could manage to get control of the government again they would repudiate both debts; that, as they had been forced to repudiate their own debt, they would repudiate that of the United States.

Question. How do they propose to get possession of the government? What is to be the machinery by which they are to fasten themselves upon it as engineers?

Answer. They expect to get control of it by getting back into the Congress of the United States, and acting with that portion of northern citizens who have always been considered natural allies of the south.

Question. What is the name commonly given to that portion of northern citizens?

Answer. The democratic party of the north.

Question. Sometimes called copperheads?

Answer. The reconstruction of the democratic party would probably give the south again control of the government of the United States. I really believe that they think that by sustaining President Johnson in his course they will re-establish the democratic party, and, in that way, get control of the government of the United States.

Question. Will they be likely to take up President Johnson for re-election as the democratic candidate?

Answer. I suppose they would, sir.

Question. Do they appear to have an inclination in that direction?

Answer. I have heard no opinion expressed with reference to the future, and therefore I am unable to say what they would do.

Question. Do they seem to regard him as their friend?

Answer. Yes, sir; they consider him, in the south, as peculiarly their friend.

Question. How do they feel towards the majority in the two houses of Congress who commonly go by the denomination of radicals?

Answer. I think you get a good idea in regard to that feeling by the expressions and sentiments of almost all our papers. They represent pretty extensively the feelings of the people generally in regard to that.

Question. Describe that feeling in your own terms?

Answer. I think it is a feeling of hostility against what is considered the dominant party in Congress?

Question. They would be glad to overthrow them?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you think of anything else which you desire to say?

Answer. Nothing at all. It was very unexpected to me to be called before this committee. I came to Washington on business, and found myself served with a summons. I did not know that it was even known that I was in the city of Washington.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1866

John H. Anderson sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Richmond, Virginia.

Question. How old are you ?

Answer. Thirty-one.

Question. What is your position ?

Answer. I have been lately storekeeper and general agent in the Richmond penitentiary. My business before the war was that of tobacco manufacturer. I was appointed by Governor Peirpoint, in July last, as general agent and storekeeper in the penitentiary in Richmond, and was turned out of office by the Virginia legislature, now in session.

Question. Were you turned out on any charge of misconduct on your part ?

Answer. None in the world, sir.

Question. Had you been a Union man during the war ?

Answer. Yes ; I was one of the two men in the city of Richmond who voted against the ordinance of secession. In 1864 I came here and got an appointment in the Quartermaster General's office. When the city of Richmond was captured in April I went there, where my family lives. I found there was no chance of getting into business there, as most of my property was destroyed by the fire. What I had left behind I had been robbed of by an old man, a partner of mine, who was a secessionist. As soon as Governor Peirpoint came down there I asked him for an office, and he gave me that one, which I held for seven months.

Question. Have you any idea why the patriotic legislature of Virginia turned you out of office ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; I know the reason.

Question. What was it ?

Answer. Because I was a Union man.

Question. Are you able to say whether that was made a charge against you in the legislature ?

Answer. The members of the legislature perfectly understood it. I was a marked man in Richmond for having voted against the ordinance of secession. I am well known there, as my father and grandfather before me did business there, and my family is a well-known family there.

Question. Has the legislature extended that kind of compliment to other officers who are known as Union men ?

Answer. To all of them, sir. Only one of a party of five who were appointed by the governor was elected by the legislature. I allude to the first auditor, who was the only officer retained, and he was appointed in the first instance and retained afterwards because he was a competent man.

Question. He was not turned out by the legislature ?

Answer. No, sir ; he was unanimously elected.

Question. Have you heard the statement made by Dr. Mills on this occasion ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And you understood all the answers he has given ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What do you say in regard to the subjects about which he has testified ? Do you concur with him or dissent ?

Answer. I concur with him.

Question. In all the statements he has made ?

Answer. Yes, sir. I know that the secessionists in the city of Richmond would not associate with me on account only of my being a Union man. I know that they treat us Union men in such a way as to make it very unpleasant for us to live there. I have been associating while I have been there with some few Union families and United States officers.

Question. Your family is a good family there, is it not ?

Answer. Yes, sir. My family has always been in the habit of associating with good families in Richmond ; but they did not recently associate with us on my account. I knew the Union officers there very well, and the secessionists have been more bitter against me on that account, for associating with United States officers. I have heard sneering remarks made on the street and in public places about Union men associating with damned Yankees.

Question. Do they call you a damned Yankee ?

Answer. Certainly ; they call every Union man a Yankee.

Question. And commonly prefix the epithet "damned ?"

Answer. Yes, sir. The feeling is getting more bitter every day. When I first went back they all met me kindly and were very glad to see me ; but as soon as they found out the policy of the President of the United States they turned, and then I was proscribed. I agree with Dr. Mills, that no Union man stands a chance of being elected to any office. I do not think they can do any business with profit. I should be very sorry to go into business there to-morrow, dependent upon the citizens of Richmond for support.

Question. Suppose you had a suit for the recovery of a just claim in any of the State courts of Virginia ; would you be prejudiced before the court on account of your Unionism ?

Answer. I think so. I should fear it.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1866.

Major General Alfred H. Terry sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. What is your rank in the army ?

Answer. I am major general of volunteers and brigadier general and brevet major general in the United States army.

Question. Where are you now stationed ?

Answer. In Richmond, Virginia.

Question. How long have you been in command there ?

Answer. Since about the middle of last June.

Question. What amount of force have you in your department ?

Answer. By the last return there were, present and absent, 2,942 men. The number actually present in the department, including officers of the Veteran Reserve Corps, reporting to the freedmen's commissioner, is between 2,600 and 2,700.

Question. At what points are they chiefly stationed ?

Answer. At Richmond, Fredericksburg, Charlottesville, Lynchburg, Bristol, Danville, Petersburg, City Point, Norfolk, Fort Monroe, Yorktown, and Williamsburg. These are mostly one and two-company posts.

Question. What is the territorial extent of your department ?

Answer. The State of Virginia, with the exception of Alexandria, Fairfax, and Loudon counties, and the northern part of the Shenandoah valley.

Question. Have you much to do with the Freedmen's Bureau in your department ?

Answer. I have. A great deal of business comes to me from the bureau, and I am in constant communication with Colonel Brown, the assistant commissioner.

Question. What are your means of knowledge of the state of affairs in Virginia, or throughout your department ?

Answer. I do not come in direct personal contact with the people of Virginia as much as many of my subordinates do. I have no social intercourse with any except those known to be Union people.

Question. Why not ?

Answer. They do not seek me; and it is neither becoming my position as the commanding officer of the department, nor consistent with my self-respect, to seek them first. My knowledge of affairs is derived from the business that comes to me officially, from official reports of my subordinates, and from unofficial information of occurrences which I receive from those of my own people in whom I have confidence. It is derived, also, from what I see in the public press of Virginia, and from what is brought to my attention, officially and unofficially, by the commissioner of freedmen's affairs. I frequently see citizens on official business, but not as frequently as my subordinates do. My business is done chiefly on paper.

Question. What, generally, is the feeling on the part of the secession element towards the Unionists, whether native Virginians or persons from other States ?

Answer. I think it is as hostile as it has ever been. As to the feeling towards the people of the north, I do not think that it has essentially changed from what it was before the war and during the war. There is still the same hatred of, and the same contempt for, them.

Question. How much social intercourse is there between them.

Answer. Very little, so far as my knowledge goes; very little, indeed.

Question. Are you prepared to say that the state of feeling between secessionists and Unionists is one of bitter hostility ?

Answer. I think it is.

Question. Are Unionists secure in the enjoyment of their rights in the midst of a secession community there ?

Answer. I do not think they are.

Question. Can they safely rely on the State courts for justice to themselves and protection to their rights ?

Answer. No, sir; I think not.

Question. How would it be, for instance, in a suit between a strong Union man, whether residing there or from a loyal State, and a secessionist? Would you apprehend that a jury, called in the regular way in Virginia, would be prejudiced against a Union man ?

Answer. While I do not know of any such case, such is my impression in regard to the feelings of secessionists towards Union men that I think that the rights of the latter, under these circumstances, would not be secured. I know, from conversation with Union men, that such is the general impression among them.

Question. What do the secessionists appear to desire? What great object have they in view ?

Answer. In the first place, having failed to maintain the separate nationality which they asserted, they desire to keep themselves a separate people, and to prevent, by any means in their power, our becoming a homogeneous nation; secondly, they desire to make treason honorable and loyalty infamous, and to secure, as far as they may be able, political power.

Question. And, of course, the great object which they immediately have in view is the possession of political power ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How do they regard President Johnson's liberal policy in reconstructing the States and granting pardons and amnesties ?

Answer. They seem to be very much pleased with it. They would, of course, regard with great favor any action tending to restore them to their former status.

Question. Do you hear any expressions of disloyalty among them towards President Johnson ?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Suppose they got into power again, with their full representation in Congress, and with a President who, like Mr. Buchanan, should disavow the right of the government of the United States to coerce a State, and should decline to use the military force of the government to prevent secession ; would they or would they not, in your opinion, again secede from the Union and attempt to set up an independent government ?

Answer. If these or any other circumstances should occur, and they should be convinced that, notwithstanding their former failure, they then would have a certainty of success, I think they would attempt to secede again.

Question. State whether they are in the habit of speaking contemptuously of the government of the United States as a political institution ?

Answer. They are.

Question. Do you know, or have you any reason to believe, that there are now existing in your department, or elsewhere in the rebel States, any combinations or conspiracies among the secessionists with a view to the ultimate establishment of southern independence, or a renewal of the rebellion, directly or indirectly ?

Answer. I know of none.

Question. Have you any reason to believe in the existence of any ?

Answer. I have none.

Question. In the event of a war between the United States and any foreign government, such as England or France, and in the event of there being a prospect of the establishment of southern independence, by an alliance between the secession element in the south and the foreign enemy, have you any reason to suppose that that element would ally itself with the foreign enemy, or take any part in the war against the United States ?

Answer. I think that, such has been the punishment which they have received for their recent attempt to throw off the authority of the government, unless there was a very strong prospect of success, they would be reluctant to engage in another attempt of the kind, with or without alliance ; but, should a powerful foreign enemy land upon the southern coast, they would receive some material aid and much sympathy, under all circumstances. Should the circumstances be such as to promise them their independence, then a very large portion of the people of the south would join the enemy.

Answer. And, in view of the contingency of a foreign war with a powerful nation, and the occurrence of such an invasion of our territory, do you regard the rebel States, one or altogether, as an element of strength in the government of the United States at the present time ?

Answer. No, sir ; on the contrary, most decidedly an element of weakness.

Question. This conclusion, I take it, you have drawn from a careful observation of the sentiments and feelings of the southern people, so far as you have had an opportunity ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What is their treatment generally towards the freedmen ?

Answer. It is very various. Many persons are treating the freedmen kindly and justly, endeavoring to accommodate themselves to the changed circumstances of the times, and to enter into the proper relations with them as between employers and employed. Many others, on the contrary, treat them with great harshness and injustice, and seek to obtain their services without just compensation, and to reduce them to a condition which will give to the former masters all the benefits of slavery, and throw upon them none of its responsibilities.

Question. So far as you can judge, which class is the more numerous, those who treat the freedmen kindly, or those who treat them with injustice and severity ?

Answer. The latter.

Question. Do you think they greatly predominate in numbers ?

Answer. I can hardly estimate the relative proportions ; I think that they predominate.

Question. Do you suppose, from what you have seen and heard, and from what you know, that it would be safe to intrust the great body of freedmen in Virginia, or elsewhere in the south, to the care of the local authorities or the local legislatures ?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Suppose this were done, what consequences, in your judgment, would be likely to follow ? Would they not maltreat the black race, deprive them of their rights, embarrass them in the enjoyment of their property, if they should have any, provoke them, goad them, if necessary, to acts of violence, which the blacks might suppose they were performing in their own defence, and in their own interests, and in this way, within some short time, bring about an open bloody resistance on the part of the black population ?

Answer. I should say there would be danger that the blacks would commit those acts which an oppressed people sooner or later commit against their oppressors.

Question. Have you reason to believe that the blacks possess arms to any extent at the present time?

Answer. I have been told that they do. I have received that information from citizens of Virginia, including State officials, who have entreated me to take the arms of the blacks away from them.

Question. Who were those officials?

Answer. Some were members of the present legislature. I have been also asked to do so by a public meeting held in one of the counties.

Question. Have you, in any case, issued orders for disarming blacks?

Answer. I have not.

Question. The blacks, I suppose, are almost universally loyal?

Answer. I think there is no question about that?

Question. How do the Virginians feel in regard to the education of the blacks?

Answer. There is great difference of opinion in that respect in different communities. In some places the people approve of it cordially, and many have taken part in it. In other places the reverse is the case. Cases have come to my knowledge where persons coming to teach blacks were not permitted to rent a place either for a school or for their own personal occupation; and it has been reported to me that teachers sent to teach the blacks have been treated with great contempt, and in some places threatened. Then, again, in the city of Lynchburg, for instance, the city authorities cordially entered into the arrangements for teaching the blacks in connexion with the military authorities. There is this variation of feeling, and what is the prevailing feeling I cannot tell.

Question. What is the political character of the present legislature of Virginia?

Answer. Judging by its actions, and by the language used by many of its members in debate, it is not a loyal legislature.

Question. In case of the withdrawal of military protection from Virginia, what would be the condition of the loyal people in Virginia and of the blacks?

Answer. I think they would be in a lamentable condition. Such is the prejudice entertained, especially against those who were faithful to their obligations to the government during the war, that I do not think they would receive any adequate protection for their rights of person or property from the people or from the courts; and I think that they would be persecuted through the machinery of the courts as well as privately. Even now, when military law prevails in the State, and when military authority is supreme, attempts are made in the courts to punish Unionists for acts done by them under military authority during the war, and I have been obliged to interfere and release from prison men thus prosecuted.

Question. Has that been of frequent occurrence?

Answer. I have directed the cessation of proceedings in some five or six cases of this kind. In some of them the parties had been admitted to bail; in some they were imprisoned. I have released those in prison, and in all cases have taken possession of the indictments and warrants and, when bonds have been given, of the bonds.

Question. Would the Unionists be safe, so to speak, in case of the removal of the protecting troops?

Answer. I think not; and in that opinion I am supported by, as I think, the unanimous feeling of the Unionists themselves, which has been frequently, and still continues to be, expressed to me.

Question. Has the liberal policy of President Johnson in granting pardons and amnesties to the rebels had the effect, in your opinion, to increase or to decrease the feeling of respect towards the government of the United States on the part of the people of Virginia?

Answer. I am unable to trace results to their causes in that matter; but since the time when I took command, especially since military restraint has been so much relaxed as it has been during the last two or three months, disloyal utterances and disloyal publications have very much increased. They seem to have increased in proportion to the relaxation of military restraint.

Question. The newspaper known as the Richmond Examiner has been recently suppressed by an order emanating from General Grant?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. For the utterance of disloyal sentiments, and of language insulting to Unionists and to the northern section of the country?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Has that paper a large circulation?

Answer. I do not know its circulation.

Question. How is it regarded? Is it regarded as one of the leading exponents of public feeling and opinion in Virginia?

Answer. It seems to be an exponent of the secession feeling.

Question. Are you acquainted with its publisher or editor?

Answer. I have seen the editor and publisher once or twice.

Question. Did you execute the order of General Grant?

Answer. I caused it to be executed. I gave the order to General Turner, who commands in Richmond.

Question. And he executed it?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Has the order been revoked or modified in any way?

Answer. It has.

Question. By whose order, so far as you know?

Answer. So far as I know officially, by General Grant's order.

Question. Has it been revoked entirely?

Answer. It has been revoked temporarily by order of General Grant, and, as I understand, on condition that, in future, it will not pursue a course inimical to the government or to the growth or expression, in acts and words, of Union sentiment among the people of the States lately in rebellion, or to the cultivation of friendly relations between the people of those States, or any of them, and the other States of the Union, and that it will not in any way fail in its editorials, correspondence, or transfer of articles from other newspapers, to give support, countenance, and friendship to acts and expressions of loyalty to the Union and its supporters.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you desire to state to the committee?

Answer. No, sir.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1866.

Charles H. Lewis sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Rockingham county, Virginia.

Question. Have you been occupying any public position in Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir. I was appointed secretary of the commonwealth by Governor Peirpoint in May last, at Alexandria, under what is called the restored government.

Question. Did you enter upon the discharge of your duties?

Answer. Yes, immediately upon my appointment.

Question. Where?

Answer. At Alexandria.

Question. How long did you remain there?

Answer. I remained until the latter end of May, and then I went to Richmond with Governor Peirpoint when the restored government went there.

Question. On reaching Richmond what archives of the State government of Virginia did you find remaining?

Answer. I think all the archives of the State government connected with my office were in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, with the exception of one box of papers. The contents of that box I never learned. The chief clerk of the rebel secretary said that they were important documents, but what they were I never was able to ascertain. In the discharge of my duties I never found any papers missing that I had occasion to use.

Question. Do you know what became of that box?

Answer. I do not. I took measures to endeavor to recover it, but all the United States officers to whom I applied reported to me that they never could find it.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that it was destroyed, with its contents?

Answer. The chief clerk of the secretary of the commonwealth under the rebel government informed me that it was taken possession of by order of General Weitzel; but that was a hearsay statement in the case. He did not know the fact that General Weitzel had possession of it. He had derived it from somebody else.

Question. How long did you exercise the functions of secretary of state of the commonwealth?

Answer. From the time of my appointment in May until the 11th of January, 1866. It is proper to state that I had discharged the duties of secretary of the commonwealth for some time at Alexandria before I had a regular appointment.

Question. And in the mean time the legislature of Virginia had assembled?

Answer. Yes, sir. The legislature of Virginia assembled the first Monday in December, 1865—that is, what claims to be the present legislature of Virginia.

Question. Composed, I suppose, of members elected under the laws of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir. They so claim.

Question. Were they elected under the laws passed by the rebel legislature of Virginia, or under the old laws in force before the rebellion?

Answer. It is proper that I should give some explanation of that election. On our return to Richmond, what is called the Alexandria constitution was in operation—that is, a constitution adopted by the convention assembled at Alexandria in 1864. That constitution was framed, of course, under what is called the restored government—I mean the government which was recognized by the government of the United States. It was called the restored government of Virginia because it was restored at Wheeling by a loyal convention assembled there. That Alexandria constitution was in operation and was recognized as the constitution of Virginia. There was an article in that constitution which forbade all persons from voting who did not take and subscribe an oath that they would be loyal to the government of the United States, that they recognized and would uphold and defend the government of Virginia as established at Wheeling in June, 1861, and that since the 1st of January, 1864, they had not been voluntarily engaged in the rebellion against the government of the United States. That was the substance of the oath. That article of the constitution further provided that no person should hold office who had held any office, military or civil, except county offices, under the so-called government of the Confederate States, or under any State government in rebellion against the government of the United States. The legislature of Virginia, which was called the Alexandria legislature, was convened by Governor Peirpoint at Richmond in a called session in June, 1865. That legislature provided that the governor should submit to the people at the next election for members of Congress and of the general assembly the question whether the next legislature should have power to alter and amend that third article of the constitution. At the same election at which this vote was taken a number of persons were elected as members of the general assembly who were ineligible under the third article of the constitution. On the day of the assembling of the legislature at Richmond the house of delegates was organized without any reference to the ineligibility of any person claiming to be a member under that third article of the constitution. The legislature, after being organized, took measures to remove the restrictions, although a number of the persons who voted for the removal of the restrictions were ineligible under the constitution. Their first act was to elect a speaker who had been a member of the confederate congress—Colonel John B. Baldwin.

Question. Were you turned out of office?

Answer. I was not re-elected to the office of secretary of the commonwealth.

Question. When would your term of office expire?

Answer. The legislature proceeded to the election of a secretary of the commonwealth, by joint ballot, under a resolution adopted by themselves; but for that resolution my term of office would not have expired until January, 1867.

Question. Whom did they elect in your place?

Answer. Mr. John M. Herndon.

Question. What was his political character?

Answer. I do not know, further than that I have always heard and believed that he sympathized and acted with the secession party during the war.

Question. State whether the removal from office, by joint action of the legislature, was general in Virginia?

Answer. Every Union man who held office by Governor Peirpoint's appointment, whom the legislature could reach, was removed.

Question. What is the present political complexion of the two houses of the Virginia legislature?

Answer. I believe that the majority of both houses is composed of men who sympathized with the rebellion; a considerable majority.

Question. Can you state what proportion of them were actually engaged in the rebellion?

Answer. I cannot.

Question. What proportion of them had been pardoned by the President?

Answer. I cannot tell how many of them had been pardoned. I know that many of them had been; but I cannot even approximate the number. I believe that all of them who owned $20,000 worth of property had been pardoned. Those who did not own so much property of course had no need to be pardoned. The speaker of the house of delegates, I know, had been pardoned by the President. He came under a different clause, and I know that a number of other members of the two houses had been pardoned by the President, because their pardons went through my office.

Question. What is the feeling among the secessionists in Virginia toward the government of the United States?

Answer. My decided impression in regard to that matter is, that the masses of the people (and by that term I do not mean only the laboring classes, but I mean all those persons who are not politicians) were very favorably disposed toward the government of the United States at the time of Lee's surrender. I believe that very decided efforts have been made by the politicians to change that feeling since that time, and I am afraid that they have had a great deal of success. I believe that the majority of the people of Virginia would still be loyal to the government of the United States if it were not for the pressure of the press and the politicians, who, to a great extent, control public opinion. I believe that many of the old secession politicians are actively engaged in promoting dissatisfaction with the government of the United States.

Question. How do these politicians feel toward President Johnson's policy in regard to the reconstruction of the States?

Answer. They all profess to be decidedly in favor of President Johnson's policy of reconstruction, which, they either believe or profess to believe, means the restoration to power of the men who have been disloyal at the north and at the south.

Question. Do you think that President Johnson's liberal policy in granting pardons and amnesties has made the masses of the people more or less respectful to the government of the United States than they were before?

Answer. When the restored government first went back to Richmond, the politicians professed great anxiety to be pardoned in order that they might get their property back, resume their avocations, and be released from the penalties of treason; and they made very loud professions of accepting the condition of things, and of being anxious to become true and loyal subjects of the United States government. After most of them got pardons, I found among the politicians a very decided change for the worse.

Question. Have you reason to apprehend that schemes are cherished by any of the late rebels in Virginia for a renewal of the war, or for the establishment of what is known as southern independence, in any event?

Answer. I have no reason to believe that there is any organization in the State for that purpose; but, from the conversation of some of the most outspoken of the secessionists of the State, I am inclined to think that a great many of them would be very glad to see the country involved in a foreign war, in the hope that they could again get up a secession party in the south; but I have no idea that a majority or anything like a majority of the people of Virginia entertain any such wish or desire now. I believe that feeling is entirely confined to the most ultra secessionists.

Question. How do secessionists generally feel in regard to the payment of the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war; are they willing to pay it, or would they prefer to repudiate and get rid of it?

Answer. I believe that the politicians would, if they were encouraged to do so, gladly persuade the people to repudiate the national debt; but it is not their policy to profess this intention now; most of them declare that they have no such wish or intention; but I have no confidence in them. The masses of the people would be disposed to meet all their obligations to the nation. As to the assumption of the confederate debt, I would say that I do not believe that the leaders of the rebellion—I speak of the majority of them—ever contemplated the payment of that debt even if the rebellion succeeded. I have no doubt the secessionists of Virginia would gladly vote for the assumption of the confederate debt by the nation.

Question. You do not think that it would touch their consciences very deeply to be deprived of the pleasure of paying the rebel debt contracted in the prosecution of the rebellion?

Answer. No, sir. I think that a great many of them, if the debt could be paid without gaining unpopularity by taxing the people, would be glad to pay it; but I do not think they would be willing now to impose a tax upon the people. That would make them unpopular.

Question. Where is the great mass of the confederate bonds and currency now?

Answer. Soon after we went to Richmond I saw a great number of them hawked about the streets by the boys for sale, for whatever they could get for them. The United States officers, soldiers, and others bought them as curiosities. For some time past I have not seen a confederate note or bond. I do not know where they are now.

Question. Can you explain what are known as the cotton bonds?

Answer. No, sir, I cannot. I never knew what became of those cotton bonds. I presume they are in the hands of capitalists in London and Paris. I never owned any confederate securities, and never had anything to do with the confederacy, except this: When the ordinance of secession passed, I was under forty-five years of age, and I was called out with the militia. I could not get away, and of course I had to go out. I was adjutant of my regiment. We did no fighting, and were only a short time in the service. If I had supposed that our regiment would have done any harm to the United States, I should have endeavored to keep out of the service; but, believing that we would not hurt anybody, and that nobody would hurt us, I thought that it was best for us Union men to go into the militia. At that time we were not without hopes that we might be able to induce the people to go back into the Union, and we thought we would not make any open opposition nor produce any issue just at that time, but wait our opportunity. I never held any confederate security, and never voted at any election, under the confederate government, except county officers, believing that to do so would be to recognize the confederate government.

Question. Were you in Richmond at the time of the passage of the ordinance of secession?

Answer. I was not. I left Richmond a few days before the ordinance was passed.

Question. While you were there at that time, did you hear anything about President Lincoln making a proposition to evacuate Fort Sumter or Fort Pickens?

Answer. I did not. My brother, who was a member of the convention, informed me, a very considerable time after the convention adjourned, that he understood that such a proposition had been made to Colonel Baldwin and had been withheld from the convention.

Question. What is the general feeling among the substantial classes of Virginia towards the freedmen?

Answer. That depends on localities. I think that in some localities there is a disposition to treat the freedmen with kindness and liberality; but I believe, from what I have learned, that in other localities there is a disposition manifested to be illiberal to them. I do not by any means believe that it would be entirely safe at present to leave the negroes to the local officers in the State or to the legislature. I believe that if the masses of the people were let alone, they would treat the negroes with kindness and humanity; but the turbulent portion of the community would be anxious always to treat the negroes with unkindness, and would try to create difficulties by endeavoring to raise rows, and to excite the white people against them.

Question. Do you think that a great many of them would be willing to reduce the blacks again to slavery?

Answer. I believe that a large number of persons would be very glad to do so if they could. I do not believe that among the intelligent people of Virginia there is any hope or expectation of any such thing; I have heard some persons who were large slaveholders say that they would not have slavery re-established in Virginia; but I know that there is a very large number of persons in Virginia who would be very glad, if they had any means of doing so, to reduce the blacks to slavery again. I do not think, however, that they have any idea of attempting it, or hope or expectation of accomplishing it. My impression in regard to the condition of things in Virginia is about this: The design of the politicians and of the disloyal press is, as far as possible, to create an alienation of feeling, and to inculcate a spirit of bitterness among the southern people against the north. My decided impression is that the politicians, and a portion of the clergy, and the disloyal press, are busily engaged in that attempt.

Question. What does all that look to?

Answer. I think they have a double motive in it. They wish to impress the people with the sentiment that the secessionists are the only patriots in the State; and they hope, by a union with the disloyal people of the north, to be able to get control of the government.

Question. Suppose they should do that, and suppose they should have a President of the United States who entertained the same political doctrines as James Buchanan entertained in regard to the coercion of a State, renouncing for the United States all power to coerce a rebel State, and suppose we should have a Congress of the same political stripe, what would be the result in regard to secession?

Answer. Then every intelligent loyal man would tremble for the safety of the nation; I believe the secessionist politicians of the south would eagerly avail themselves of such an opportunity to dismember the republic. Whether the masses of the people of Virginia could be persuaded into another rebellion is doubtful. When the restored government went to Richmond in May last, Governor Peirpoint received assurances from every part of the State of the earnest loyalty of the people. I am sure that the people were sincere; I regret to have to express the fear that very many of those who were active in promoting and sustaining the rebellion were not. Every means in their power is used to induce the people to regard those who made themselves conspicuous in their efforts to destroy the government of the United States as patriots, and to render those who desired to restore the Union odious. The secession leaders rely very much, as I gather from their conversations, on the sympathy and assistance of the "peace democracy" of the north to enable them to get into power. I have heard some of them say that Ben. Wood had promised them that the northern democracy would sustain them.

Question. Should you or not apprehend, in such an event, a reassertion of the doctrine of secession practically?

Answer. I should.

Question. Have you any doubt that the rebel States, including Virginia, would again go out of the Union by secession?

Answer. I am rather inclined to think that there would be a pretty hard fight in Virginia. I do not think that the masses of our people want to go out of the Union any more; I believe that the object of the politicians and of the press is to bring about a state of things which would produce that result; but I am in hopes that the masses of the people of Virginia have too much good sense ever to go out if they can help it. It is proper to state that all these politicians now profess loyalty to the Union, but I am very free to say that I distrust their professions very much.

Question. Have you ever had a conversation with any of the persons who were prominent in the rebellion on the subject of the manner in which the oath of allegiance to the government of the United States, usually designated as the "amnesty oath," is regarded by the secessionists in Virginia?

Answer. I have heard Generals Wickam, Mahone, and some others repeatedly declare that they had taken the oath in good faith and meant to keep it. I have, on the other hand, heard other persons who were engaged in the rebellion speak of the oath as an oath taken under compulsion, coupled with the intimation that it was not binding. I remember a conversation I had with Governor Henry A. Wise, in my office in December last, whilst I was secretary of the commonwealth of Virginia. A number of pardons by the President were lying on the table near us, and Governor Wise remarked that if he had his way he would burn every one that had been issued. I jestingly remarked to him that if he would make out his application I would take great pleasure in forwarding it to Washington, as I had no doubt Governor Peirpoint would recommend it. He replied that we were much more kind to them (meaning those who had been actively engaged in the rebellion) than they would have been to us; "for," said he, "if I had caught Governor Peirpoint or yourself whilst I was in command, I would have hanged you, notwithstanding my respect for the honesty which I have no doubt influenced your conduct. But, sir, I could not take that oath; I feel for my old friends when some of them tell me, with tears in their eyes, that they feel degraded at having taken it to save their property, and others laughingly refer to it as 'a mere custom-house oath.' Now, sir, if I take an oath I will keep it." I do not pretend to give the precise words of Governor Wise, but I have given the substance of what he said on this subject. I should add that Governor Wise, whilst he complained of the treatment he had received from the government of the United States, declared his intention to comply strictly with the terms of his parole, and said that even now he loved the old Union better than most of those who made loud professions of devotion to it. The conversation made a deep impression on my mind, as it confirmed the misgivings I had felt for some time previous as to the sincerity of many of those who had obtained their pardons by making professions of a determination to be loyal for the future.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1866.

Manasseh Blackburn sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Rockingham county, Virginia.

Question. How long have you resided there?

Answer. I have resided in the county since 1862, and in the valley since 1858.

Question. Have you taken any part in the rebellion?

Answer. No part, more than in connexion with Mr. Lewis—we were compelled to make iron for the rebels. We were induced, through expediency, to make a contract with the confederate government to make iron for it so as to keep hands out of the army. We made a contract, I think, in the fall of 1863.

Question. Are you an iron manufacturer?

Answer. Yes, sir; that is my profession. I moved there from Pennsylvania.

Question. You have been always a Union man?

Answer. Yes, sir. We thought it better for us to hold the works than to let the rebel government send people there themselves to work them. After consultation we thought that we were doing less for the confederacy that way than if we let the government use the works themselves.

Question. What is the feeling in your neighborhood, on the part of the secessionists, towards the United States government?

Answer. I think it is right hostile. I do not think there is much change since the surrender. They are speaking out more boldly now than they did in June or July.

Question. What is their tone now?

Answer. They think they are badly treated; that they are taxed without representation. I heard a remark made on the ears yesterday, that only one scene of the play was over yet; that the curtain had fallen when Lincoln was assassinated, and that one similar scene was to follow, unless their representatives were admitted, or unless there was a change in the policy of the United States government.

Question. Did that person go on and inform you what the next scene was to be?

Answer. No, sir; he stopped short at that.

Question. Did he seem to be a man of consequence?

Answer. There were five or six men talking together, and they seemed to be men of character. It is the general talk, that the people are more disaffected now than they were after the surrender. I can see it, too, from their movements and conversation, but I believe that the masses of the people, the working classes, in the valley are loyal—partly voluntarily, and partly compulsorily.

Question. How do they feel towards the freedmen?

Answer. In the valley I think that, as a general thing, they treat the freedmen nearly right, but in eastern Virginia I think that the feeling is rather against the freedmen. I do not think they would do justice to them. I am employing about one hundred and fifty hands, and most of them are freedmen, and I find them very good hands.

Question. Do you notice much idleness and vagabondage among the freedmen?

Answer. None at all in our neighborhood.

Question. If they are liberally and fairly paid, will they not work and support themselves as well as white men?

Answer. My experience has been such. They all show a disposition to try and earn something, and to get homes for their families. They come to me and say they want to get a house and home and go to work. They work with energy, and seem anxious and rejoiced that they are earning something and getting their pay. They show a disposition to be good citizens.

Question. Do you discover a disposition among the whites to allow the blacks to own real estate and personal property ?

Answer. I have not heard anything said in the valley as regards that. East of the ridge I have heard some gentlemen say that they should never be allowed to have a roof over their heads, or should not have any countenance shown to them at all. But I believe that the mass of the people in the valley would treat the freedmen as they should be treated.

Question. Have you ever held any public office ?

Answer. No, sir ; I never have.

Question. Can you relate any incident going to show the feeling on the part of the whites towards Union men or blacks ?

Answer. No ; I do not know that I can.

Question. What chance does a black man or a Unionist stand in the State courts for justice and the protection of his rights ?

Answer. I would doubt whether a Unionist can get justice. He might in some pecuniary matters get justice, but I doubt whether in other things he could. I think that, as far as the blacks are concerned in the valley, they could in pecuniary matters get justice—they could collect bills, or anything of that kind.

Question. What, generally, is the treatment shown by disunionists toward the Unionists in your vicinity ?

Answer. They regard us as intruders—not their equals. Their families will not associate with ours ; they consider us as rebels to their so-called government.

Question. Do they speak of you as traitors ?

Answer. Yes, sir, as traitors to the country ; and they curse a man who would not fight for the country, and for the government which supports him—and such stuff. It has been very frequently said, by neighbors who visited my family, that they were ridiculed for visiting “ Union trash.” They curse us as Yankees and intruders, and such things.

Question. Is that a general feeling, or merely occasional ?

Answer. That feeling, I think, has worn off, in regard to ourselves, since the failure of the rebellion. It was the general feeling before ; but since they saw they could not drive us away from the neighborhood they have given it up. In my case I suppose it is a little different, for I bring a good deal of money into the neighborhood, and they therefore court my favor. I am putting up works and introducing a good deal of labor, and that seems to be removing some of the antipathy to me.

Question. You are not a native of Virginia ?

Answer. No, sir ; I am a native of Chester county, Pennsylvania.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to relate ?

Answer. No, sir ; I think not.

Question. Are there any Union troops in your neighborhood ?

Answer. None nearer than Charlestown

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1866.

Rev. James W. Hunnicutt sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. Fredericksburg, Virginia.

Question. What is your profession ?

Answer. I am a minister of the gospel, and edited a religious paper before the war.

Question. To what denomination do you belong ?

Answer. To the Baptist.

Question. How long have you resided in Fredericksburg ?

Answer. I came to Fredericksburg in April, 1847.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia ?

Answer. No, sir ; I am a native of Pendleton district, South Carolina.

Question. Are you acquainted with the state of feeling in the neighborhood where you reside toward the government of the United States ?

Answer. I think I am.

Question. Please state what appears to be the prevailing feeling there.

Answer. I think you have the religion of the place, as it is called, and the capital of the place, and the politics of the place, and the social influence of the place, all against the government and against Union men who are in favor of the government. The Union men are virtually disfranchised.

Question. Would it be safe for a Union man to go to the polls and vote there at an election ?

Answer. No, sir, not even with the military there. If the military and the Freedmen's Bureau were removed from there, we could neither vote there nor stay there in peace and safety. That is the honest conviction of my heart.

Question. What is the feeling generally in your denomination?

Answer. I have not visited any of my churches in the lower part of Virginia, but they are generally secesh—I am sorry to inform you—so much so that I have not received an invitation to visit any church in Virginia since my return, and there are few members of my church who visit me.

Question. Has there been a rupture in the Baptist church growing out of the late troubles?

Answer. Before the war there was a Methodist Episcopal church and a Methodist church south; since the war Mr. Conway, who belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church, took possession of the parsonage, and Mr. Lanahan went down there to look after the property. Mr. Conway, who was a member of his church before the war, refused to give up the property to Mr. Lanahan, and would not let him into the church. Mr. Lanahan employed a lawyer, who got an order from headquarters that the property should be given up to Dr. Green, who is a member of the Baltimore conference, taking it from that party which has gone over to the Methodist Episcopal church south. Those who belonged to the church before the war have gone over to the Methodist Episcopal church south. Any man who professes to be a Union man is ignored in the church. For instance, the Baptists employed a local Methodist preacher named Lentner to preach for them. He was a drum-major in the confederate army. I saw him myself. After the collapse of the rebellion the Baptists were without a preacher, and this man went to their church and drummed them until they could get a minister.

Question. He kept up his drumming in the pulpit?

Answer. Yes, sir. When I returned from the north, a week ago last Sabbath, I was informed that there was a colored free school in Fredericksburg, and a free school for whites. I visited the teachers, and was told how difficult it was for them to get board. Myself and wife and Dr. Smith paid them a visit on Tuesday. I visited the schools at the request of the teachers, and was requested to address the scholars. I asked the children if any of the preachers of the town had visited them. They said not. "Has the mayor visited you?" "He has not." "Have any of the councilmen visited you?" "None." "Have any of the citizens visited you?" "None." And if the Freedmen's Bureau were removed and the military taken from Fredericksburg, that school would not continue in operation a week, and northern men could not stay there a week.

Question. Do you think that Union men, whether from the north or residents in the neighborhood, are secure in the civil courts of justice of the State?

Answer. I do not believe that any of us will get justice done. I hate to give such a bad account of my fellow-citizens, but I have no faith in them. The preachers and the editors are doing more injury now to the people of the south than any other class of men there.

Question. Do they not pray for the President of the United States occasionally?

Answer. I do not know. I do not go to hear them pray. I have no faith in their prayers or their churches.

Question. What is the effect of President Johnson's policy of reconstruction there?

Answer. They are all now for Johnson. They cursed him and Peirpoint and Brownlow and Hunnicutt—that is myself—and all of us were alike until since he has pardoned everybody down there; and they are now Johnson men. Peirpoint was their man, but they are cursing him now. They are all in favor of President Johnson's policy of reconstruction. As soon as they get their ends served by him they would not touch him, but he is their man now. They say that in 1868 the south will be a unit, and that with the help of the copperhead party of the north they will elect a President. They do not care to have slavery back, but they will try and make the federal government pay them for their slaves. A man from Virginia told me to-day that they would be paid for their negroes. This gentleman lost forty negroes. This is their idea; they do not want slavery back, but they want to be paid for their slaves. They say that unless you accept their debt they will repudiate yours. They say they are not interested in this government.

Question. They would be glad to have Uncle Sam assume the payment of the confederate debt?

Answer. Yes, sir, and to pay them for their negroes and to indemnify them for their loss of property in the war. It is an impression of most of them, men, women and children, that they are going to be paid for every rail burned, for every stick of timber destroyed, and for every negro lost. One man told me in my house that as soon as they could get the reins of government in their hands they would undo everything that this administration has done, with an awful adjective prefixed to the word "administration." He said, "We have as much right to undo what the administration has done as they have to destroy the government of the Constitution"—as they claim the administration has done.

Question. They propose to get back into the Union for the purpose of restoring the Constitution?

Answer. Yes, sir; and the testimony of the negroes will not be worth a snap of your finger, and all this is done for policy. A negro can come and give his testimony, and it passes for what it is worth with the courts. They can do what they please with it; there are the judges, the lawyers, and the jury against the negro, and perhaps every one of them is sniggering and laughing while the negro is giving his testimony.

Question. Has not the liberal policy of President Johnson in granting pardons and amnes ties rather tended to soothe and allay their feelings towards the government of the United States?

Answer. No, sir, not towards the government of the United States nor towards the Union men.

Question. What effect has it had in that respect?

Answer. It has made them more impudent. They were once humble and felt that they had done wrong, but this policy has emboldened them, and they are more impudent to-day, more intolerant, and more proscriptive than they were in 1864. They say that we are the traitors and went over to the damned Yankees. Our present mayor, Slaughter, had sixty men of Grant's army, who were wounded in the wilderness and sent to Fredericksburg, forwarded to General Lee as prisoners-of-war. When Fredericksburg fell into our hands Slaughter made his escape. The federals arrested sixty citizens of Fredericksburg to be held as hostages for these sixty soldiers whom Slaughter had sent to the enemy, and among them was my wife's brother, who was living in Fredericksburg, and yet that same Slaughter was re-elected mayor of Fredericksburg last summer after the collapse of the rebellion. Old Tom Barton, the commonwealth's attorney, said in 1861 (and I suppose his feelings are the same still) that all these Union shriekers ought to be hung as high as Haman, and this old man was re-elected commonwealth attorney by the people of the county. Every member of the rebel common council was re-elected. One of the men who were elected members of the common council from that district stated that none of the Union men who went over to the Yankees during the war should be allowed to return to Fredericksburg; he was also appointed director of a bank there. These are the men we have got over us, and what kind of justice can we expect in the courts?

Question. You will probably get pretty summary justice?

Answer. I think so; these are facts.

Question. Where is Slaughter now?

Answer. He is now mayor of Fredericksburg and will be re-elected next month; we need not run a Union man there; we are disfranchised.

Question. Is not Slaughter a good Union man?

Answer. Oh! he has been notoriously Union all the time, as the papers say—notoriously Union! I saw that stated in a Fredericksburg paper; it stated that they had been persecuting Mayor Slaughter, who had been notoriously Union all the time.

Question. You have not a great deal of confidence in the truthfulness of secession?

Answer. No, sir; I have not.

Question. Where their political standing is concerned?

Answer. I used to have some confidence, not in secession, but in the people; but it seems to me that their whole nature and character has been changed, and that when treason enters a man's heart, every virtue he has departs.

Question. Could Jefferson Davis be convicted of treason in that part of Virginia?

Answer. As I went home last Sunday week in the boat, I was in company with a delegation from the Virginia legislature which waited upon President Johnson, and I heard one of them say that there could not be a jury obtained south of the Potomac who would convict Jeff. Davis, and that the man who would write down there that Jeff. Davis should be punished would be in danger. Jeff. Davis cannot be punished down there, and they would elect Lee to-morrow, if there were no difficulty in the way, governor of Virginia. There is no question about that in my mind.

Question. Do you think of anything that you wish to relate?

Answer. No, sir; I simply wish to state that I make these remarks conscientiously. I was born and raised in the south; my interests of every kind, social, financial, religious and political, are in the south; my church is in the south, and I am going soon to Richmond to edit a paper. Nothing but the good of the country, my own safety, and the safety of my children, and of Union men and of freedmen, could have induced me to come before you and make this statement. I am a friend of the south. I have written for the south, and I shall write in behalf of the south, but the south is one thing, and traitors and treason in the south are different things.

Question. What is the political character of the Richmond Dispatch?

Answer. There are seven papers published in Richmond—seven of them; and every one of them is disloyal to the core, except the Republic, and you know the character of that. The Dispatch was one of the most devilish sheets in the State while the rebellion was going on, and it has got the same ring to it yet, and so have all of them.

Question. What is the political character of the Alexandria Gazette?

Answer. That is all secessh, heel, soul and body, and has been all the time. I used to exchange with the Alexandria Gazette before the war. I made speeches in Alexandria in 1863 and 1864, and they reported my speeches and made the worst they could of everything in order to make me odious. It is a "notoriously loyal" sheet, as they would say of Mayor Slaughter.

Question. Loyal on the principle of reconstruction?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you know much about the condition of South Carolina?

Answer. I do not; but secessh is the same everywhere.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1866.

Frederick H. Bruce sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. I reside in Rappahannock county, Virginia.

Question. What is your present occupation?

Answer. Mail agent, United States Post Office Department.

Question. On what lines in Virginia?

Answer. From Washington to Lynchburg.

Question. How long have you held that post?

Answer. Since July last.

Question. Have you mingled freely with the people of Virginia during that time?

Answer. I have in that portion of Virginia in which I have travelled. I have mingled very freely with them.

Question. Were you raised in Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Were you in Virginia during the war?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Did you take any part in the war?

Answer. The part I took in the war is on record in the Post Office Department.

Question. You were drafted, I suppose?

Answer. No, sir; I was not drafted; I was called out by the governor of the State.

Question. You never have been in active service?

Answer. I never voluntarily, or of my own free will, gave any active service to the rebellion.

Question. So far as your knowledge and information extends, what can you say as to the present condition of feeling among the residents of Virginia towards the United States; is it friendly or unfriendly?

Answer. I consider it unfriendly. As to those politicians whom I have heard converse, I can only repeat their remarks, from which I have in part made up my opinion. I can better illustrate, perhaps, by these conversations than in any other way. I heard a man in Virginia, now commonwealth's attorney, a man of influence in the county in which he lives, and of considerable ability, not ten days ago, express the sentiment that he indorsed or justified the assassination of President Lincoln; that he rejoiced at it, and if he could would build a monument to the memory of Booth as high as the skies; and this man was holding office in that State.

Question. Appointed under what administration?

Answer. He was elected by the people of the county.

Question. Do you regard him as a fair type of the political class to which he belongs, or as an extremist?

Answer. I suppose if he and a loyal man of the county were candidates together, he would receive the unanimous vote of the county, with perhaps fifty or one hundred exceptions. He also stated that those who did not uphold the President in his restoration policy, and were not identified with their people against the radicals, would forever be denounced in the southern States; that they ought not and could not expect any political favors; that he considered it a crime, politically and morally, for a man to favor the Sumner and Stevens policy.

Question. Had this man been pardoned?

Answer. I do not think he came under any of the exceptions in the amnesty proclamation. He had not $20,000, and he had not participated in the rebellion to the extent of having been in the army. I heard a doctor, a man of influence, last week make a remark, which I believe is the general sentiment of almost every one in that part of Virginia. He said he did all he could during the rebellion, and did not regret it; that he was ready and willing to resume hostilities at any time; that his only regret was that he could not have done more. This remark was made last Saturday.

Question. Was that doctor a man of position and influence?

Answer. He was a man of position and of considerable family influence.

Question. Will you name any other instance?

Answer. I will mention an incident, as told to me, that occurred in the early part of the summer, during the canvass for members of the legislature. One of the candidates had just taken the amnesty oath, and after he had taken it, he picked up a Constitution of the United States, spit upon it, threw it down, and trampled it under his feet.

Question. Was he elected to the legislature?

Answer. No, sir; he was defeated by a small majority.

Question. Was a Union man elected in his place?

Answer. No; he was not a Union man; a Union man could not have been elected in that county. This man, I was informed, had made himself obnoxious among the people there during the war, in consequence of the tyrannical course he had pursued towards poor people, and was for that reason defeated; but he was an influential man, and a man of wealth. You have perhaps heard of the difficulty that occurred at Gordonsville, which was reported in the papers, in which a mail agent was concerned; I was unfortunately that mail agent.

Question. You will please state it now.

Answer. In regard to the facts of the case as they occurred, I do not suppose it is necessary to mention them; I only refer to it for the purpose of illustrating the spirit of the people. While they were abusing me, I made some remark to them, which was replied to; and the reply seemed to hit the crowd, who took off their hats, shouted, "Jeff. Davis and the Confederate States," and gave three rounds of cheers. That was only last Christmas day.

Question. Did they commit or attempt to commit any violence upon you?

Answer. They attempted to do it, but failed to inflict any material injury. I can state in regard to the condition of things in the city of Lynchburg, that I have been informed by persons in the employment of the government, that if the troops were withdrawn from the city no man connected with the United States government would be safe in walking in the streets after dark, and I am fully satisfied of that fact.

Question. Does this arise from a hostile and bitter feeling on the part of secessionists towards Union men and the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes; towards all Union men.

Question. Is that a very general impression pervading that district of country?

Answer. Yes, though not especially in that district. I may state, that having been requested by the department, in accordance with my duty, I endeavored to get post offices established at the various points along the road, and I succeeded, with the exception of one or two places. About two months ago I asked a young man in Amherst county, at a station there, if he could not hunt up some one for postmaster there. He very indignantly replied, "No; no man was going to take that God d—d oath." I kept my temper, not wishing to get into any controversy with him, and said, "Cannot you find some lady to take it; it is necessary that some one should take it, if the post office is to be established." He said, "No; he might find some d—d nigger to take it." I replied, "That would be the most suitable person for such men." There is one matter to which I wish to call your attention. There is a State law in existence in Virginia prohibiting postmasters, under the penalty of fine, from delivering what are termed "incendiary documents." It is a law which, in my opinion, has never been repealed.

Question. Can you give the date of it?

Answer. I cannot. I suppose it has been in existence fifteen or twenty years. There were such laws in most of the southern States. If it has been repealed in Virginia I have never seen any notice of it. I call attention to it because I do not think such a law ought to remain. The postmasters, I believe, were made the judges as to what were incendiary, and they refused to deliver such documents. I recollect the New York Tribune and Helper book were considered as especially incendiary.

Question. Have you heard of any cases where postmasters have prevented the circulation of documents through the mail?

Answer. I have not since the war. About ten days ago I heard a gentlemen—a man of influence in his county in Virginia—remark that he would hail the day with joy when the extermination of races came, as the only means by which they could "get rid of the negro." He made it in my presence and in the presence of the postmaster, where I was—a loyal man. I begged him not to make such remarks. I said to him that he was a friend of mine, and that if he persisted in talking that way in my presence, it might become necessary for me to report the facts. I did not want to hear my friend make use of such language.

Question. Did he repeat it?

Answer. Yes, he repeated it.

Question. Is there any other incident that occurs to you?

Answer. I do not know that there is any other leading incident.

Question. How much chance does a Union man stand in that region for obtaining justice in the courts of the State?

Answer. My honest impression is that a leading Union man—one who had made himself notorious or conspicuous as such, as against a southern man who had been in the rebellion—would not have an equal show in the courts of justice. The prejudice is so strong, that while they may think they are acting honestly they will unconsciously be led astray; and I have no doubt there are men there who would not under any circumstances do justice to a Union man in a controversy between him and a secessionist. I believe, however, I could get justice in my own county.

Question. How do the secessionists generally feel there towards the freedmen?

Answer. I can only judge by the expressions I have heard used. A man who owned slaves, and whose slaves remained with him during the war perfectly faithful, remarked in my hearing that he had no interest whatever in them now; that while they were his slaves it was his interest to treat them well, but he had no interest in them now; that they might "rot," so far as his looking after them, getting a doctor for them, or anything of that kind. That seems to be the general feeling. I do not think there is any interest taken in these people. This is not, of course, the universal feeling; there are some good men who will look after them and treat them well.

Question. Suppose the federal troops should be withdrawn, and the Freedmen's Bureau be withdrawn: what, in your opinion, would be the treatment of the secessionists towards the negroes?

Answer. I believe the condition of the negroes would be worse than it has ever been during the time of their servitude. I do not think they could possibly remain in some portions of the country, unless the secessionists should find it to their interest to retain them. In some instances it may be so much for their interest to retain them that they will be treated well.

Question. Have you been a slaveholder?

Answer. No, sir. I have been a slave-hirer for a good many years. In some instances the freedmen behave badly. In some instances they will not keep to their contract. Of course, you will find sorry negroes, as you find sorry white men; but, as a general thing, the former slaves or freedmen are behaving remarkably well in the portion of Virginia where I have been.

Question. If they are paid fair or reasonable wages will not they work?

Answer. I think a majority of them will. A majority of them seem to show a disposition to work. At the same time they seem to show a disposition to assert their freedom, not by any violence of word or action, but they are disposed to keep to themselves, to get a little land to work on for themselves, and what they term "go to housekeeping" and "living independently."

Question. Do many of the free negroes own property in that section of country?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Do you discover a willingness or unwillingness upon the part of the whites to recognize the right of the freedmen to hold or own property, real or personal?

Answer. I think there is a great unwillingness on the part of the people to allow them to own property. I judge from the fact that it is with great difficulty that a negro can rent land to tend himself. They allow them no privileges in that respect. If the negroes will work for them they will hire them, but they are not willing to rent them lands or recognize them as citizens in any respect.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the blacks?

Answer. There is great animosity against it in some localities. I will mention an instance. A man at a town in Virginia established a freedmen's school. I was asked the question, did I suppose, or did "the God d—d government" suppose, that they would submit to having a freedmen's school there, or submit to be taxed to "educate the d—d niggers?" I asked him how he was going to prevent it. He said he would prevent it by shooting every teacher they sent there.

Question. Do you know of any instances of violence committed upon the teachers of the blacks?

Answer. None of my own knowledge. I have heard them say in one place, in boast, that they had run off or frightened away one teacher sent there, and that the other better look out. My informant said that he would be shot; he was not going to do it, but he would be shot.

Question. How do they look upon the question of the negroes voting?

Answer. That is not a question they even allow themselves to debate. They consider it too monstrous a proposition even to debate. That is one of the things they imagine they will never submit to. They will suffer confiscation and everything before they will endure that degradation. I noticed for a while after the surrender, and while the power of the government was held with a very firm grasp, while they supposed their property was in danger of being taken away from them, that most of the twenty-thousand-dollar men were very submissive and quiet. You would not hear any violent words from them; they were willing to sustain the government, and perfectly willing to agree to any means of restoration. But since they have obtained their pardons, and their property is safe, they are as violent as any other class of secessionists. I can see but very little difference in the portion of Virginia in which I have been, so far as the expressed feelings of the people are concerned, between now and before the war. The same reign of terror for Union men which existed then exists now. I can get along, and any Union man can get along with them if he will sit still, take all sorts of abuse, and never resent it. They take occasion to come round me and make use of all sorts of taunts and abuse. You will have to submit to it, or, if you make any reply, you will have violence on the spot. That is the only way a loyal man can get along in peace in that country.

Question. How do they feel towards northern loyalists—towards men from the north who have favored the prosecution of the war against the rebellion?

Answer. Their hatred towards them is just as great as it is towards loyal men in the south. As I remarked, there is still the same reign of terror there was before the war, the only difference being that then they had it all their own way. I believe now that if the army were withdrawn, and the Freedmen's Bureau were withdrawn, an actively loyal man could not live in some parts of Virginia. A great many of these men even claim to be loyal, and say they are the only loyal men; that Congress is disloyal.

Question. In case the secessionists of Virginia should have another opportunity to go out of the Union; in case, in the course of political events, they should imagine they saw in the circumstances surrounding them a chance to get out of the Union again, would they avail themselves of it?

Answer. None of them deny that they would rather live under some other government than the United States. They now complain very bitterly that their members are not admitted to Congress. I have asked them the question whether, if they had the opportunity, they would not rather live under a separate government. None of them can deny, or pretend to deny, that they would. I then asked them whether, holding such sentiments, they had the right to ask to be admitted to a full voice in administering the affairs of the government. These are the sentiments of nearly all the men in the section of Virginia with which I am familiar. There are, of course, exceptions. There are some good loyal men there, men who have never been secessionists, and there are men who were original secessionists, who fought through the war to establish the confederacy, but, having failed, are now willing in good faith to sustain the government. But the great mass of the politicians, who are the leaders of the people, are not of that spirit. They do not want the people to heartily support the government. They make them believe that the United States government is oppressing them, robbing them of their rights, and so keep them in ignorance, for a very large portion of the people have no other means of information upon these subjects. I would suggest that documents ought to be distributed among these people. Those who are willing and desire to be enlightened have not the means, and so remain in perfect ignorance.

Question. Have you reason to believe there is any secret association or organization down there with the view of a renewal of the war, or of the ultimate secession of the rebel States?

Answer. No, sir; I have no reason to believe there is any such concert of action.

Question. In case of a foreign war between the United States and any foreign government, such as England or France, what do you think would be the course pursued by the secessionists?

Answer. I have heard some of them say they had taken the amnesty oath from policy, and they would only regard it as far as it suited their policy; that, if the United States should get into a war with a foreign nation, they would not take up arms against that government, but for it. I do not know whether that sentiment is entertained generally, but I have heard soldiers say it.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1866.

William T. Joynes sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Petersburg, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native Virginian?

Answer. I was born in Virginia, and have resided there all my life.

Question. What is your occupation?

Answer. I am an attorney at-law.

Question. Do you hold any public office now?

Answer. I am a member of the house of delegates of Virginia, and chairman of the committee on courts of justice.

Question. Have the goodness to state the effect of a certain clause in what is called the Alexandria constitution of Virginia, which has been repealed or modified by an act of the legislature, relating to suffrage.

Answer. By the third article of that constitution the qualifications of suffrage were prescribed. In addition to the qualification of residence, age, &c., it was provided that no person should exercise the right of suffrage who did not take a certain oath. It was provided in that same clause that it should be in the power of the legislature to remove the disability created by that provision; that was a general provision, applicable to the whole people. There followed that a clause applicable to those who had held office under the confederate government or under the rebel State government; and it was provided that no person should hold office or vote under the constitution of the State who held office under the confederate government or rebel State government; and it was further provided that every officer in the State should take the oath prescribed in the preceding part of that section. At a special session of the legislature held in June, 1865, the legislature, acting under the provision of the prior part of that clause, modified the right of suffrage by changing the form of the oath which the voter should take, and enabled those who had taken part in the rebellion, but who were prepared to take the oath of amnesty, to vote; and provided that, instead of taking an oath that they had taken no part in the rebellion, they should take the amnesty oath; that was done by an act of June, 1865; but that only applied to the qualifications for suffrage, which were applicable to the whole people, and had no application to those who had held office under the confederate government or rebel State government, and who were the subjects of a special disqualification in the latter part of that clause. It was not in the power of the legislature to reach this by its own direct action; its power being confined to that provision which was general, which applied to all the people. The legislature therefore passed an act directing the governor to submit the question to the people at the polls whether the legislature should have authority to alter or amend the third article of the constitution; that question was submitted by the governor in the election in October last, at which time the members of the general assembly now sitting were elected; and by a vote nearly unanimous (in our part of the State it was entirely unanimous, and there were perhaps only a few hundred votes against it in all the State) power was given to the legislature to alter or amend that part of the constitution.

Question. Had the secessionists a right to vote at the polls on that question?

Answer. Every person could vote who had taken the amnesty oath. I think the oath is very much in the form of the amnesty oath; it is prescribed in the act of 23d June, 1865.

Question. No person who had not taken the amnesty oath could vote on that question?

Answer. No person who had not taken the oath prescribed in that act could vote; which, I believe, is the amnesty oath in effect.

Question. Have you any doubt about the constitutionality of that act of the legislature removing the restriction?

Answer. None; because the terms of the constitution are very plain—that it shall be in the power of the legislature to remove that restriction. I have no doubt of the constitutionality of that act. The power which the legislature exercised in submitting the question to the people at the October election was a power which is not to be found in any express grant of the constitution; but it is such a power as we would say, results from the original sovereignty of the people. The question was left to them. Acting under that authority the legislature repealed that particular part of the constitution which disqualified all those who had held office under the rebel State government or under the confederate government, and it is in that way it stands now. There was a provision in that constitution for voting by ballot. Our mode of voting has always been visa voce; and there was a strong prejudice against the introduction of voting by ballot; it was a novelty which the people did not understand and would not accept, and the general feeling was to restore the old system of voting. The legislature also restored the period of residence as in the old constitution: two years in the State, and twelve months in the county or corporation.

Question. Is that at present the law?

Answer. I believe the bill has been passed by both houses, but there is some amendment pending in one of the houses. We require that the voter shall be twenty-one years of age; shall have resided two years in the State and twelve months in the county, which was the term of residence fixed by the constitution of 1851. The Alexandria constitution had reduced the term of residence in the State to twelve months, and in the county to six months. The Alexandria constitution provided, also, that the voter should pay his taxes to the State. The constitution of 1851 did not require the payment of taxes, so that anybody, whether he paid his taxes or not, could vote. As it passed the house of delegates we required the payment of taxes to the State as well as to the county. In the senate they struck out the provision about the payment of taxes, and it has come back to our house now with the requisites of age and residence and without the requisite of the payment of taxes; and my impression is that our house has not acted on that proposition.

Question. The qualification for residence, as passed, is two years?

Answer. Yes, sir; which is the same as prescribed by the constitution of 1851.

Question. So that there will be no substantial alteration of the old constitution in that respect?

Answer. None at all, sir. There was an effort made to raise the term of residence to five years, but that was defeated by an overwhelming vote.

Question. Are there many members of the house of delegates who have been rebels during the war; who have taken an active part in promoting the objects of the rebellion, whether as officers civil or military?

Answer. I think I may say that a large majority never held any office, civil or military, during the war. There is a large proportion of old men in the house of delegates; I think there is probably a considerable majority above the military age. The speaker of the house was a colonel in the service of the State of Virginia, held the office of inspector general for awhile, and was a member of the confederate congress; I speak of Mr. Baldwin. I was myself a judge, but I had no other connexion with the rebel government in any form. I was elected a judge to supply a vacancy during the war. I never was in the army or in the civil service in any shape.

Question. Are you generally acquainted with the leading men in the State of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir. Take my own committee, consisting of fifteen gentlemen; they are mostly men above the military age, and certainly not a man of them has been in the military service during the war.

Question. Are there not a majority in each of the two houses who have been regarded as secessionists?

Answer. Originally the number of secessionists in the State was very small. I will state a fact that will probably astonish you. The first time that I ever heard any man say that he desired a dissolution of the Union was during the session of the democratic convention at Petersburg which nominated Mr. Letcher in 1860; that is the first time in all my life that I ever heard that sentiment expressed. I confess I was very much shocked at it, and I said to the gentleman, "Is it possible?" And he said with some vehemence, "Yes; that he wished the Union might go to flinders before breakfast to-morrow morning." The next time, so far as I recollect, that I heard the declaration was from old Mr. Ruffin, which was some time in 1860; he killed himself after the surrender of General Lee. Said I, "Mr. Ruffin, are you in the habit of expressing opinions of that kind?" "I have been in that habit," said he, "for ten years." I merely mention this to show you what is not generally understood, that the number of those who originally desired secession was very small; so small as to occasion that surprise on my part when I heard that declaration. When the election of Mr. Lincoln was pending, when all these unfortunate questions arose, and when excitement and bitter feelings grew up, of course the number of secessionists increased; some upon principle and some upon policy. After the election of Mr. Lincoln and the secession of South Carolina there were a great many who thought that the safest course, the politic course, although they originally disapproved it and thought the secession of South Carolina unnecessary and improper, was for all the southern States to go together and do it at once. In that stage of the affair, the secession of South Carolina having taken place in December, the election for members of the convention took place in Virginia, and a very large majority of persons utterly averse to the dissolution of the Union were elected. This was in February. Some of the States further south had already seceded in January. Of course, as you may imagine, the whole caldron was boiling with excitement, and there was great division of opinion in Virginia; some were in favor of an immediate co-operative action with the southern States; others said, no; that we were more identified with the border States, and that we should act with them; others insisted that we should not act with either, but should wait until some overt act of violence was committed against the southern States; but after the attack on Fort Sumter, and Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of the 15th of April, then there was an entire change of feeling and opinion in the convention and throughout the State, and the ordinance of secession, which had been over and over again defeated up to that time, was passed almost unanimously on the 17th of April. There was a general concurrence upon the part of the people of the State, whether they approved secession or deprecated it, in the opinion that interest, and duty, and policy alike required that they should stand by their old neighbors and friends; in other words, as the fight was made, they would have to take sides. The most conservative men, with the rarest exceptions, those who were opposed to any attempt to destroy the government, who sincerely desired that it should be preserved, and did everything they could to avert war, some of them voted for the ordinance of secession in convention; they did not see how they could stand against the current, or how they could possibly accomplish anything if they attempted it.

Question. Was it a very prevalent opinion among Virginians that the government of the United States would abstain from using military force against the secessionists after Sumter was fired on?

Answer. The period for consideration was very short; the firing on Fort Sumter was on Friday, and the proclamation was on Sunday.

Question. There had been a series of acts of violence committed on the government of the United States in South Carolina and other cotton States, as you know?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Stealing the property of the government, and laying hold of forts, &c. Was there a considerable portion of the people of Virginia who supposed that the United States would abstain from using force to recover its property, and punish those acts of violence?

Answer. I was myself, I think, in a decided minority on that subject. I think that the impression that there would be no war was a very general one; that the influence of dollars and cents, commercial considerations, and the friendly intercession of foreign powers to prevent the breaking up of all the interests involved, would prevent a war; and the idea was, that if the southern States would stand together and act promptly, there would be no war. Many of the most intelligent men in the commonwealth will tell you to-day that they were deliberately of that opinion. They very often say, "It is you, gentlemen, that opposed secession, who have brought all this trouble and devastation upon the country; for if you had not hesitated and halted, and if all had stuck together at once, it would have resulted in some compromise which would not have destroyed the Union, but which would have settled the question and avoided war." I have no doubt that they were very sincere in their belief.

Question. Do you suppose that there are at present any class of persons in Virginia, or elsewhere in the south, who entertain the project of finally seceding from the Union, and setting up southern independence?

Answer. Not one, so far as I know or believe.

Question. You have no reason to believe that there is any such combination or conspiracy among any persons or class of persons?

Answer. If there is, there is no fact the discovery of which could give me more astonishment. Of course, there might be in some of the nooks and recesses which I know nothing about, but so far as the people in my region are concerned, I know that no idea of the kind is entertained.

Question. Do you not hear frequent expressions of contempt towards the government of the United States among the people with whom you intermingle?

Answer. No, sir. In a matter which has involved so deeply the interest and feelings of the people, there was, of course, a great deal of irritation and a great deal of passion; and the result has left a great deal of mortification, chagrin, and soreness. Of course, that is to be expected. We very often hear hasty expressions which evince it, but nothing approaching to sentiments of hostility, or a deliberate desire for the injury of the government. That is a wholly different affair.

Question. Suppose the government of the United States should be involved in a war with any foreign power, such as England or France, and the war should be waged, on the part of the enemy, with such vigor as to hold out some show of a hope, at least to persons of the south who are unfriendly to the government, of finally succeeding in their hope of establishing their independence; would you anticipate, in such a case as that, that any considerable number of southern people would join the common enemy?

Answer. It would be very difficult to form an opinion about that, so soon after the failure of the hopes of the southern people. I do not know how far excitable people—especially those who have been connected with the army—might be induced to lay hold of any such prospect. That is a very difficult question to answer. I will say, however, though it is not exactly called for by your question, that I think there has been a feeling of disappointment, of very great disappointment, among our people, that their hopes and expectations have not been realized. I think that the great mass of the intelligent people despaired of the success of the confederacy long before it broke up. For myself, I never had a doubt of the result after the 4th of July, 1863. The action of Congress and the proclamation of the President led to the belief and the strong hope that after the rebellion should be crushed, and the power of the government of the United States unmistakably established, we should then be permitted to return to the exercise of our rights, and that the taking of the oath of amnesty, prescribed by Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, would at once relieve everybody of disability. The issuing of Mr. Johnson's proclamation of the 29th of May, 1865, had a most unfavorable effect, accompanied as it was by Mr. Speed's opinion, because the effect of the two combined was, that thousands of persons who had no hesitation in supposing, and who felt themselves happy in the belief, that they were secure by Mr. Lincoln's amnesty, of which they had taken the benefit, found themselves at once without the benefit of the amnesty, and they felt irritated about it. For instance, in my own case, I took the benefit, on the 16th of April, of Mr. Lincoln's amnesty. I never had my doubt that I was entitled to do so, and that I was fully relieved, so far as that proclamation of amnesty proffered the relief. Having the misfortune, so far as that is concerned, to be the owner of $20,000 worth of property, I found myself, for that cause and for no other, without the pale, and, according to Mr. Speed's opinion, I was obliged to apply again for a special pardon. That cast a gloom over the minds of the people. It made the people exceedingly unhappy. It was a source of more distress and anxiety than you can well conceive. Every man felt that his property was uncertain. Then proceedings of confiscation were commenced. A parcel of people were sent noising throughout the country to pick out persons to be libelled. These things created great irritation, a soreness, and a feeling of alarm and uneasiness. Then there was a great deal of delay and difficulty in getting pardons. Then came the delay in organizing State governments. Then came the operations of military governments, military arrests for ordinary crimes, military interference in the decision of civil disputes, the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the exclusion of the southern States from representation. All these things combined to create a feeling of disappointment. We had flattered ourselves with the hope that we should be at once taken under the protection of the Constitution, and should enjoy its advantages and blessings. The feeling created by the course of the government has been one of disappointment and unhappiness. The people feel unsettled. They do not know where they are, or whether they stand upon their heads or heels. There is no disposition in our part of the country to immigrate. Down further south, I have no doubt, there is a very extensive disposition of that kind, but we hope that better days are coming.

Question. You understand the nature of the constitutional amendment now pending in Congress relating to the basis of representation?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Suppose that amendment should be passed by Congress, and should be ratified by three-fourths of the States; what is your belief as to the final action of the insurgent States on that subject? Would they ever consent to let the negroes vote?

Answer. I have no hesitation in saying what I think we would do in Virginia, and what it strikes me, would be the obvious policy of every other State; it would be at once to establish qualifications for suffrage which would exclude nobody on account of race or color, but would apply to all races by enacting a property qualification, or a qualification of reading and writing and property together, which would give us the benefit of the negro race in counting our population, and under which white people would do all the voting.

Question. That is a general idea throughout the southern States, is it?

Answer. That is my impression. I only speak from my own personal reflection. We cannot afford to allow the negroes to vote now in their present condition, and this is not from prejudice. There exists a very different feeling towards the negro among us from that which you, gentlemen, feel disposed to suppose. It is a feeling of very great kindness; we were born together, raised together, have lived together, and played together, and the relation of master and slave has been a very much misunderstood one; but that is out of the question now. Our disposition towards the negro, however, is entirely kind. By a single stroke of the pen, or by a single act of legislation, you cannot change the character of the negro. You cannot give him intelligence; you cannot give him a knowledge of our institutions; you cannot enable him to comprehend public questions; you cannot convert the darkness of his mind into light. We never can consent voluntarily to allow the negro to vote, until, by a process of cultivation—I do not mean mere instruction in letters, but by cultivation of body and mind, and by association—he has become capable of appreciating the duties and understanding the questions which the exercise of that right would involve.

Question. Then I understand you to give the opinion that Virginia, as well as the other southern States, would not reject the black race entirely from representation simply because they are black?

Answer. Not at all, sir.

Question. You think that they would be disposed to place both races on the same level in regard to the right of suffrage?

Answer. Yes, sir; and I think I can furnish you with a demonstration of that fact in the action of our present legislature at Richmond.

Question. Such qualifications as you speak of, I suppose, would exclude a vast proportion of the blacks at present?

Answer. Yes, sir, nearly all of them.

Question. The qualifications which would exclude nearly all the blacks would include, I suppose, nearly all the whites?

Answer. Very far from it. It would exclude a very large proportion of the whites who now vote. There is no property qualification now.

Question. Do you think that in Virginia you could call together a convention of the people which would have the nerve to disqualify any considerable portion of the present white voters?

Answer. It is very hard to predict anything of the nerve of a politician when the popular majority is likely to be against him, but I have no doubt on that subject. During the rebellion, (we do not like to use that word much, but it is expressive,) a new constitution of the State was adopted by the same convention which passed the ordinance of secession, and among the amendments was a restriction of the right of suffrage. That was submitted to the people, and while the constitution itself was rejected, the restriction of the right of suffrage was passed by a very large majority.

Question. Is there anything further you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I want to make a statement in reference to the legislation of the present general assembly in reference to negroes. I am, magna pars, chairman of the committee on courts of justice, and have, of course, pretty much the direction of matter. What I want to state is in reference to this idea of a distinction between the races. In South Carolina and Georgia, as you must have observed, they have enacted separate negro codes, going down into great minuteness of detail. We unanimously determined against that thing. We thought that it was wrong in principle, and that it would work badly in practice; that it was likely to be a source of irritation and annoyance, and therefore, as I say, we determined against it. Very well; now what should we do? We determined, therefore, to avoid all distinction between the races, except in such cases, for instance, as prohibiting the intermarriage of the two races, and that all the laws which made a distinction between black and white should disappear, and that we would only enact such laws as appeared to us to be absolutely necessary, leaving time and experience to develop, by the actual operation of things, any regulation that might be necessarily applicable to either race. Now, we have taken up the provisions of our code, and have repealed all laws on the subject of slaves and slavery. We propose to repeal all the laws in relation to free negroes as such. That bill would have been reported to-day. We have then modified all the criminal laws, so as to place the black man and the white man on the same footing.

Question. Whether as parties or witnesses?

Answer. I will come to that directly; I am speaking now as to crimes; that is to say, that the same thing shall constitute a crime in the black man which constitutes a crime in the white man, and that there shall be the same mode of trial and the same punishment precisely. We have declined to legislate on the subject of labor contracts, except to this extent: We have provided, for the protection of the negro, that no contract for labor shall bind a colored person for a longer period than one month, (the senate had it two months, but the house put it at one,) except it is in writing, and that no contract in writing shall bind a colored person unless it is signed by him in the presence of a justice of the peace, a notary public, an overseer of the poor, or two respectable witnesses, whose duty it shall be to read the contract to him, explain it to him, and to set forth that fact in the certificate of acknowledgment, the object being to protect the negro altogether. A motion was made in the house to strike out the words "two witnesses" and to insert the words "one witness." I opposed that, stating that the object was protection to a helpless and ignorant class of people who might be overreached; that a man might get one witness to swear falsely, but that it would be more difficult for him to get two witnesses to enable him to commit a fraud; and the house adhered to my proposition, so that we have, in all our legislation, discarded all idea of distinct and discriminative legislation even in phraseology. For instance, some of our acts read that if any person, white or colored, shall do so and so; we struck out the words "white or colored;" leaving it "if any person" shall do so and so, our object being to put the two races, so far as the provisions of law and the phraseology of law are concerned, on the same footing. On the subject of evidence, the only difference of opinion in the legislature is this: There is not a man in my committee, so far as I know, who is opposed to admitting the negro as a witness. In some parts of the State, outside of the legislature, among some of the people, there is opposition to it. The poorer classes of people are very much opposed to it. All intelligent people that I speak to, especially all lawyers, are in favor of it, but the poorer class of people are exceedingly opposed to it as a general rule. They have their prejudices against the negro. The only difference among members of the legislature and among intelligent gentlemen, so far as I know, is, whether the negro shall be admitted as a witness to the extent of protecting himself and his race in their rights of person and property, or whether he shall be admitted in all cases; as, for example, if you make a negro a witness in all cases he will be a witness as between two white persons, which would not be necessary for the protection of the negro in any right of his, because it is a controversy between A and B, both being white persons. Some think there is no necessity arising out of the present state of things, and no duty arising out of the present state of things, to admit the negro as a witness to that extent, but that he ought to be admitted to the extent of protecting the negro race in all civil cases where any negro is interested one way or the other, or where his rights are affected, and in all criminal cases where the negro is a party, or where the offence has been committed upon the person or rights of a negro. On that point I do not know any difference of opinion. The only difference of opinion is whether the principle should be carried a step further, so as to embrace all cases between white persons.

Question. What can be the objection, as between two white persons, to putting a negro on the stand as a witness and letting him testify in the presence of the jury, subjecting his evidence to the same ordeal as the testimony of the white man is subjected to? If he is a worthless character and objectionable on the ground of veracity, why not let the jury judge of it? Is there, in reality, any objection to the testimony of negroes which does not apply to the same class of white persons?

Answer. The objection is really more of a practical one than anything else, as a sort of concession to, or compromise with, those who feel a repugnance to the idea; who think it looks like negro equality. If you go before that class of people with the absolute admission of the negro as a witness in all cases you find it most difficult to reconcile them to it; but if you say that it is necessary that this man who is declared a freeman shall be protected in his rights as such, they are better satisfied with that. What the opinion of the legislature will be when the matter comes up for decision I do not know; but that is the only difference of opinion in the committee.

Question. Do you think that these bills to which you have referred will pass the legislature of Virginia?

Answer. Two-thirds of them have already passed.

Question. You have no doubt that this general system of legislation will pass?

Answer. No doubt in the world. I propose as soon as the system is completed to make a synopsis of it and have it published in one of the newspapers of Washington, for I find that nobody here knows anything about it. Our effort has been to treat the negroes with justice and good faith, so as to try and make something out of them. They have got to live with us as free people; they cannot get away; there is no doubt about that. It is to our interest therefore to treat them with kindness. If you want to make a well-disposed and well-behaved people in the south, all that is necessary is an expression of a feeling of kindness on the part of the northern people. Give us the benefits of the Constitution and let us go to work and repair our ruined fortunes. You have no conception how poor we are, you have no conception to what point of destitution and distress the country has fallen; we want repose; we want to get into the Union for practical purposes, to be quiet; we want to get rid of military government.

Question. Is it your opinion that a jury could be impanelled in Virginia, by the process now prescribed by the law for that purpose, that would find Jefferson Davis or any other prominent leader of the rebellion guilty of treason for acts of war committed by him against the United States?

Answer. I think it would depend upon the instructions of the court. If the court should instruct the jury authoritatively and distinctly that certain facts constituted treason, and if those facts were clearly proved, the jury would find him guilty, but they would do so with great regret and great pain. I think I have seen many verdicts found under instructions of the court which were very disagreeable to the jury. I think they would do it under restraint, however, from a solemn sense of sworn duty to take the law from the court. I think that to a great mass of jurors it would be a very painful duty, and one which they would submit to only under restraint, which, as good citizens, they would be obliged to do.

Question. Suppose a plea of justification should be interposed founded on the ordinance of secession and upon the laws of the State growing out of that ordinance, commanding the accused with others to prosecute the war against the government, and suppose the judge trying the case should overrule the plea and instruct the jury that that plea was unavailing as a justification for the act, would the jury be likely to follow the ruling and instructions of the court on that subject?

Answer. Of course I speak of juries consisting of intelligent and respectable men, and I am unable to conceive by what series of reasoning such men could refuse to find a verdict under the positive instructions of the court, however repugnant to their feelings and wishes.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 10, 1866.

B. R. Grattan sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Richmond, Virginia.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was raised in the valley of Virginia.

Question. Do you hold any public position?

Answer. I am a member of the present house of delegates of Virginia.

Question. Is that the only public position you have held?

Answer. I held the office of reporter to the court of appeals since January, 1844.

Question. I speak of two classes of people in Virginia for the sake of convenience, not with a view of offending anybody. I speak of secessionists and Union men. By secessionists I mean those who have directly or indirectly favored the rebellion; and by Union men I mean those who opposed the rebellion; and by the rebellion I mean the war which has taken place between the two sections of the country. What is the general feeling among the secessionists of Virginia towards the government of the United States so far as your observation extends?

Answer. So far as I know, the sentiment is universal that the war has decided the question of secession entirely, that it is no longer an open question, and that we are all prepared to abide by the Union and live under it.

Question. You mean to be understood as saying that they suppose that the sword has settled the abstract right of secession?

Answer. Yes; we consider that we put it to the arbitrament of the sword, and have lost.

Question. What proportion of the legislature of Virginia are original secessionists, having in view the definition I gave?

Answer. I would suppose that there are few members of the legislature who are less able to judge of that matter than myself, for my acquaintance as a member is very limited; but I should suppose, from the general sentiments of the people of Virginia, that while probably a very large proportion of those who are now members of the legislature were not in favor of secession or a dissolution of the Union originally, yet nearly all of them went with their State when it went out. They went heartily with it.

Question. How have the results of the war affected the feelings of Virginians generally? What is the sentiment left in their hearts in regard to satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the government of the United States—love or hatred, respect or contempt?

Answer. I cannot undertake to say generally; my intercourse is very limited. I would rather suppose, however, that while the feeling against the government was originally very strong, that feeling has been very much modified; it is nothing like as strong as it was, and is gradually declining.

Question. You think that the feeling is gradually changing from dislike to respect?

Answer. Yes, I think so.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there are persons in Virginia who still entertain projects of a dissolution of the Union?

Answer. None whatever. I do not believe that there is an intelligent man in the State who does.

Question. In case of a war between our country and any foreign power, such as England or France, one that should put the government to the exercise of all its powers in order to secure its safety, and in case it should become apparent that there was a chance for secessionism to become a success hereafter, would you anticipate that any considerable portion of the people of Virginia would join the enemy?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Would there be many who would be likely to do so?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think there would be. You might find some boys who would do so. I think that the people have made up their minds to become a part of this Union and to perform every duty connected with that relation. I speak with confidence on that subject, for while I was not an original secessionist, I am certain that nobody ever suffered more at its failure than I did, and I know what my own sentiments are, and judge other people by myself.

Question. What has been, in your judgment, the effect, in the main, of President Johnson's liberality in bestowing pardons and amnesties on rebels?

Answer. I think it has been very favorable; I think President Johnson has commended himself very heartily. There is a very strong feeling of gratitude towards President Johnson.

Question. Has that liberality in your judgment, increased or diminished the respect of these same persons towards the government of the United States?

Answer. It has increased it.

Question. Is that increase of respect towards the government, or is it especially towards President Johnson?

Answer. It is to Mr. Johnson, as the representative of the government.

Question. Are you aware of the nature of the constitutional amendment now pending in the Senate of the United States in reference to the basis of representation?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You know its effect?

Answer. Yes.

Question. It places the basis of representation upon numbers, including all classes and all races, but at the same time declares that in case any State shall exclude from the right of suffrage any portion of its population on account of race or color, the whole of the people of that race or color shall be excluded from the count, thus leaving the entire option with the States whether they shall exclude or include persons of color in the right of suffrage. I want to ascertain your opinion on that subject, whether you think the people of Virginia are likely ever to consent to let negroes vote?

Answer. I should say not, sir, under no circumstances.

Question. Do you not think that the interests of the States would finally so operate as to induce them to take off the unkind proscription of the black race?

Answer. I do not think so. I would like to explain that. I, perhaps, ought not to undertake to express an opinion for the people of Virginia. My intercourse for years has been very limited. I have been confined very closely to my own duties as a lawyer, and I have mingled very little with the people. Perhaps I speak rather from my own sentiment and opinion. My own opinion about that is, that the very worst thing that can occur to the negro, (and I believe that will be the sense of the people,) the very worst consequence to the negro, will be the attempt to give him political power; and I believe that really the desire to preserve the negro himself, to take care of him, and to prevent the consequences which will arise to him from such an effort would, of itself, preclude his admission to political rights.

Question. What, in your judgment, would be the consequences of such an enfranchisement: would it produce scenes of violence between the two races?

Answer. I believe it would. I have very great apprehension that an attempt of that sort would lead to their extermination, not immediately, but to their gradual extinction. It would set up really an antagonistic interest, which would probably be used as a power, because I have no doubt that the negro vote would be under the influence of white people. You are to recollect that this is not simply a prejudice between the white and black races. It has grown to be a part of our nature to look upon them as an inferior; just as much part of our nature as it is a part of the nature of other races to have enmity to each other; for instance, between the Saxon Irish and the Celtic Irish, or between the English and the French. You must change that nature, and it takes a long time to do it. I believe that if you place the negro on a footing of perfect equality with the white, it would actually increase the power of the white race, which would control the negro vote; yet it seems to me that nothing can reconcile the white people to that sort of equal political power, and I fear, therefore, very much the consequences of any attempt of that sort upon the black race in Virginia.

Question. Would not that prejudice become modified a great deal in case the blacks should be educated and rendered more intelligent than they are now?

Answer. You would have to change their skin before you can do it. I beg leave to say that, so far from there being any unkind feeling to the negro, I believe that there is, on the part of the white race, towards the negro, no feeling but that of kindness, sympathy, and pity, and that there is every disposition to ameliorate their condition and improve it as much as possible; but it is that difference which has existed so long in their obvious distinction of color and condition—

Question. But suppose the condition of the negro should change?

Answer. The condition is annexed to the color. We are accustomed to see the color in the condition.

Question. But the condition may be changed by education and enlightenment?

Answer. You are to recollect, as to that, that they are a people who now have no property, who are not accustomed, from their former condition, to any sort of providence for themselves; that they are not accustomed to take care of themselves; that they are a people who have always depended upon others; and, therefore, unless there is some power or person who is to give them wealth and to educate them, you can never expect that they will be in a condition to rise. They cannot educate themselves; they are not disposed to educate themselves. They live in the very lowest condition of life. They are not disposed to work if they can help it, as nobody else is, I suppose; so that I see no help or expectation that by their own exertions they are going to acquire that amount of property which will enable them to educate themselves. If they rise, it will be by the effort of the white race, among whom they live, to raise them.

Question. Is there a general repugnance on the part of whites to the acquisition and enjoyment of property by the blacks?

Answer. I do not know. I do not think there is. Far from it. We would be very glad to see them all doing well and improving their condition.

Question. Do you find a similar repugnance to the acquisition of knowledge by blacks?

Answer. No, sir; far from it; on the contrary, we are trying, so far as we can, to educate them; but we are too poor ourselves to do much in educating other people, and they are certainly too poor to educate themselves.

Question. You would, then, anticipate a struggle of races in case the right of suffrage was given to the blacks?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think so.

Question. You would not anticipate it in case the blacks should vote in the interest of the white race?

Answer. As I said before, I believe that if the blacks are left to themselves, if all foreign influence were taken away, the whites would control their vote. It is not in that the difficulty lies, but it is in the repugnance which the white race would feel to that sort of political equality. It is the same sort of repugnance which a man feels to a snake. He does not feel any animosity to the snake, but there is a natural shrinking from it; that is my feeling. While I think I have as much sympathy for the black race, and feel as much interest in them as anybody else, while I can treat them kindly and familiarly, still the idea of equality is one which has the same sort of shrinking for me, and is as much a part of my nature, as was the antagonism between Saxon and Celt in Ireland.

Question. You are aware that that state of feeling does not exist in Ireland, England, or Scotland towards the blacks?

Answer. No; because they never had them; because they never saw them in their constant condition. So that difference of alienation between Saxon and Celt does not exist here, but it exists in Ireland. It is where that has been the feeling operating for so long that it has become a part of our nature. It is not a simple prejudice, but it becomes part of the nature of the man, because a prejudice may be removed very soon.

Question. You have not much reason to expect that the legislature of Virginia will adopt this constitutional amendment in case it shall pass both houses of Congress?

Answer. I cannot speak for others, but for myself I say certainly not. No political power would ever induce me to vote for it. That form is much more objectionable than even a proposition to make them voters. It is giving you all the advantages of numbers, while you are taking that from us which, according to the original constitution, we had—three-fifths of the slave population—and no political power will force me to consent to that.

Question. It will be left to yourselves to make up the number if you see fit.

Answer. But you leave us to do what you know we will not do, and then you deprive us of power. There would be more reason in an amendment basing representation upon voters.

Question. Have you any idea that the people of Virginia can elect either a legislature or convention that will impose restrictions on the right of suffrage among the whites, such as a property qualification, or the qualification of reading or writing?

Answer. I do not think so. I think these things never go backward, and I do not think there ever can be any such restrictions. However, perhaps I am as little competent to judge of these things as any intelligent man in Virginia.

Question. How are people from the north received in communities in Virginia? Suppose a northern man known to be an out-and-out Union man, who has taken part in the war against the confederacy, should go in your midst to settle and purchase property, and become a permanent resident: how would he be received?

Answer. That would depend very much upon the man himself. I think that any respectable man who would come there to purchase property and settle, would be treated very well and be received very well; still, of course, we would not look upon him as we look upon each other. We do not look upon any foreigner coming from anywhere as we do upon our own people. I would not mislead you in supposing that there is not a feeling existing—

Question. A prejudice against northern people?

Answer. There always was before the war; but still, when a man showed that he was a worthy, respectable man, he was always treated as such, and would be treated as such still. The fact is, we would like to have as many upright, industrious northern men among us as we can get, and of course we would treat them well.

Question. Do Unionists, who are parties in the civil courts of Virginia, stand as good a chance for justice as those who have been secessionists and sided with the rebellion?

Answer. Yes, sir. I do not believe there is any court in Virginia where secessionism prevails. I have heard some complaints of courts down in Alexandria, while the Alexandria government existed, but in those courts which have been lately organized where we were all secessionists, I have no idea that the question ever enters into the mind of a judge or court whether a man took one side or the other in the war.

Question. Would it not be likely to enter into the minds of the jury?

Answer. No, sir, I do not believe it would.

Question. Do you believe that a jury could be impanelled in Virginia, in the ordinary way recognized by your laws, that would convict Jefferson Davis or any other leader of the rebellion of treason?

Answer. I do not know. I should doubt it very much; not because they would not convict any man whom they believed guilty, but because the question of treason in this rebellion is, as it seems to me, a question which is to be decided by our opinions as to what was constitutional law, in the nature of this government, at the time. While we recognize the fact that the failure of the rebellion has settled the question of secession, we are not at all disposed to change the opinions which we formerly held as to what was the doctrine on the subject; and therefore a man who believed in secession before, and in the right of a State to withdraw from the Union, if he carried out his principles and acted on them, would say that up to the time that that matter was settled and decided by the result of the war, the man who acted on those principles was not guilty of treason. I believe that if any man should commit treason now, after the matter is settled, he could be convicted by a jury in Virginia.

Question. Then your idea is, that the ordinance of secession in your State would or should stand as a justification of the acts of war committed against the United States?

Answer. With those who believed in the doctrine of secession.

Question. So that if you had a jury impanelled for the trial of what we would call a traitor, a jury who believed in that doctrine would not be likely to convict him?

Answer. No, I think not.

Question. Is not the number of that class of persons very great in Virginia?

Answer. I suppose so.

Question. So that probably it would be very difficult to find a jury that would convict a man of treason?

Answer. That would depend upon the judge who presided and the instructions he gave.

Question. Suppose that Chief Justice Chase undertook the trial of Jefferson Davis in Richmond, and instructed the jury that the Virginia ordinance of secession was no justification for acts of war against the government of the United States, would the jury follow his instructions?

Answer. That I cannot say. It would depend upon the men who were on the jury.

Question. Would you be likely to find twelve men who would follow out such instructions?

Answer. Yes; you might get twelve men who would convict him, whether you gave such instructions or not; but I speak of the mass of the people.

Question. I do not mean by packing the jury, but by taking up the jury in the ordinary way.

Answer. You would not.

Question. Do you not draw your jurors by lot in Virginia?

Answer. Not in criminal cases. Twenty-four men are selected, and out of that twenty-four the prisoner has a peremptory challenge of eight, leaving sixteen, and out of the sixteen twelve are drawn by lot.

Question. Do you think of anything else which you wish to say on the subject-matter to which I have called your attention?

Answer. Nothing in particular, I believe. I have expressed my opinion as to what the judgment and sentiments of the people of Virginia are. In Richmond there are very few original secessionists. I think the sentiment in Richmond was against it. I think it very probable that you can find men there who do not consider that the ordinance of secession was a valid ordinance at all. There are a great many of them. But there are others who consider that the ordinance of secession was a power which the State had a right to exercise. It seems to me that a jury taken out of the latter class would not be very apt to convict a man of treason for having taken up arms against the government. But there is a very large number of people who do not concur in the idea that a State had a right to secede, and a jury taken from this class would be governed by the judgment of the court as to whether that was a sufficient justification or not.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1866.

E. F. Keen sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. At Danville, Virginia.

Question. What is your official position?

Answer. I am a senator in the State senate from the counties of Halifax and Pittsylvania.

Question. Are you a native of Virginia?

Answer. Yes, I was born and raised in the State.

Question. Did the war extend itself into your senatorial district?

Answer. To some extent; less, perhaps, than in any other portion of the State.

Question. What is the general feeling, at present, of the secessionists in your senatorial district towards the government of the United States? Is it friendly or unfriendly?

Answer. I scarcely know how to answer that question of secessionists, for there are none now.

Question. I mean those who have favored the cause of secession?

Answer. So far as my observation extends, they seem to be more disposed to try the United States government than those who were originally Union men. I believe more of them have asked pardon and have obtained it, and their expressions of loyalty to the government are more frequent and more common than from the original Union men.

Question. Have you taken any part in the war against the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir. I was an original Union man and fought secession as long, perhaps, as he who fought longest in Virginia. After Virginia seceded I entered the army of the confederate States and was colonel for fifteen or eighteen months. I was State's senator in the government of Virginia during a portion of the war, after I came out of the army. I was, at the time of the evacuation of Richmond, a member of the State senate.

Question. Were you in Richmond at that time?

Answer. Yes; I was in Richmond when it was evacuated.

Question. What effect has the abolition of slavery produced on the minds of the masses of the people in your district? Are they well pleased with it, or displeased?

Answer. As a matter of course, our people were not pleased with it. We had in the State of Virginia some 496,000 slaves, in which we had, as we had always been taught, a vast amount of property. The sudden destruction of that property could not be very pleasant in the minds of our people.

Question. Has it not left a deep feeling of disloyalty towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I think not.

Question. Are the once owners of that species of property looking forward to the possible payment of the value of it to them by the United States?

Answer. I cannot say that they are looking forward to it with any confident expectation. They would be very glad to have it. I am not apprised that there is any party or any respectable body of men that are agitating any such question.

Question. How do the secessionists feel in regard to the payment of the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war?

Answer. I believe there is a general disposition on the part of the people of Virginia to sustain the credit of the government in every respect.

Question. Suppose the question was left to your constituents whether or not they would contribute their proper share to the payment of that debt, and that they were to decide that question at the polls, what way would they vote?

Answer. I believe that that would depend greatly upon the policy pursued by the government, since we have surrendered the question.

Question. What line of policy would be most likely to reconcile them to the payment of that debt?

Answer. That line of policy which would admit us as equal participants in a government which we had tried to break and failed, and to which we had now expressed ourselves as loyal.

Question. You think that if Virginia was admitted by her senators and representatives in Congress at once, there would be no great grumbling or complaint against paying the federal debt?

Answer. I think not. I think it would do more to allay the little irritable feeling that exists in the State than perhaps any other one act.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the confederate debt?

Answer. I think that no sane man expects it to be paid.

Question. What is that kind of security worth now in the market, ouvert?

Answer. There is no sale for it, no market, no quotation.

Question. Can you state at what time these securities fall due according to their face?

Answer. No, sir, I cannot; I believe six and twelve months after the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and the Confederate States.

Question. What is the general feeling of the people of your district toward the freedmen—is it kind, or otherwise?

Answer. I think there is a general feeling of kindness naturally from our people to the freedmen. I think there is no enmity towards them. They have, for the most part, conducted themselves very well during the war. Nobody with us looks upon them as having been responsible for their condition; and, wherever they seem disposed to behave themselves well, there is a general feeling of encouragement towards them.

Question. Is there a feeling of willingness that they should be educated in some degree?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think that all rational minds there conclude that that must necessarily come. No rational mind, however, concludes that it can be done in a day, or a week, or a month, or a year, or in any very short period. The masses of the people in Virginia are not well educated themselves. We have no system of free schools, and have never had. The expectation that this large colored population, turned loose upon us with a wild idea of freedom, is to be suddenly educated (and the idea is rather general) is not so repugnant to the feelings of the people as it seems to them absurd and ridiculous.

Question. Is there not a feeling of dislike on the part of secessionists in your district toward northern men?

Answer. None whatever, I believe. When northern gentlemen come there and demean themselves as gentlemen, no matter what their official orders are, or how repugnant some of those orders may be, they are treated as gentlemen, without the first unkind feeling towards them.

Question. Are you aware of any scenes of violence between Unionists and secessionists in your district since the close of the war?

Answer. None whatever in my district.

Question. Does anything occur to you, besides what you have stated, which you wish to state?

Answer. I do not know of anything special.

Question. Are you aware of any combinations existing in Virginia, or elsewhere, having in view the ultimate renewal of the war?

Answer. I am not aware of any, and I believe that none exists in the commonwealth or elsewhere. I have been recently, for four months, in Georgia and South Carolina, and I neither saw nor heard of anything of the kind, nor do I believe that any such thing exists in the southern States.

Question. You think there is nothing of the kind in contemplation?

Answer. I think not, sir.

Question. You found them generally disposed to submit to Uncle Sam?

Answer. I think that the further south I have gone, the more disposed they have been to do it.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1866.

Rev. James Sinclair sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Lumberton, Robeson county, North Carolina.

Question. About how long have you resided there?

Answer. I have been in that county about nine years.

Question. Are you a native of North Carolina?

Answer. No, sir; I am a native of Scotland, but a naturalized citizen of the United States.

Question. What is your profession?

Answer. I am a Presbyterian minister of the Gospel.

Question. How long have you been a minister of the Gospel?

Answer. Some ten or eleven years. I was educated in Pennsylvania.

Question. And as such minister you have been settled in North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Where were you at the breaking out of the rebellion?

Answer. I was in Robeson county, in the State of North Carolina.

Question. Attending to your clerical duties there?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have you ever willingly done any act to promote the cause of the rebellion?

Answer. Not willingly.

Question. If you have ever done any such act, has it not been under constraint, or fear, or duress?

Answer. It has; I can show that from papers that I have with me.

Question. You have never been a friend of the rebellion?

Answer. No, sir; I was a Douglas democrat, and voted for Mr. Douglas in 1860.

Question. Have you a family?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have a wife and six children.

Question. All residing in North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir, except my oldest son. I married the second time about five years ago. My son by my first marriage is now a clerk in Philadelphia.

Question. Have you ever been a slaveholder?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How is it with your wife in that respect?

Answer. She was a slaveholder when we married.

Question. What position have you occupied during the war, or any period of the war, in North Carolina or elsewhere?

Answer. At one time I was considered to have some influence, and I was pressed pretty hard by the authorities, and a commission as colonel in the rebel service was given me at the same time that the late Hon. Lawrence O'B. Branch received a similar commission. I held that commission from the 8th of November, 1861, until the 23d of April, 1862. I then left the service, and was proscribed because I would not go into the war.

Question. Why did you accept the commission?

Answer. It would have been impossible for me to have lived in the country if I had not done so; my life had already been threatened. In the fall of 1860 I preached a sermon to my people in regard to the then condition of affairs, and warned them to beware of the men and measures of the neighboring State. My church was on the line between North Carolina and South Carolina, and some of my church were inhabitants of South Carolina. For that sermon some men in South Carolina proposed to come up and hang me. That sermon made a great noise in the church, and I lost my church in consequence of what was called my abolition sermon. After that I was without any means of support, and remained at home with my wife. She is highly connected, and has a great many friends among the more influential people there. Mr. Queen, formerly a member of the United States Congress, was her uncle. He opposed my leaving the country, saying that I would disgrace them by so doing. It was urged that in order to clear myself with the people there I should serve in the rebel army, and the point was in what position. I did so for my own protection and for the protection of my family. While I held that commission General Burnside came to North Carolina on his expedition. After his troops landed I was in the advance, but fell back to our intrenchments without exchanging shots with his forces. Two distinct assaults were made upon our lines, which were repulsed. After those two assaults General Reno, to the best of my recollection, of the Union army, came up with his cloak on, and coming down from the extreme left he rode right in front of my command. My men at once pulled up to their guns to shoot him. I directed them at once to bring their guns to an order and to await orders. I thereby saved the life of General Reno, as I have no doubt General Burnside will testify if asked. I was trying to capture him, and would not allow him to be shot because he came up so bravely. Shortly afterwards we were routed, and retired to Kingston. I was then charged by the Richmond Examiner, and several other papers in the south, with being a traitor or a coward to their cause. They said that there was something wrong about my conduct there; that I certainly must have been with Burnside the night before, and that I had been bought with Yankee gold. I immediately left their service, and have not been in it since.

Question. Where did you then go?

Answer. I immediately went home and remained there.

Question. Have you ever held any position in North Carolina under the government of the United States?

Answer. I have since the rebellion.

Question. What position?

Answer. That of agent of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. When were you appointed agent of the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. On the 11th of August, 1865.

Question. How long did you hold that position?

Answer. Until the 21st of October last.

Question. You were then relieved as agent?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Were there any charges or accusations against you?

Answer. On the contrary, my whole course as such agent has been approved.

Question. Have you been remaining at your home since then?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Are you acquainted with Governor Holden, of North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir, personally.

Question. Have you ever received from him a letter introducing you to any person?

Answer. Yes, sir; I received this letter:

"RALEIGH, January 20, 1866.

"MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to introduce Rev. James Sinclair, of the Old School Presbyterian church north, who is connected in this State with the Freedmen's Bureau. Any attention you may show Mr. Sinclair will be appreciated by "Your friend,

"W. W. HOLDEN.

"Dr. R. J. POWELL."

Question. Are you acquainted with Mr. A. T. Mallette, of North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What position does he hold at Wilmington, North Carolina, if any?

Answer. He is a surgeon by profession, and I think was one of the chief surgeons in the rebel Joe Johnston's army.

Question. Have you a letter from him?

Answer. Yes, sir; here it is:

“WILMINGTON, N. C., January 18, 1866.”

“DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of introducing to you, through this note, the Rev. Mr. Sinclair, of this State. Mr. Sinclair is a gentleman of standing and influence in the south. He will tell you how I am getting along.

“Very respectfully, yours,

“A. T. MALLETT.”

“Mr. E. S. HUTCHINSON.”

Question. What position does Charles J. Wickersham hold in North Carolina?

Answer. He is a brevet major and assistant adjutant general on the staff of Major General O. O. Howard, and superintendent of freedmen for the district of Wilmington. I have a letter from him, of which I will read an extract:

“Mr. Sinclair acted for some time as agent of this bureau, thereby incurring the ill will of the majority of the secession party; and his active and practical sympathy for the freedmen will probably affect his influence among the whites, although he has the unbounded confidence of the freedmen.”

Question. What is generally the state of feeling among the white people of North Carolina towards the government of the United States?

Answer. That is a difficult question to answer, but I will answer it as far as my own knowledge goes. In my opinion, there is generally among the white people not much love for the government. Though they are willing, and I believe determined, to acquiesce in what is inevitable, yet, so far as love and affection for the government is concerned, I do not believe that they have any of it at all, outside of their personal respect and regard for President Johnson.

Question. How do they feel towards the mass of the northern people—that is, the people of what were known formerly as the free States?

Answer. They feel in this way: that they have been ruined by them. You can imagine the feelings of a person towards one whom he regards as having ruined him. They regard the northern people as having destroyed their property or taken it from them, and brought all the calamities of this war upon them.

Question. How do they feel in regard to what is called the right of secession?

Answer. They think that it was right under the Constitution as it was; that there was no wrong in it. They are willing now to accept the decision of the question that has been made by the sword, but they are not by any means converted from their old opinion that they had a right to secede. It is true that there have always been Union men in our State, but not Union men without slavery, except perhaps among the Quakers. Slavery was the central idea even of the Unionists. The only difference between them and the others upon that question was, that they desired to have that institution under the ægis of the Constitution, and protected by it. The secessionists wanted to get away from the north altogether. When the secessionists precipitated our State into rebellion, the Unionists and secessionists went together, because the great object with both was the preservation of slavery by the preservation of State sovereignty. There was another class of Unionists who did not care anything at all about slavery, but they were driven by the other whites into the rebellion for the purpose of preserving slavery. The poor whites are to-day very much opposed to conferring upon the negro the right of suffrage; as much so as the other classes of the whites. They believe it is the intention of government to give the negro rights at their expense. They cannot see it in any other light than that as the negro is elevated they must proportionately go down. While they are glad that slavery is done away with, they are as bitterly opposed to conferring the right of suffrage on the negro as the most prominent secessionists; but it is for the reason I have stated, that they think rights conferred on the negro must necessarily be taken from them, particularly the ballot, which was the only bulwark guarding their superiority to the negro race.

Question. In your judgment, what proportion of the white people of North Carolina are really, and truly, and cordially attached to the government of the United States?

Answer. Very few, sir; very few.

Question. Judging from what you have observed of the feelings of the people of that State, what would be their course in case of a war between the United States and a foreign government?

Answer. I can only tell you what I have heard young men say there; perhaps it was mere bravado. I have heard them say that they wished to the Lord the United States would get into a war with France or England; they would know where they would be. I asked this question of some of them: If Robert E. Lee was restored to his old position in the army of the United States, and he should call on you to join him to fight for the United States and against a foreign enemy, what would you do? They replied, “Wherever old Bob would go we would go with him.”

Question. Have you heard such remarks since the war is over, as that they wished the United States would get into a war with England and France?

Answer. Oh, yes, sir; such remarks are very common. I have heard men say, “May my right hand wither and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever lift my arm in favor of the United States.”

Question. Did you ever hear such sentiments rebuked by bystanders ?

Answer. No, sir ; it would be very dangerous to do so.

Question. In your judgment, would it be the inclination of the mass of the people in North Carolina, in case of a foreign war, to join the enemies of the United States ; would there be danger of that, do you think ?

Answer. The officers who have been in the rebellion, and are of course disappointed at the result, might take service against the United States. But I think the mass of the people of North Carolina, the bone and sinew of the State, the quiet, well-behaved farmers, could not be got to do that thing.

Question. Suppose all pressure and constraint on the part of the government of the United States should be withdrawn from North Carolina, in such an event would or not the entire State go over to the enemy ?

Answer. I cannot answer that question. I would not like to express an opinion on that subject. I know there is a hostile feeling of the most positive character, which manifests itself against all who were not true to the Confederate States up to the time of the surrender of General Johnston. There is a hostile feeling of a decided character against that kind of people ; I mean people who had been disaffected to the confederate government. It is a feeling that will not allow a man to say anything, no matter what he may hear said against this government. It is as much as a man's life is worth to say any such thing.

Question. Under the present laws, and with the present courts in North Carolina, how much security is there for the commercial men of the north in the transaction of their business ?

Answer. I reckon they would have no security at all just now, and as things are at present. At present there is in force a stay law that has been passed at the commencement of the rebellion. Still a northern man would be secure in his property in North Carolina.

Question. Take the case of a northern man who is a suitor before the courts for his rights, with a case that is to be tried before a jury ; would he stand a fair chance against his opponent should his opponent be a rebel ?

Answer. No chance at all for a citizen of the State, in my opinion, if he is obnoxious to the people politically. I think he would in a matter of mere business, where there was no political matter involved ; that is, if he has not made himself very obnoxious to the people.

Question. In your opinion, would it be practicable in North Carolina to secure the conviction for treason of any of the leading rebels who have participated actively in the rebellion ?

Answer. I do not believe it would be possible.

Question. Have you any idea that a jury of twelve men could be found in North Carolina who would convict a leading traitor of his crime ?

Answer. I do not believe you could get twelve men in North Carolina to do it, outside of the Quakers and northern men there.

Question. I take it you must have mingled very freely with the people of North Carolina.

Answer. My profession has been such that I have had many opportunities to become acquainted with the people there. I have been with members of the legislature, and I have discussed the condition of affairs with the leading men of the State ; I have gone through my county explaining to black and white the nature and object of the Freedmen's Bureau, and trying to reconcile both parties to it. I have also been prominent among them as a clergyman ; and then in the time of war I was forced to be prominent from circumstances. This I do not say from any egotism ; but my commission as colonel of a regiment was issued to me nearly at the same time a similar commission was given to Hon. L. O'B. Branch. I am personally acquainted with ex-Governor Vance and most of the leading men of the State.

Question. Is the Freedmen's Bureau acceptable to the great mass of the white people in North Carolina ?

Answer. No, sir ; I do not think it is ; I think the most of the whites wish the bureau to be taken away.

Question. Why do they wish that ?

Answer. They think that they can manage the negro for themselves ; that they understand him better than northern men do. They say, " Let us understand what you want us to do with the negro—what you desire of us ; lay down your conditions for our re-admission into the Union, and then we will know what we have to do, and if you will do that we will enact laws for the government of these negroes. They have lived among us, and they are all with us, and we can manage them better than you can." They think it is interfering with the rights of the State for a bureau, the agent and representative of the federal government, to overlaugh the State entirely, and interfere with the regulations and administration of justice before their courts.

Question. Is there generally a willingness on the part of the whites to allow the freedmen to enjoy the right of acquiring land and personal property ?

Answer. I think they are very willing to let them do that, for this reason : to get rid of some portion of the taxes imposed upon their property by the government. For instance, a white man will agree to sell a negro some of his land on condition of his paying so much a year on it, promising to give him a deed of it when the whole payment is made, taking his note in the mean time. This relieves that much of the land from taxes to be paid by the white man. All I am afraid of is, that the negro is too eager to go into this thing; that he will ruin himself, get himself into debt to the white man, and be forever bound to him for the debt and never get the land. I have often warned them to be careful what they did about these things.

Question. There is no repugnance on the part of the whites to the negro owning land and personal property?

Answer. I think not.

Question. Have they any objection to the legal establishment of the domestic relations among the blacks, such as the relation of husband and wife, of parent and child, and the securing by law to the negro the rights of those relations?

Answer. That is a matter of ridicule with the whites. They do not believe the negroes will ever respect those relations more than the brutes. I suppose I have married more than two hundred couples of negroes since the war, but the whites laugh at the very idea of the thing. Under the old laws a slave could not marry a free woman of color; it was made a penal offence in North Carolina for any one to perform such a marriage. But there was in my own family a slave who desired to marry a free woman of color, and I did what I conceived to be my duty, and married them, and I was presented to the grand jury for doing so, but the prosecuting attorney threw out the case and would not try it. In former times the officiating clergyman marrying slaves could not use the usual formula: "Whom God has joined together let no man put asunder;" you could not say, "According to the ordinance of God I pronounce you man and wife; you are no longer two but one." It was not legal for you to do so.

Question. What, in general, has been the treatment of the blacks by the whites since the close of hostilities?

Answer. It has not generally been of the kindest character, I must say that; I am compelled to say that.

Question. Have you witnessed any instances of cruelty and ill treatment of the blacks on the part of the whites?

Answer. I have.

Question. State one or two instances.

Answer. In relation to the supply of food, here is a piece of meat (the witness here produced and exhibited a piece of bacon) which was a man's allowance for an entire week. I had it weighed in my office when the skin was on it, and it weighed just four ounces. The case was brought to my notice, and I made his employer treat him better; but the better treatment was not continued. This was the case of a wealthy man who owned a hundred negroes.

Question. Was it in consequence of his own poverty that he put his laborers on that short allowance?

Answer. He said that it was; but the negroes pointed out to me that he had plenty of meat and plenty of cattle to kill for food.

Question. What, besides that meat, was allowed for a week's supply?

Answer. A half a peck of corn meal; that was all.

Question. Are you aware of any instance of personal ill treatment towards the blacks by the whites?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Give some instances that have occurred since the war.

Answer. I knew a young woman, between nineteen and twenty years of age, a fine-looking girl, who was made by her former master to lie down flat on her face, while he beat her across her buttocks and over her private parts, he having first pulled up her clothes, leaving her person bare.

Question. What was the provocation, if any?

Answer. Something in regard to some work, which is generally the provocation.

Question. Was there no law in North Carolina at that time to punish such an outrage?

Answer. No, sir; only the regulations of the Freedmen's Bureau; we took cognizance of the case. In old times that was quite allowable; it is what was called "padding."

Question. Did you deal with the master?

Answer. I immediately sent a letter to him to come to my office, but he did not come, and I have never seen him in regard to the matter since. I had no soldiers to enforce compliance, and I was obliged to let the matter drop.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that such instances of cruelty are frequent in North Carolina at this time—instances of whipping and striking?

Answer. I think they are; it was only a few days before I left that a woman came there with her head all bandaged up, having been cut and bruised by her employer. They think nothing of striking them.

Question. And the negro has practically no redress?

Answer. Only what he can get from the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. Can you say anything further in regard to the political condition of North Carolina—the feeling of the people towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I for one would not wish to be left there in the hands of those men; I could not live there just now. But perhaps my case is an isolated one from the position I was com elled to take in that State. I was persecuted, arrested, and they tried to get me into their service; they tried everything to accomplish their purpose, and of course I have rendered myself still more obnoxious by accepting an appointment under the Freedmen's Bureau. As for myself I would not be allowed to remain there. I do not want to be handed over to these people. I know it is utterly impossible for any man who was not true to the Confederate States up to the last moment of the existence of the confederacy, to expect any favor of these people as the State is constituted at present.

Question. 'Suppose the military pressure of the government of the United States should be withdrawn from North Carolina, would northern men and true Unionists be safe in that State?

Answer. A northern man going there would perhaps present nothing obnoxious to the people of the State. But men who were born there, who have been true to the Union, and who have fought against the rebellion, are worse off than northern men. And Governor Holden will never get any place from the people of North Carolina, not even a constable's place.

Question. Why not?

Answer. Because he identified himself with the Union movement all along after the first year of the rebellion. He has been a marked man; his printing office has been gutted, and his life has been threatened by the soldiers of the rebellion. He is killed there politically, and never will get anything from the people of North Carolina, as the right of suffrage exists there at present. I am afraid he would not get even the support of the negro, if they should be allowed to vote, because he did not stand right up for them as he should have done. In my opinion, he would have been a stronger man than ever if he had.

Question. Is it your opinion that the feelings of the great mass of the white people of North Carolina are unfriendly to the government of the United States?

Answer. Yes, sir, it is; they have no love for it. If you mean by loyalty, acquiescence in what has been accomplished, then they are all loyal; if you mean, on the other hand, that love and affection which a child has for its parent even after he brings the rod of correction upon him, then they have not that feeling. It may come in the course of time.

Question. Is it practicable, by any measure to be adopted by Congress, to secure the existence of that love and loyalty to the government of the United States on the part of the white people of North Carolina?

Answer. That is really a question which I am not prepared to answer. It is utterly impossible for me to answer the question, for the reason that I have not seen that appreciation of the course already adopted by the President and the government, in regard to those who have sinned against the government, which I think should have been shown by them. I will not say, at the same time, that it is not possible to pursue such a course as will make them truly loyal. Yet I cannot say that to pursue any given course will do so at the present time, for the course already pursued has not been responded to as I hoped and expected.

Question. In your judgment what effect has been produced by the liberality of the President in granting pardons and amnesties to rebels in that State—what effect upon the public mind?

Answer. On my oath I am bound to reply exactly as I believe; that is, that if President Johnson is ever a candidate for re-election, he will be supported by the southern States, particularly by North Carolina; but that his liberality to them has drawn them one whit closer to the government than before, I do not believe. It has drawn them to President Johnson personally, and to the democratic party, I suppose.

Question. Has that clemency had any appreciable effect in recovering the real love and affection of that people for the government?

Answer. No, sir; not for the government, considered apart from the person of the Executive.

Question. Has it had the contrary effect?

Answer. I am not prepared to answer that question, from the fact that they regard President Johnson as having done all this because he was a southern man, and not because he was an officer of the government. They think that while he stands by them all the time there is no danger; but they do not feel under any obligation to the government, except to him personally. That is the feeling, as far as I am conversant with matters and things in my State.

Question. And you derive this impression from daily conversation with the people?

Answer. Yes, sir; they feel perfectly secure. They say, "Johnson will make it all right."

Question. Were you ever arrested by the rebel military authorities during the war?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. By whose order?

Answer. By the order of Major General Whiting, commandant of the department of North Carolina, under orders from Richmond, as I understand. The following is a copy of the order:

"Lieutenant CHARLES J. WILLIAMS,

"Commanding detachment at Fayetteville.

"LIEUTENANT: The major general commanding directs that you immediately proceed to Lumberton, Robeson county, and arrest one James Sinclair, claiming to be a British subject, and being an enemy to our institutions and government; and when so arrested, you will forward him to these headquarters.

"By command of Major General Whiting.

"T. BROWN VENABLE,
"Major and Assistant Adjutant General."

Question. Were you taken into custody under that order?

Answer. Yes, sir, and carried off about daylight in the morning from my home. It caused a death in my family by the shock it gave to my wife. I was not allowed even to bid her good-bye.

Question. How were you liberated from this arrest?

Answer. By the interposition of a writ of habeas corpus, when they found they could not take me out of the State without a trial.

Question. When was that?

Answer. On the 16th of December, 1863.

Question. What was the name of the judge discharging you?

Answer. Mr. R. S. French.

Question. Have you a copy of the affidavit upon which, as you understand, the order for your arrest was issued?

Answer. Yes, sir, it is as follows:

"STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Robeson county:

"Personally appeared before me, John A. Roland, clerk of the court of pleas and quarter sessions for the county of Robeson, Conday Godwin, who, having been duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, deposes and says: That on the 21st of May, 1863, or thereabouts, in the city of Raleigh, he heard James Sinclair say that he had been badly treated by the southern confederacy; that he could get on to Nassau on the pretence of seeing to land belonging to his children in his old country, and from Nassau he could get to New York; that he would explain to them the treatment he had received in the southern confederacy, and meet friends enough to get the command of a fleet, a brigade, or at least a regiment, when he would return and show some of his particular friends how it was to be ground down; that he knew all the paths and by-roads of this country. He repeated several times that he would do this before he would ever go into the service. He was then a conscript.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me, the 24th day of November, 1863.

"JOHN A. ROLAND, Clerk.
"C. GODWIN."

Question. And you suppose you were arrested on that affidavit?

Answer. Yes, sir, and upon another affidavit of the same character, which I have not with me; because neither Davis nor Seddon would let me go out of the country. For, certainly, if I had been let loose I could have contributed to the capture of North Carolina the sooner by a year than it was accomplished. And it would have been better for her if it had been done.

Question. What is the feeling of North Carolina in regard to the payment of the confederate debt?

Answer. There are a great many interested in it. Many of the orphans and the widows have put their all in those funds, and there is no doubt they would like to see that debt paid. But there are just about as many persons who are afraid to see it paid as there are of persons who want to see it paid.

Question. Would the people of the State have any real objection to the total repudiation of the rebel debt?

Answer. I do not think they would.

Question. What, on the other hand, is the feeling of the people there in regard to the payment of the national debt, contracted for the prosecution of the war?

Answer. Just like everything else connected with the overthrow of the confederacy—it is an accomplished fact and they have to submit.

Question. Will they willingly pay their share of the debt?

Answer. It will be just like this: when I send my child to get a switch with which I may correct him, he hates it very much; but he will go and get it. The people know they must pay it, and they submit; but they have no love at all for it.

Question. I suppose they have no objection to receiving and using the federal currency?

Answer. Not now; but it has only been of late that they have become willing to take it. In the interior of the State the people at first would not take greenbacks; they wanted gold and silver, because they said they were tired of seeing paper money. But that feeling is changing now—has changed.

Question. What can you say in regard to the destruction and loss of property in North Carolina during the rebellion?

Answer. There has been a great deal of property destroyed there.

Question. Have property-holders been very generally impoverished by the war?

Answer. Yes, sir; very much.

Question. What kind of personal property generally and chiefly has been destroyed?

Answer. Well, sir, a great many horses were taken by the confederate authorities; and then what the confederate authorities left General Sherman took pretty much when he came along. Indeed, the county was impoverished to a very considerable extent before the Union forces came. The government at Richmond sent down its authorized agents, who entered our smoke-houses, and, after allowing so many pounds each of meat for a man and his wife, and so much for the grown servants, allowing nothing for children, either white or black, they would take all the rest; and then, when the confederates evacuated the State, a great deal of cotton belonging to private individuals was destroyed by the army. When General Sherman came along his troops took what the confederates left, leaving nothing scarcely to support life.

Question. Have many dwelling-houses been destroyed?

Answer. Some have been, but not a great many. A great deal of the fencing has been destroyed; and the fact that there were no workmen to repair those fences, to protect the farms, rendered the poverty still deeper, because crops could not be made to advantage under the circumstances.

Question. What is the confederate currency worth there now?

Answer. Nothing.

Question. Not a rush?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Is it used as currency any way?

Answer. Never. I can send you $5,000 of it, if you want it. It is worth nothing at all, and never expected to be.

Question. If it were practicable for the people of North Carolina to decide the question for themselves of repudiating the national debt contracted in the prosecution of this war, would they, or not, do so?

Answer. I believe they would repudiate it.

Question. In case a project should be started by any political party in the United States to repudiate and set aside that debt, and it should become a political issue, to be decided by the election of members to Congress, on which side of that question would the people of North Carolina be?

Answer. Well, sir, the people of North Carolina pride themselves on a high sense of honor. I think that they would consider themselves in honor bound to pay that debt; that is, if they once agree to do it. Still, I have no doubt there would be a majority in favor of not paying the debt should that ever become a political question. There would be a strong minority in favor of paying it, because, whatever the State of North Carolina promises she will perform, if she can. You will find that the character of the commercial man of North Carolina stands high with the merchants of the north. But she will never go one whit beyond what you compel her to do in regard to the negro. I believe, as things are at present in the State—I mean with the present state of feeling—I am convinced that North Carolina would certainly throw her whole weight with the party that would seek repudiation.

Question. Have you anything further to say in addition to the statement you have already made?

Answer. I would like to state, in regard to the action of my presbytery in saving me from the confederate conscription when the confederates tried to show that I was not a clergyman, I had asked leave to enter into secular business because I wanted nothing to do with the war. The presbytery gave me the following to protect me from being put into the ranks:

[Extract.]

"Resolved, That the Rev. James Sinclair, being conscripted by the Confederate States, is in regular standing in this Fayetteville Presbytery."

Then follows this certificate:

"A true extract from the minutes of the Presbytery of Fayetteville, at their session held at Pike church, New Hanover county, N. C., October 9, 1863.

"J. P. McPHERSON, Stated Clerk."

I took occasion last summer to write for a religious paper published at Pittsburg, taking the ground that nothing would protect and secure the true freedom of the negro, unless you give him the protection of the ballot. I took the ground, also, that slavery was cruel and relentless as the grave; that it never forgave and never forgot; and, that it sought always to subject to its powers and influence the minds and bodies of its victims; and that I had been persecuted by the church during the war. The presbytery instituted proceedings against me after I left there, on the ground that I did not leave regularly. They refused to dismiss me to the church north, because they did not recognize it, and forced me to go away without papers, and I suppose they will now proceed against me in an ecclesiastical way and depose me from the ministry, in order to incapacitate me from marrying, legally, according to the laws of North Carolina, those who may desire me to perform that ceremony for them; I have reference especially to the freedmen. Those very preachers are the most bitter secessionists we have in the country. If I have ever heard a presbyterian clergyman, since the close of the war, pray for his excellency the President of the United States, I do not now recollect it. I believe they pray, so to speak, in a general way for "all in power and authority," but not particularly for "his excellency the President of the United States and both houses of Congress." There is nothing of that so far as I have heard. I speak particularly of the Presbyterians; I know nothing of the other churches. My church—the one now under my charge—consists of 97 members.

Question. Are they whites or blacks?

Answer. All blacks. I have 97 members in full communion, and there are some 300 or 400 more who adhere to the church, but are not in full communion with it. The presbytery may try to stop me in the exercise of my duties in marrying my people. The license to marry, under the laws of the State, runs in this way: "To any regularly ordained minister of the Gospel or justice of the peace." Now they may come in under their ecclesiastical laws and attempt to destroy my right, as a clergyman, to act under the above license.

Question. What proportion of your church members are able to read?

Answer. A large number of them. I have 26 in a Bible class that are able to read the Bible. Three of my elders, who are blacks, are able to read. There are old men who never knew what a letter was when I opened my Sabbath school, who are now spelling words of two or three syllables. I have had no teacher from the north. I have offered to board the teacher and get a school-house, but I have not been able to get one up to this time. We want teachers immediately. If we could get teachers to go into the interior portions of the State it would keep the negroes from coming into the towns for education. The negro dreams of it at night; his constant thirst is for education for his child; and he goes to towns and military posts for that purpose. I would rather give the negro education than the ballot, if he is to have but one. But if you are to hand us over to the wishes and powers and charities of a certain class of people, the Lord be merciful to us; I shall leave and go to the north.

Question. Suppose the negroes of North Carolina should be allowed to vote, how would the whites regard that?

Answer. I do not suppose there are 20 men in North Carolina who would not be opposed to it.

Question. What is your opinion of the general political effect in the State of allowing the negroes to vote? I do not mean all of them, but a portion of them—those the most fit for it. Would it tend to give strength to the government?

Answer. Of course it would; there is no doubt about that.

Question. Would it tend to give prosperity and stability to the affairs of the State?

Answer. It is my opinion that it would. I am an advocate of impartial suffrage; to make no distinction on account of race or color.

Question. Would there be any liability on the part of the blacks to be led away to vote for secessionists or secession leaders?

Answer. There would be no danger, for this reason; next to the Lord Jesus Christ, and with many negroes I am afraid a little higher, stands the name of President Lincoln. They are well aware of the existence and position of Sumner and such men. If candidates were put up to-morrow there for Congress, or for any other office, the negro would not go to his old master to inquire about them, but they would come to me, or to you, or some northern man upon whom they could depend.

Question. Suppose his old master should go to him and ask him to vote?

Answer. They would laugh at him. Long before the war they had got so they would not believe a word their masters said on some things. The reason the Presbyterian ministers are so down upon me is, that not one of the negroes who formerly attended their churches will go to them now. But they will go and hear me, or any northern minister, and they would come to us and ask us about their papers, or anything else that they desired to understand. Any northern man in whom they have confidence can control them. If you confer universal suffrage upon them, I would like to have it that they should give their votes viva voce, in order that there might be no danger of changing their tickets by dishonest persons.

Question. Would not their votes in such case be influenced by fear of their masters?

Answer. Not at all.

Question. Would they have resolution enough to go against their old master's wishes?

Answer. Yes, sir; their old masters have not one particle of influence over them now; that is all gone. I have here a paper showing the position of my church in North Carolina, in 1864, in regard to the simple question of legalizing in a quasi manner the marriage relation among the negroes, and allowing them the privilege of reading the Bible.

Question. This was during the rebellion?

Answer. Yes, sir; one year prior to the breaking up of the rebellion. This is the paper: "Whereas an address was presented to the last general assembly on the subject of slavery, and the duties growing out of the relation, which address was committed to the committee to report to the general assembly with instructions that the report to be submitted be printed in advance of the meeting of the said assembly for the use of the members;

"And whereas said address has been presented to the churches through the Southern Presbyterian Review as the forthcoming report of said committee: Therefore,

“Resolved, That this presbytery do and cannot approve of the deliverance made in said address, and hereby instruct their commissioners to oppose the adoption of said address or any other document looking to or contemplating any radical change in the laws, civil or ecclesiastical, which at present regulate our domestic institutions.”

That was adopted on April 1, 1864.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1866.

Lieutenant George O. Sanderson sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. In Boston, Massachusetts.

Question. Are you a citizen of Massachusetts?

Answer. Yes, sir; a native of Vermont.

Question. Have you been engaged in the civil war?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. In what capacity?

Answer. First as sergeant; last as lieutenant.

Question. Where did you serve?

Answer. In North Carolina.

Question. Exclusively?

Answer. Entirely; I was, however, a few days in Virginia in front of Petersburg.

Question. Since the close of hostilities, what has been your occupation?

Answer. I have been travelling around North Carolina, looking for a place to settle.

Question. How much of your time have you spent in North Carolina since the beginning of the war?

Answer. A little over three years, up to November, 1865.

Question. Where have you chiefly stopped?

Answer. At Newbern, Roanoke Island, Wilmington, and Raleigh.

Question. Have you during that time mingled much with the people of North Carolina so as to become acquainted with their feelings towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I have considerably. For nearly two years I acted as superintendent of the contraband colony of Roanoke Island, in North Carolina.

Question. What is the state of feeling among the whites of North Carolina towards the government of the United States?

Answer. The ruling feeling of four-fifths or three-fourths of the whites is against it as much as ever—the real bottom feeling of their souls.

Question. By the expression “against it” do you mean to be understood as saying that they are unfriendly towards it, or discontented towards it?

Answer. They are so, and I think they would throw every obstacle in the way of carrying out its laws, if they could, without rendering themselves liable to punishment.

Question. In what class of society there do you find this unfriendly feeling most prevalent?

Answer. It is among the land owners, the country people, as we should term them.

Question. What leading reason do they give for this feeling, if they give any?

Answer. They give no definite reasons for it—at least they have not to me, further than the taking away of their property, meaning their slaves, and a disposition, as they think, to oppress them in that manner and render them poor, as they say.

Question. Have you noticed since the close of hostilities any particular demonstration of that feeling on the part of the people; if so, where, and what was it?

Answer. The particular demonstrations that I have noticed were a refusal to recognize the condition of the former slaves as freedmen, and a disposition to oppress them by combining and stating to them that they intended, as soon as the power was in their hands again, as soon as they were readmitted, and the military force was withdrawn from their borders, to put the wages of the freedmen down to thirty-seven and a half cents a day, and to make it worse for them, as they expressed it, than before they were freed; that is, to make their freedom of no avail to them.

Question. Have you heard expressions of that kind from the planters?

Answer. I have repeatedly. I was told by several planters that they had decided, and it was an understood thing among them, that the moment the military force was withdrawn and they had the power again, that they would not pay any of the freed slaves over thirty-seven and a half cents a day. They said to me, “You wish to come down here and buy a place and settle. You have great popularity among these people; they recognize you as their friend, and your popularity is equal in value to you to a hundred slaves, if you owned them. You can hire any quantity of them, and as soon as we get the power we will put the price down, so that it will cost you less than if you boarded and kept them as your property. So they will be of more value to you than they were before.”

Question. What do the lower and poorer class of white people there say on the subject?

Answer. The confederate soldiers, in fact all of the poorer classes that were not Union all through the war, seem to feel bitter towards the free class on account of their being raised to an equality with them. They say that they will drive them out of the country; they will not have them there—they will not live side by side with them.

Question. Where do they propose to drive them to?

Answer. They say they will send them to hell; that is the expression they use.

Question. According to your observation, what is the extent of this dislike and hostility on the part of the poorer class of whites towards the freedmen?

Answer. In the section which I have visited particularly, and made myself acquainted with this matter, as I naturally wished to, before casting my lot in with them, I should say that about one-half of the poorer class held this sentiment towards the freed people.

Question. Do you think that that feeling is increasing or decreasing among that class?

Answer. It is showing itself more and more publicly since the hopes of getting back into the Union and getting the control of that matter into their own hands. I do not know that they have that feeling any more than they had before, but its demonstration is more apparent.

Question. Suppose the military force should be withdrawn entirely from North Carolina, and the community there should regard their former slaves as now emancipated, what, according to your judgment, would be the general treatment of these people on the part of the State, as evidenced by its laws towards the freedmen?

Answer. There would, in my judgment, be no hope of the freedmen's exercising any of his rights. He would have no chance in a court; he would have no chance anywhere. His condition would be, in my opinion, worse than it was before, from the fact that before, his master was obliged to take care of his health and to provide him food and raiment, and now he would not be obliged to do that; consequently the physicians would not attend a case of sickness among the freed people without the cash in hand; and as they could not pay, they would suffer for lack of attention, and the mortality would be increased to a frightful extent. He would not be allowed to testify in court; he could not enforce contracts if he made them, and no jury that could be impanelled would give a verdict in his favor. His condition would be deplorable, in my opinion.

Question. Do you suppose that the voice of the people of the State as expressed in their legislature would extend to the freed negro the right to hold real estate and enjoy it, as well as personal property, and to testify as a witness in court?

Answer. They would not; I am very confident that they would not be permitted to enjoy either one of those privileges, holding real estate or testifying in court.

Question. Would they preclude the negro from his marital rights as a husband and a father?

Answer. They would not respect those rights. I do not know that they would be able to pass any law to prevent the exercise of them, but if a white man saw fit to invade those rights no redress could be had by the freedman.

Question. State whether the former free negroes of North Carolina have among themselves much property, real or personal.

Answer. I know of some few instances where former free negroes have property of their own, real and personal, but not to any great extent. For the most part they were in fully as bad a condition as the slave; they had but very few rights allowed them.

Question. But they could hold property in North Carolina?

Answer. They could hold property. I have heard those that were free before the war, express the sentiment that they were not so well off—had not so good a chance as the slaves. They said, in case of any collision betwixt the free negro and the slave the white man always protected his property, and always visited, whether wrong or not, his vengeance on the free man. It was to prevent the free men from injuring their property as we would prevent a man from injuring our horse. The chance of justice in that matter was against them. The whites were all against them and in favor of their own property and they felt that they did not stand in so good a position in that respect as the slaves did before the war.

Question. What can you say of the general intelligence of the black race of North Carolina?

Answer. Well, it is at a very low standard; but considering the circumstances under which they have existed for the last two hundred years, they compare very favorably with the whites. I really think that the energy and industry of the black race is greater than that of the so-called poor whites. The blacks have a hope of bettering their condition, an incentive to work up from it, which the low whites seem to have lost. I have found them more willing to work, more willing to save, and to attempt to get ahead.

Question. Can many of the blacks read and write?

Answer. Not many; a few.

Question. What is their disposition in regard to schools and education?

Answer. They are very anxious to learn, and where they have been able to have these privileges they have learned very readily. I think they compare favorably with the whites in that respect; and they have an exceeding anxiety to get their children to school. They will sacrifice and do almost anything for that purpose, and even to learn themselves, and the children are willing and anxious to go to school.

Question. What can you say in regard to the religious feeling of the blacks?

Answer. They seem to have a religious feeling, but it is all emotional; it does not govern their every-day life. They do not carry out their religious feelings into their every-day practice. They seem to have an instinctive, emotional religious feeling, which prompts them at certain times to manifest, in their way, acts of devotion or worship; but they do not seem to get the idea that this feeling which they manifest should be carried into their every-day action, because I have seen them go right from their churches, where they have been manifesting apparently the deepest religious feeling, and commit theft on the way home. They do not seem to connect the two very well.

Question. Do they pilfer a great deal?

Answer. Yes, they do; but it is no more than could be expected from their training and education. I do not think, actually, that they do it so much as should be expected from the circumstances in which they have been placed. I do not think that innately they have any such disposition more than any other class.

Question. Does this proclivity to pilfer arise from a malicious temper on their part—an inclination to do wrong to the neighbor—or does it rather arise from their ignorance and the long habits of slavery which exist among them and the total absence of the right of property?

Answer. There does not seem to be any malicious disposition, any mischievous or malicious wish to destroy a man's property when it would not do them any good. When they pilfer, it is something that they see and covet and wish for their own use, mostly eatables and wearing apparel. But to go and destroy a man's crops, out of malice or mischief, I never knew an instance, and I have had some 3,500 of them in my charge for eighteen months.

Question. How do the negroes there feel towards the government of the United States themselves?

Answer. They are thoroughly loyal.

Question. Did you ever see a negro who was a rebel at heart, thoroughly attached to the cause of the rebellion?

Answer. I never knew an instance, nor heard of one.

Question. What amount of intelligence did you find among the negroes in North Carolina respecting the causes of this civil war and its objects?

Answer. They seemed to have an understanding that it was a war for their liberation; that the cause of the war was their being in slavery, and that the aim and result would be their freedom. Further than that they did not seem to have any idea of it.

Question. How extensive was this feeling of theirs? Was it a general feeling among all classes of negroes?

Answer. It was.

Question. Did you become aware of the existence of any secret association or societies among the negroes, having in view the giving of aid and comfort to the Union cause during the war?

Answer. I was not aware of any organized society. There did not seem to be any organized society there. There did not seem to be any need of any; wherever a negro was found he was sure to be a friend.

Question. How did they get this information—this conjecture that the war was carried on to liberate them?

Answer. That was a wonder to me, and is to this day. It seemed to pass, as intelligence will, in the strangest manner, from one to another quickly. I do not know how. If there was any preconcert among them I was not aware of it. I do not think there was. But it was a thing that interested them very much, and if one met another in the neighborhood he was sure to communicate it, and so it passed from one to another with unaccountable speed. I heard one of the negroes say that he was planting in the field, and he heard a gun from a gunboat. Said his master, who stood beside him, "Sam, what's that?" "Don't know, masser, don't know." As soon as his master turned around the negro said to himself, "Bless de Lord, 'tis the Linkun gunboat." He seemed to have an idea that that sound was the signal of freedom to him, but he did not dare, as he said, to let his master know that he knew what it was. Still, all the time he felt that if he could get where that gun was fired he was a free man; but he did not give any particular reason why or how he got the idea, and I do not know that I asked him.

Question. What can you say of the disposition of the white people in that State towards the freedmen who are out of employment as vagrants, making vagrancy penal?

Answer. I think it is their intention to do so; to pass laws, as soon as they have the control in their hands, or re-enact or put in force their old laws, not allowing a contraband to stay in any section over such a length of time without work; if he does, to seize him and sell him. In fact, that is done now in the county of Gates, North Carolina. The county police, organized under orders from headquarters, did enforce that law on a person who had employment in Portsmouth and was earning her own living, who went out to get her own children. She was seized before she had been there two days; her children refused to her, and under the vagrant act she was set to work on the old plantation without pay, simply for her board and clothes, as a slave. I found also at the same place a whole plantation of forty or fifty hands that the owner said were not free, maintaining the point that they were not, and refusing to let them go. And the county police did not act in the matter; they let him maintain his position.

Question. Have you conversed much with leading, intelligent citizens of North Carolina on this subject of vagrancy?

Answer. Not much. I do not know exactly what you mean by leading, intelligent men.

Question. I will develop the idea. The slaves becoming free are, of course, left entirely destitute of property, real or personal, destitute of house and home, and of all the implements of agriculture. Now, what do leading, intelligent men in that State say in reference to the people thus situated? Would they treat them as vagrants, and punish them for being out of employment and destitute of the means of gaining a livelihood in the midst of that community? What sort of reply would they make to such a suggestion?

Answer. They would say that every one of those persons not employed earning his own living would be treated as a vagrant; that every person that is not at work, or has not some fixed means of earning his living, remaining in a place five days without such employment, would be treated as a vagrant.

Question. Is that feeling generally entertained by the planters towards the black men?

Answer. It is wherever I have been. I speak of the planters; it is not so much so around the cities I find.

Question. Do the planters see no injustice, no cruelty in thus treating the freedmen, who are destitute of all property, all means of livelihood, and of home?

Answer. They do not express any such feeling; they do not seem to entertain it.

Question. Would they, under these circumstances, generally, receive the freedmen into their employment upon any other terms than their own—such as they themselves should prescribe to the negro?

Answer. They would not unless there is some power which compels them.

Question. If there were no such power, what would be the result in regard to the colored race?

Answer. Able-bodied men and women would obtain employment; those who were not able to earn their own living would be left to live in the best way they could. I will tell you an instance which illustrates that precisely. I was sent down to Sampson county to organize the police force. While there a contraband piloted me around to where about fifteen of our captured soldiers were taken out and shot, and were unburied—their bones being above the ground. We went out to bury them, and this contraband was there. When we came back he plead to come with us. He said he was known to have come around with me to the place, and he would not live three days after the soldiers left. I said our orders were strict not to let one of them follow, but, under the circumstances, said I, "You can follow, but do not come into Goldsboro' with the troops; come in behind." He wanted to get his old mother, a woman of eighty-five years, away. I did not dare to take her on the government teams, as it was against orders, and I told him I could not. The owner said if he left he should turn her out of doors. I told him it would be unjust, as she had worked for him all her life, and he had had all her service. "But," said he, "I am not obliged to keep her!" And he actually did turn her out of doors, and she followed us for five miles, and then had to sit down on the road and we had to leave her. Her son did not dare go back for fear of his life. He would have been killed, quite probably, for just piloting us around to the place where the bones of our murdered soldiers lay.

Question. This was after the close of hostilities?

Answer. Yes, sir; some time between the 10th and 20th of May, 1865, and when they were organizing a police force near Goldsboro'. Perhaps you can get an idea of the disposition manifested by this instance which I will relate: One of the leading men of the town—I think he was county judge, or had some connexion with the courts—came to my quarters one morning and said: "Lieutenant, what am I to stand for these freed people? I suppose you call them free. What insults am I obliged to suffer? I am in a perfect fever." I told him I saw he was, and asked him what he complained of? If there was anything wrong I would right it. "Well," said he, "one of these infernal niggers came along as I sat on my piazza this morning and bowed to me, and said good morning—one of your soldiers!" Said I, "If my soldiers don't do anything worse than politely bowing to you as they pass, I shall not punish them; you will have to submit." This man said that his people were never allowed to speak to him unless they were first spoken to, and he never was obliged to submit to the indignity of a black man coming along and speaking to him first.

Question. Do you think of any other instances?

Answer. Well, there are hundreds. I do not recollect particularly.

Question. State, in general terms, what are the feelings of the whites towards the blacks—whether they easily take offence.

Answer. Oh, they never permit any approach to equality on the part of the blacks—not even now. They consider them an inferior race, and they will not allow anything like equality. Another instance: While down in Hyde, Washington county—I was sent down there to arrest a man who had kidnaped a free man from the government employ and sold him over the line as a slave—stopping at the house of the captain of police for that county, I halted my detachment in the road, and went up to the house to speak to the captain about this matter and get his assistance. It was a very hot day; my men had marched a great distance, and a couple of them went up to the back stoop of the house to a wooden pail which sat there, with a wooden dipper in it, and took the dipper and drank some water. All at once I saw a rush from the house; the captain's wife or daughter seized the pail and threw it, dipper and all, into the street, and said: "Lieutenant, do you allow anything like that?—allow your men to come here and drink out of our water-pail?" Said I, "The men are very tired and thirsty, and they need some water." Well, she said she never used a pail that a colored man used; she wanted me to understand that she was not reduced so low as that, and wanted me to order the men out of the yard. I told the men to go back to the lines. I did not want to have any trouble with them, but the matter was taken up, and it was considered a very gross outrage that I had permitted my men to do. The wooden bucket was not in the house, but simply in a back stoop.

Question. Did not your conscience prick you for ordering the men back to the lines?

Answer. Yes, sir; I was very much vexed, and I had to come pretty near shooting one of my men to make them submit to the discipline. And I was mad enough to have turned the pistol muzzle the other way. Still, I was placed in a position where I must get along as easy as I could, as I was under strict orders. The men were very much incensed at it, and almost rebelled, but I ordered them back. They wanted to go through the house, but the war was over, and this man was captain of the police of that county.

Question. The forces under your command were colored?

Answer. Yes, sir; belonged to the first colored regiment of the District of Columbia.

Question. Do you think of any other instance?

Answer. Well, perhaps not so marked as this, but any quantity of that disposition manifested a spirit of refusing them anything like equality or common-sense rights either.

Question. Is there any other statement which you wish to make?

Answer. Well, I do wish to state that the bureau in the State of North Carolina is a farce, unless better supported by the military power or some other. I will state why. At Elizabeth City, some time after Christmas, a party of white citizens attacked the house of a colored man, beat him very badly, fired at his wife, the ball passing through her dress at her waist, and broke their things all to pieces. They nearly killed the man, and fired a shot intending to kill the woman. There was a party of military out there from a Michigan regiment, and they asked the bureau agent to order these men's arrest—the negroes said they could swear to them—and he told the officer that had charge of the military that he did not dare to order their arrest; his life, he said, would not be worth having, as the military were going away in a day or two, and he would be left there alone. For that reason the lieutenant commanding the troops said he did not arrest the parties although they were known and could be identified. The lieutenant was willing to arrest them and bring them down for trial.

Question. Do you remember the name of the lieutenant?

Answer. I do not; he belonged to the 14th North Carolina colored. I had this from the lieutenant commanding the troops. I do not know as I ought to state this under oath.

Question. Anything else?

Answer. In other instances they admitted that they did not dare to interfere against whites in favor of the blacks, for fear of violence on the part of the whites.

Question. Did you make any purchases of land in North Carolina?

Answer. Only a couple of hundred acres, which I have left—entirely given it up as a lost purchase.

Question. Why?

Answer. From the fact that I had become obnoxious to the white inhabitants for the rigidity with which I enforced the regulations in regard to the contrabands. They stated to me that they would not have me around there. I was not frightened out of it, but it was not very valuable land, and I did not choose to go down there and take the risk of it.

Question. Would it be safe, in your opinion, for emigrants from the north to go down and attempt to settle in North Carolina?

Answer. They might not be personally injured, but I have heard there repeatedly that any northern man coming down there to settle, his cattle would be poisoned, his hogs killed, and any improvements he made destroyed. An instance of this kind occurred in this same Sampson county. There were some fifteen or twenty guerillas hanging about after the war closed. They were Arkansas men. They were stealing horses and cattle, and committing ravages on the white Union inhabitants. I took my troops and hunted them out of the district. I had infantry, and they were mounted, but I ambushed the bridges and drove them out. We captured two of the men and got several of their horses. Whilst doing this I called at a very rich planter's house—a widow, who had several nieces. In the course of the conversation I asked them, in a joking way, how they would like to have a northern man come down and marry the widow and carry on the plantation. They all spoke up at once that no northern man would ever be permitted to come down there; his life would not be worth a cent that ever undertook to settle in that section. Of course, all do not have these views, but there are enough who do hold them to render it very unsafe for northern settlers there.

Question. Suppose a settler should go down and shoot a few of them by way of returning the compliment?

Answer. Then ensues civil war again.

Question. Would they rush to arms in such a case?

Answer. They might not openly, but it would be a guerilla fight, a bush fight. And I am satisfied it will be if the States come back. The war will only be carried on in another form. If once in the House and Senate they get anything like a majority, they will carry the war home, and will be as aggressive as ever on northern interests; will do anything to get the preponderance and keep it. That is the disposition which they openly admit to me. If northern men come down and settle, they will destroy their cattle and injure them, or even take their lives. In a great many instances they are willing enough now to get northern men among them and get their money for the land; but the moment they get the power they will drive them out by this system. I believe so—so much so, that I decline to go down there myself. I have been on foot hundreds of miles in the State, travelling around and stopping at houses, investigating this matter for my own benefit.

Question. How extensive do you find this robbing feeling? Does it pervade the State?

Answer. All sections of the State that I have been in. They say in the western part of the State among the mountains there is more Union feeling.

Question. Is this disposition to violence countenanced by the better class?

Answer. Encouraged by the large planters. I have had arguments like this with them: In endeavoring to buy land where I found a man with seven or eight hundred acres, I would say to him, "Why don't you sell to some northern man, or some Englishman, Swede or German, a hundred acres of this land, and let him own it; then he will go to work and improve it, plant trees, build him a little nicer house, and that will make the next hundred acres worth more, because the purchaser of the adjoining hundred acres prefers to have such a neighbor." But no, they say, "We won't sell this land; we don't want to put with the fee; we want to get tenants on it." And they argue that England's great prosperity has been caused by tenantry. That is what they want to get these Germans, Swedes and Swiss, so as to supersede black labor. They want to drive off the blacks from their farms, and have a tenantry like the English. Hence, they refuse to sell a foot. There are lands offered for sale, but they are not worth owning. In most instances, I would not take them as a gift. The best land is held closer than in any place on earth that ever I tread on. Hyde county contains some of the best corn land, but you can't get a foot of anything but swamp land there.

Question. What price do they put on it?

Answer. They pretend to call their best land worth one hundred dollars an acre, if cultivated; uncultivated, twenty five dollars. Washington and Pasquotank counties contain good lands.

Question. Do you think of anything else?

Answer. There is one other thing: In the appointments for this bureau they do not select right men. I stopped at Norfolk, Virginia. By accident I was at the same boarding house with the agent of the bureau. I was there two nights. Both nights he came home drunk.

Question. What was his name?

Answer. Arnold. He borrowed a dollar of me to go to a masked ball, and came home so drunk that he could not pay me before I came away.

Question. What post does he hold?

Answer. One of the agents of the bureau. I felt that they were disgracing the government.

Question. Didn't you report him at once to General Howard?

Answer. I have not been to General Howard's yet. I do not know where his quarters are.

Question. Do you find such habits prevailing among the agents of the bureau?

Answer. The other agent at Roanoke island I have seen so drunk that he did not know where he was.

Question. What is his name?

Answer. Gosling—captain and assistant quartermaster.

Question. Do you think of anything else?

Answer. I cannot swear positively to the fact, but I have seen the rations at Roanoke island in the ration house, and I have seen part of them in the store, and I have seen the "U. S." on the barrel scraped off and marked over with some other name. I have seen flour the same way.

Question. Was this speculation committed by the agent of the bureau, or with his knowledge, consent, or connivance?

Answer. It was with the knowledge and connivance of every one connected with the post—captain, clerks, commissary, and merchants. They are all engaged in it at Roanoke island.

Question. These rations were intended for the freedmen?

Answer. Yes, sir: drawn by them. I have a letter now in my pocket which a contraband on the island asked me to take off the island and put in the post office somewhere else, as he cannot get one to General Howard through the military post office on the island. I took it. In that he states these facts—I suppose what he knows in regard to the rations being sold. And the contrabands on the island are actually suffering to day for want of food. I was in their houses. I have seen a woman who said she was two days without food within three weeks. She had a ration ticket, but could not get anything from the ration house. She was at work spinning at 11 o'clock at night by the fire-light to get something to eat. The whole object seems to be at present out there to drive them back into the employ of their masters—at any rate, to get them off from the government as fast as they can. It is very laudable to do so as fast as they can support themselves, but I do not believe in making them suffer.

Question. I advise you to make these facts known at once to General Howard, in order that a remedy may be applied.

Answer. My only objection to that is, that it is rather an informal way of approaching him—although it might not be, as I am not in the service. In fact, it is impossible to get it to him where they are all concerned for themselves. I do not know what credit he would attach to my statements.

Question. Are you a man of education?

Answer. Nothing more than a common school education.

Question. What is your business? Are you engaged in Boston?

Answer. I am going home to Boston now.

Question. Are you in business there of any kind?

Answer. No, sir; I am seeking for employment in some way or other. I had thought of applying for employment in this bureau, but it has been so long that I have given up the idea.

Question. How old are you?

Answer. 39 years old.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1866.

Colonel E. Whittlesey sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. My residence is Brunswick, Maine. I am now assistant commissioner in the Freedmen's Bureau for North Carolina, with headquarters at Raleigh. My rank is colonel of the 46th United States colored troops.

Question. Where have you been on duty recently?

Answer. I have been on duty since about the 21st of June last at Raleigh, North Carolina.

Question. Have you mingled much among the rebel people of North Carolina since you have been there?

Answer. To some extent. I have met a good many of them at my office, and I have travelled to the principal points in the State, especially in the eastern part of the State.

Question. What is the state of feeling on their part towards the government of the United States generally?

Answer. Generally, I think the feeling cannot be said to be kind or favorable towards the government; and yet a good many of the people are disposed to welcome back the old government over them.

Question. If they had another opportunity, would they not endeavor to throw it off?

Answer. I think they would want to be very certain of success before they would attempt it.

Question. Suppose they were morally certain of success?

Answer. If they were sure of success, I think the majority would endeavor to throw it off. Of course, that is only an opinion.

Question. What effect has President Johnson's liberal policy in granting pardons and amnesties to rebels had upon their hearts and feelings? Has it increased or diminished their respect for the government of the United States?

Answer. I do not think it has increased their respect for the government. It has increased their expectations, and therefore the check that has been put upon them by the refusal of Congress to receive their representatives has excited a great deal of bitterness. It would not have excited that feeling at first, I think. When hostilities ceased they expected nothing from the government. They felt they were entirely in the hands of the United States government, and they seemed ready to submit to whatever the government might be disposed to do with them; but, after receiving a great deal of liberality, they began to think that they had a right to receive everything and to demand more.

Question. How do they treat loyal persons who go to visit them from the loyal States?

Answer. I have not known of any being treated with violence. They treat them with a good deal of indifference. There is no social visiting at all between the two classes. They do not invite northern people to visit them.

Question. Since you have been at Raleigh have you been invited into respectable rebel families?

Answer. In two instances only during the six months that I have been there. The provisional governor (Governor Holden) has invited me to his house since he was superseded. I never was invited to his house while he was in office. I called upon him whenever there was anything of importance to consult with him about in my department, at his office—never at his house.

Question. You are a man of education?

Answer. Yes, sir. I am a graduate of Yale College, and at the time the war broke out was a professor at Bowdoin College, Maine.

Question. Is that well known at Raleigh?

Answer. I think it must be. The first man who invited me to his house was Dr. Skinner, pastor of the Baptist church. He knew my literary and social position very well.

Question. How do they accept the emancipation of their slaves?

Answer. With a pretty good grace. They accept it as a necessity.

Question. Suppose they had the power over the negro that they once had, and there were no Union troops in that State, and no Freedmen's Bureau, what would they do with the blacks?

Answer. I think they would re-establish slavery just as it was before, if there was no fear of any evil consequences from the government or from the people of other States. If not that, they would enact laws which would make the blacks virtually slaves. I have no doubt of that.

Question. They would pass vagrant acts and treat them as vagabonds?

Answer. Yes.

Question. In case of war between the United States and France or England, what would be the inclination of the masses of the rebel community in North Carolina in reference to the government of the United States?

Answer. My impression is that the great mass of the people would sustain the government. They feel bitter towards France and England—more so than they do towards the United States.

Question. Would they furnish volunteers to defend the government in such a case, and to prosecute the war?

Answer. From all I have observed I think they would.

Question. Have you reason to believe that the purpose of southern independence is very generally entertained still among the leading rebel people of North Carolina?

Answer. No, sir. From all that I can see I think it is abandoned generally as a hopeless thing.

Question. What extent of true loyalty, as we understand it, exists in North Carolina?

Answer. Very little, as we understand it. There is a good deal of professed loyalty.

Question. How do they generally feel towards the black people?

Answer. I think a majority of the people are willing to treat them with justice—that is, they are willing to let them alone, to a certain extent; to let them take care of themselves. I should say that from three-fourths to four-fifths of the people were willing to treat the blacks with some degree of fairness, as far as they know how to do it.

Question. Would they freely consent that the negro should have the right of holding, owning, and using real estate?

Answer. Perhaps it would be overstating the matter to say that a majority would freely consent to that; but there is nothing in the old laws of North Carolina to prevent free negroes holding real estate, and, unless they change the legislation, there is nothing in the way of negroes obtaining possession of real estate.

Question. What can you say in relation to the negro's love of labor? Is he inclined to work for fair wages, or is he, generally, an idler and a shirk?

Answer. I think that there is no more industrious class of people anywhere than the negroes of North Carolina when they have proper inducements held out to them. The idleness that has been witnessed during the last season was due in a great measure to the disturbed state of the community and to the uncertainty in their minds (an uncertainty very well founded, too) whether they would receive any pay at all for their work. I have heard no complaints of idleness or shirking in places where I have known that they were receiving fair and prompt payment for their work.

Question. Are the whites generally willing to give them fair wages?

Answer. Yes, sir. I think they are, where they have the means. The great difficulty so far has been that they have not had money to pay them, and have been obliged to make some other arrangement, which left a settlement to be made for their work at some future time. Even for this year they are obliged to resort to some arrangement for a division of crops, which is a very unsatisfactory one always with free negroes. Where employers can pay cash by the month or by the week, they have no difficulty at all in getting laborers.

Question. Is there great poverty among the blacks? Does beggary prevail among them to any extent?

Answer. No, sir, not to a great extent. We have at certain places large communities of blacks who have been gathering during the entire war on the coast—places of refuge from the interior—where they came within our lines. At those points the men have enlisted in the army, and left a large number of women and children dependent upon the government for support. These principal points are Roanoke island and Newbern and vicinity. In all the rest of the State we have not more than five or six hundred who are receiving rations and support from the government.

Question. Do the whites appear to encourage or discourage education among the blacks?

Answer. Neither, to any great extent. They appear, generally, indifferent on the subject. I have often put the question to gentlemen who have come into my office, "What do you say about establishing a school on your farm?" The very general reply is, "We have not thought of such a thing. It is a matter that we never have taken into consideration—the education of the blacks." In some instances they say they have no objection to a school if a teacher can be found, and if such arrangement can be made as not to interrupt the work of the farm. There is some real opposition to it. A single fact will illustrate that: At Elizabeth City, during the early part of January, a party of white men burned down an old church that was being fitted up for the freedmen's school-house. That is the only instance of the burning of a building that was being prepared for a school-house that I know of in the State. But when I try to get buildings—to rent or purchase for that purpose with any funds that may be intrusted to me by the Freedman's Aid Societies—I find it very difficult to get possession of proper places for schools when it is known that the buildings are to be used for that purpose.

Question. Are the teachers of colored schools treated respectfully among them?

Answer. They are not very often insulted in any way, but they are entirely passed by, and looked upon with contempt; that is very certain.

Question. They are not received into respectable society?

Answer. Not at all. They are never invited into any one's house. I never have known yet an instance of it, unless it may be at Newbern, where there are a good many northern people; but I presume your question applies only to southern people. When the teachers first went to Raleigh I sent a gentleman all over town to try and find a boarding-place for them, and it was utterly impossible to find a place for them in a private family, although there were many private families anxious to get boarders, in order to get the means of support. When it was frankly stated to them that these were young ladies from the north, who were there for the purpose of teaching colored schools, they turned their backs upon them.

Question. How much capacity has the negro to acquire education?

Answer. I cannot see any difference, in that respect, between the black children and white children at the north.

Question. How extensive has been your observation on that subject?

Answer. I have visited very frequently the schools at Raleigh, where my headquarters are; and when I go to Newbern, as I do once in a month or two, I spend what time I can spare in looking through the schools. My observation has not been so extensive as I wish it had been, in order to answer the question intelligently. But I have been a school-teacher and school committee-man a good many years in Maine, and am capable of judging pretty quickly as to how a school is getting on. I have been gratified to see that they have been making such great progress in Newbern. The schools there have been established nearly three years, and of course they have made much further advances than in Raleigh or Wilmington—places that were only occupied by our troops last spring. In Newbern there are classes in the advanced rules of arithmetic, studying and reciting geography and grammar, working out problems on the black-board, drawing maps, and going through the various exercises of the school, just as they would in any good school in New England—seeming to understand what they are about.

Question. Do they appear to be indifferent to learning?

Answer. No, sir, quite the opposite; they are very eager to learn. I attributed that, at first, to the novelty of the thing—to their being permitted to do what had been always theretofore prohibited to them; but their zeal and interest hold out so well that I am constrained to believe that it is due to a higher motive than a mere love of novelty. The older people avail themselves of evening schools. Men, grayheaded and wearing spectacles, and women, go in and learn to read, paying for the privilege out of their scanty earnings. The evening schools are generally established upon that principle.

Question. How are they in regard to religion? Do the blacks appear to be a religious people?

Answer. Yes, sir; they are peculiarly so. They are an emotional people, as you know, and are very fond of getting together, singing their religious songs, and listening to addresses, either from men of their own race or others; it does not matter. But I can say that they are sadly in need of religious instruction; their ideas are very crude, indeed. But they are a people very easily influenced and trained, under proper religious instruction, I think.

Question. Have you any knowledge of their character as soldiers?

Answer. No, sir. I have never seen a regiment of colored soldiers in action. I have seen them on drill, and going through the various duties of military life, but never in battle.

Question. How do they demean themselves on drill?

Answer. Very well, indeed, sir; very well. I think it is easier to drill to perfection a regiment of negroes than a regiment of whites.

Question. Is there any disposition among the whites of North Carolina to get rid of the blacks?

Answer. I did hear a good deal said on that subject about four months ago; but lately, since they have begun to make their arrangements for the present year, I hear very little said on that subject. They are finding that there are none too many in the State to perform the labor of the State.

Question. There are not many blacks in North Carolina?

Answer. A very much larger number than people usually suppose. They number about 350,000.

Question. What proportion does that bear to the white population?

Answer. The white population is a little more than 600,000. The blacks are about one to two.

Question. What would be the effect of allowing the negro to vote in North Carolina; what effect would it produce upon the white people?

Answer. There is no disposition to allow him to vote there. That would be a very obnoxious measure to all the people.

Question. Would it be followed by scenes of violence and riot?

Answer. Yes, sir. I think if the negro should go to the polls and attempt to vote, without the presence of a military guard, there would be trouble and violence.

Question. How do the rebels with whom you are acquainted feel in respect to the payment of the national debt of the United States contracted for the prosecution of the war?

Answer. They are very cautious in expressing themselves on that subject. I do not think I ever heard one of them say that he was opposed to paying the national debt. I have heard them say "we shall be obliged to pay our share of the national debt," using language indicating that it was a very disagreeable thing to be obliged to pay for being whipped. But I never heard one say he was opposed to paying it.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the confederate rebel debt, or of the State rebel debt, contracted for the prosecution of the rebellion?

Answer. I think the convention assembled there last October expressed the popular feeling on that subject when they declined to take action in relation to it. It was felt to be a kind of degrading compulsion when the President sent a despatch to the convention saying that action must be taken before the State could be received into the Union.

Question. And then the convention took that action?

Answer. Yes, sir; the convention yielded and repudiated the entire confederate debt. But it would not have taken that action except for the despatch of the President. In fact, the convention had laid the matter on the table and voted to adjourn.

Question. Did that despatch produce debate in the convention?

Answer. Yes, sir; it did, and some of the strongest men in the convention said that it was altogether beneath the dignity of such a body to yield to dictation of that kind.

Question. Was there or was there not a disposition on the part of the convention to pay that rebel debt—the debt due from the State?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think there was a disposition manifested there to make provision for its payment, and I think that such provision would eventually have been made were it not for the despatch from the President.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the confederate debt—the debt of the Confederate States?

Answer. I think there would be but little opposition to the repudiation of that portion of the southern debt.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to speak of on this examination?

Answer. As to the necessity of United States troops there. I do not know that you have asked me any question on that point directly. If the Freedmen's Bureau is to be continued, it will need the presence of a military force to give it any efficiency at all. In many places it would be unsafe for an officer of the bureau to attempt to discharge his duties without a military force somewhere in the State to which he could apply. A small force of three to four thousand men scattered over the State will be sufficient to preserve order, and to give security to the officers of the government acting either under the Freedmen's Bureau or the Treasury Department, or any other department of the government. The colored schools I am sure would not be allowed to go on in certain country districts without some force to appeal to. In the large towns, where there is more intelligence and a better class of people, I think the schools will gain the good will of the community, and be allowed to continue without any assistance. The freedmen themselves would be, I think, in great peril if there was not a United States force kept in the State—not that there would be any general attack upon them, or that the better class of people would countenance any outrages. There are enough of the bitter and worthless people, who positively hate the negroes, to do them great wrong, and the better classes would not interfere, I am satisfied, in a great many instances, to see these persons punished and justice done to the freedmen. I will give you one fact which is the foundation for that remark: In Pitt county, some two months ago, four young men, some of whom had been in the rebel service, riding armed through the country, came across a negro man on his road to Washington—a negro who had been in the service of the father of one of them as a slave. They seized him, beat him cruelly, and left him on the ground in such a state that he died before morning. They went on to the town of Washington, in Beaufort county; rode through the town; fired at a white citizen, with whom they had a falling out, missed him, but hit another citizen; attacked another negro, fired at him, and, in short, took possession of the town. There were no troops there. I had a lieutenant there, and he called upon the police to arrest these men. There has been a kind of semi-military police established in every county of the State under military orders. The police declined to interfere, and the men went back to their own county. This officer wrote to the chief of police in that county, ordering him to arrest these men and bring them to Washington in order that he might send them to Newbern for trial. He brought down three of them, not under arrest, but by persuasion, and put them in jail in Washington. Before a military force had arrived from Newbern they broke jail and escaped. The military force returned to Newbern. The case was reported fully to me. I went to Newbern and applied to General Paine, in command there. He gave me a military escort of mounted men. I went into the country and tried to find these men. The citizens everywhere assured me that they had gone out of the county, and, in their opinion, had left the State. They could not be found, and I had to return without succeeding in arresting them. Within a week from that time they appeared at Greenville, the county seat, and voted at the State election without being challenged. The chief of police was there with his force, and made no attempt to arrest them. Within a week or two afterwards they appeared again at Greenville, and assisted in organizing the militia of the county. Still, no effort was made to arrest them. I again reported the fact that they were present to the military commanders, and requested that they might be arrested, or that the police be dealt with as they should be for failing to discharge their duty. When I came away the matter was still pending. A force was about being organized and a plan started for getting hold of these men. I state these facts to show that the citizens will not take any steps to arrest the murderers of negroes, and that you cannot trust even the police organized under military orders to do that work.

Question. The police are subject to State authority?

Answer. No, sir; this police is subject to the military authority of the United States. It was organized by an order from General Schofield, and armed.

Question. Are the members of the police citizens of North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Taken from the State militia?

Answer. Taken from the citizens generally. General Schofield issued an order and sent out an officer to select the men, and to organize a police in every county of the State for the purpose of preserving order and carrying out his own commands. But in many instances these policemen have been acting as the agents of magistrates of the county. They have taken negroes, tied them up by the thumbs, and whipped them unmercifully. I have been obliged to arrest them in several instances and bring them to trial for abusing negroes.

Question. That kind of persons have no respect for negroes at all?

Answer. None whatever. They did not think they were doing anything wrong at all. They thought they were executing the laws of the State, and that they were doing what they were required to do as policemen. It is very difficult for the people of the south to look upon the negro as a free man—as having rights such as white men have.

Question. It is a new thing to them?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is a new thing. But, as I have said, I think that about three-fourths of the intelligent property owners are disposed to try the experiment of free labor, and try it with a good deal of fairness. The great majority of the negroes of the State have made their arrangements for the present year, and have hired out and got their homes. It would be difficult for me now to get five hundred colored laborers in the State if I was applied to for them.

Question. Have the negroes generally correct ideas as to the elements of property; do they know what is meant by property?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do they distinguish conscientiously the principle of meum and tuum?

Answer. Yes, sir; so far as their relations to strangers, to northern men, and to neighbors is concerned; but they have an idea that they have a certain right to the property of their former masters, that they have earned it, and that if they can lay their hands on any of it, it is so much that belongs to them. I think that feeling is very general among them. They think that they have a right to the cattle and hogs that they have raised and taken care of, and the grain that they have raised.

Question. We have heard much said about the disposition of the negro to pilfer upon plantations; does that disposition arise from the state of things to which you have just referred?

Answer. I think it does, very generally. They know it is wrong to steal, and I do not think they steal often from northern men. I have had negro servants ever since the war has been going on, and everything that I have has been left open in their charge; and I am not aware of having lost anything. I am quite convinced, however, that these same servants would steal from their former masters if they got the chance.

Question. Are you able to speak of the condition of things out of North Carolina?

Answer. No, sir; not from personal observation.

Question. Are there any other facts or circumstances which you desire to relate here?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think of any. General Howard has had my reports covering the whole time that I have been there. As they have been printed, it cannot be contrary to orders to pass them over to you.

The reports handed in by witness were ordered to be annexed to his testimony, and are as follows:

Summary report of North Carolina, Colonel E. Whittlesey, assistant commissioner.

RALEIGH, N. C., October 15, 1865.

GENERAL: In presenting my first quarterly report of the operations of this bureau in North Carolina, which I have the honor to forward, I deem it proper to give a history of its ORGANIZATION.

On the 22d of June I arrived at Raleigh with instructions from you to take the control of all subjects relating to "refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands" within this State. I found these subjects in much confusion. Hundreds of white refugees and thousands of blacks were collected about this and other towns, occupying every hovel and shanty, living upon government rations, without employment and without comfort, many dying for want of proper food and medical supplies. A much larger number, both white and black, were crowding into the towns, and literally swarming about every depot of supplies to receive their rations. My first effort was to reduce this class of suffering and idle humanity to order, and to discover how large a proportion of these applicants were really deserving of help. The whites, excepting "loyal refugees," were referred to the military authorities. To investigate the condition of refugees and freedmen and minister to the wants of the destitute, I saw at once would require the services of a large number of efficient officers. As fast as suitable persons could be selected, application was made to the department and district commanders for their detail, in accordance with General Order No. 102, War Department, May 31, 1865. In many cases these applications were unsuccessful, because the officers asked for could not be spared. The difficulties and delays experienced in obtaining the help needed for a proper organization of my work will be seen from the fact that upon thirty-four written requests, in due form, only eleven officers have been detailed by the department and district commanders. With such assistance, however, as could be secured I proceeded to divide the State into four general districts, viz: eastern, western, southern, and central. To the eastern district I assigned as superintendent Captain Horace James, assistant quartermaster, who was already on the ground, and had for a long time been in charge of "contrabands," under the appointment of military commanders of the district. Over the central district Captain Beal, 9th Maine volunteers, was first appointed superintendent, but he was soon relieved by Lieutenant Colonel D. E. Clapp, 35th United States colored troops.

The western district was placed under the supervision of Major Smith, 17th Massachusetts volunteers, who was, however, soon relieved to be mustered out with his regiment, and the vacancy has not yet been filled.

The southern district remained without an officer until August 18, when Major Charles J. Wickersham, assistant adjutant general, was assigned as its superintendent.

The next step was the division of these four districts into sub-districts. My first intention was to make each county a sub-district; but the impossibility of obtaining so large a number of officers as this would require compelled me to embrace from two to eight counties in each sub-district. The arrangement now made is as follows: eastern district has eight sub-districts; central, nine sub-districts; western, six sub-districts; southern, four sub-districts.

For the twenty-seven sub-districts the whole number of assistant superintendents (inclusive of citizen agents) has been thirty-three. The largest number at any specific time has been twenty. The number on duty now is fifteen. Thus more than half of the State is still without an officer or representative of the bureau.

My organization has been three times almost broken up by the mustering out of regiments to which my officers belonged. The only permanent officers, and such only can be useful in this service, are those detailed by order of the Secretary of War. With this brief history of my efforts to organize the bureau, I proceed to state

THE DESIGN AND WORK PROPOSED.

In my circulars Nos. 1 and 2 (copies of which are herewith enclosed) the objects to be attained are fully stated. All officers of the bureau are instructed—

1. To aid the destitute, yet in such a way as not to encourage dependence.
2. To protect freedmen from injustice.
3. To assist freedmen in obtaining employment and fair wages for their labor.
4. To encourage education, intellectual and moral.

Under these four divisions the operations of the bureau can best be presented.

RELIEF AFFORDED.

It was evident at the outset that large numbers were drawing rations who might support themselves. The street in front of the post commissary's office was blocked up with vehicles of all the descriptions peculiar to North Carolina, and with people who had come from the country around, in some instances from a distance of sixty miles, for government rations. These were destitute whites, and were supplied by order of the department commander.

Our own headquarters, and every office of the bureau, was besieged from morning till night by freedmen, some coming many miles on foot, others in wagons and carts. The rations issued would scarcely last till they reached home, and in many instances they were sold before leaving the town, in exchange for luxuries. To correct these evils, orders were issued that no able-bodied man or woman should receive supplies, except such as were known to be industrious, and to be entirely destitute. Great care was needed to protect the bureau from imposition, and at the same time to relieve the really deserving. By constant inquiry and effort the throng of beggars was gradually removed. The homeless and helpless were gathered in camps, where shelter and food could be furnished, and the sick collected in hospitals, where they could receive proper care.

The statistical reports prepared by Captain Almy, commissary of subsistence, forwarded herewith, will show a steady and healthy decrease of the number of dependents from month to month.

July there were issued 215,285 rations, valued at $44,994 56; August there were issued 156,289 rations, valued at $32,664 40; September there were issued 137,350 rations, valued at $28,706 15.

Should no unforeseen trouble arise, the number will be still further reduced. But we have in our camps at Roanoke island and Newbern, many women and children, families of soldiers who have died in the service, and refugees from the interior during the war, for whom permanent provision must be made. Some of the women might earn their support as servants in northern families, if there were any organized agency for finding them employment, and means for transporting them north. Many children might be collected in orphan asylums, saved from death, and properly educated; and I earnestly recommend that the "soldiers' bounty fund" be expended in establishing such institutions. In this connexion may be properly reported the efforts made in behalf of the sick. At the organization of the bureau many white refugees were found in a wretched condition. These were placed as far as possible in hospitals. Some have died; others have recovered, and been sent back to their homes. But very few of this class now remain under our control. The reports prepared by Surgeon Hogan will show the condition of freedmen hospitals. In the early part of the summer much suffering and mortality occurred for want of medical attendance and supplies. This evil is now being remedied by the employment of surgeons by contract. One is on duty at Beaufort, another at Wilmington, and several others are expected soon.

The whole number of sick under care of the bureau has been 3,771 during the quarter ending September 30.

PROTECTION.

Regarding this bureau as the appointed instrument for redeeming the solemn pledge of the nation, through its Chief Magistrate, to secure the rights of freedmen, I have made every effort to protect them from wrong. Suddenly set free, they were at first exhilarated by the air of liberty, and committed some excesses. To be sure of their freedom, many thought they must leave the old scenes of oppression and seek new homes. Others regarded the property accumulated by their labor as in part their own, and demanded a share of it. On the other hand, the former masters, suddenly stripped of their wealth, at first looked upon the freedmen with a mixture of hate and fear. In these circumstances some collisions were inevitable. The negroes were complained of as idle, insolent, and dishonest; while they complained that they were treated with more cruelty than when they were slaves. Some were tied up and whipped without trial; some were driven from their homes without pay for their labor, without clothing or means of support; others were forbidden to leave on pain of death, and a few were shot or otherwise murdered. All officers of the bureau were directed, in accordance with your circular No. 5, to investigate these difficulties between the two classes, to settle them by counsel and arbitration as far as possible, to punish light offences by fines or otherwise, and to report more serious cases of crime to the military authorities for trial. The exact number of cases heard and decided cannot be given; they have been so numerous that no complete record could be kept; one officer reported that he had heard and disposed of as many as 180 complaints in a single day. The method pursued may be best presented by citing a few cases and the action thereon. From the report of Captain James, for August, I quote the following:

"I forward to you, in his own language, a report of a case which occurred in Gates county, on the northern border of the State, far away from any influence of troops, and where the military power of the government had been little felt. No doubt it illustrates others in similar localities far from garrisons and northern influences. The report will repay perusal, and appears to have been managed with admirable tact on the part of Captain Hill. Reports had reached me of the way in which David Parker, of Gates county, treated his colored people, and I determined to ascertain for myself their truth. Accordingly, last Monday, August 20, accompanied by a guard of six men from this post, (Elizabeth City,) I proceeded to his residence, about forty miles distant. He is very wealthy. I ascertained, after due investigation, and after convincing his colored people that I was really their friend, that the worst reports in regard to him were true. He had twenty-three negroes on his farm, large and small. Of these fourteen were field-hands; they all bore unmistakable evidence of the way they had been worked; very much undersized, rarely exceeding, man or woman, 4 feet

6 inches—men and women of thirty and forty years of age looking like boys and girls. It has been his habit for years to work them from sunrise to sunset, and often long after, only stopping one hour for dinner—food always cooked for them to save time. He had, and has had for many years, an old colored man, one-eyed and worn out in the service, for an overseer or 'over-looker,' as he called himself. In addition, he has two sons at home, one of whom has made it a point to be with them all summer long—not so much to superintend as to drive. The old colored overseer always went behind the gang with a cane or whip, and woe betide the unlucky wretch who did not continually do his part; he had been brought up to work, and had not the least pity for any one who could not work as well as he.

"Mr. Parker told me that he had hired his people for the season: that directly after the surrender of General Lee he called them up and told them they were free; that he was better used to them than to others, and would prefer hiring them; that he would give them board and two suits of clothing to stay with him till the 1st day of January, 1866, and one Sunday suit at the end of that time; that they consented willingly—in fact, preferred to remain with him, &c. But from his people I learned that though he did call them up, as stated, yet when one of them demurred at the offer his son James flew out in the service, and kicked him; that after that they were all 'perfectly willing to stay;' they were watched night and day; that Bob, one of the men had been kept chained nights: that they were actually afraid to try to get away. There was no complaint of the food nor much of the clothing, but they were in constant terror of the whip. Only three days before my arrival, Bob had been stripped in the field and given fifty lashes for hitting Adam, the colored over-looker, while James Parker stood by with a gun, and told him to run if he wanted to, he had a gun there. About four weeks before, four of them who went to church and returned before sunset were treated to twenty-five lashes each. Some were beaten or whipped almost every day. Having ascertained these and other similar facts, I directed him to call them up and pay them from the first of May last up to the present time. I investigated each case, taking into consideration age, family, physical condition, &c., estimating their work from $8 down, and saw him pay them off then and there, allowing for clothing and medical bill. I then arrested him and his two sons, and brought them here, except Dr. Joseph Parker, whose sister is very sick, with all the colored people I thought necessary as witnesses, intending to send them to Newbern for trial. But on account of the want of immediate transportation I concluded to release them on their giving a bond in the sum of $2,000 to Colonel E. Whittlesey, assistant commissioner for the State of North Carolina, and to his successors in office, conditioned as follows:

"That whereas David Parker and James Parker have heretofore maltreated their colored people, and have enforced the compulsory system instead of the free labor system: Now, therefore, if they, each of them, shall hereafter well and kindly treat, and cause to be treated, the hired laborers under their or his charge, and shall adopt the free labor system in lieu of the compulsory system, then this bond to be void and of no effect; otherwise to remain in full force and effect, with good security."

Lieutenant Colonel Clapp, superintendent central district, reports three cases of cruel beating, which have been investigated, and the offenders turned over to the military authorities for trial; besides very many instances of defrauding freedmen of their wages.

From the reports of Major Wickersham, superintendent of southern district, I quote the following:

"August 25.—A. S. Miller, Bladen county, states that Henry Miller (colored) neglects to support his family. Action: required Henry Miller to use his wages for the support of his wife and children, who have no claims on their former master, and can look to no one else than the husband and father for support.

"27th.—Betsey Powell (colored) states that Mrs. Frank Powell, Columbus county, has driven her away without pay for her labor. Gave letter to Mrs. Powell directing her to pay Betsy for her labor since April 27, 1865.

"29th. Len Shiner (colored) states that he made an agreement with Mr. David Russell, of Robeson county, to work and gather his crop, for which he was to receive subsistence and one-third of the crop, when gathered. Mr. Russell has driven him off and refuses to pay. Wrote to Mr. Russell directing him to comply with terms of agreement, or furnish satisfactory reasons for not doing so. These are but examples of hundreds of complaints heard and acted upon by Major Wickersham and other officers in the southern district."

The following cases are taken from the report of Captain Barritt, assistant commissioner, at Charlotte:

"Morrison Miller charged with whipping girl Hannah (colored.) Found guilty. Action: ordered to pay said Hannah fifty bushels of corn towards supporting herself and children, two of said children being the offspring of Miller.

"Wm. Wallace charged with whipping Martha (colored.) Plead guilty. Action: fined said Wallace $15, with assurance that if the above offence was repeated, the fine would be doubled.

"Council Best attempts to defraud six families of their summer labor, by offering to sell at auction the crop on his leased plantation. Action: sent military force and stopped the sale until contract with laborers was complied with."

A hundred pages of similar reports might be copied, showing, on the one side, that many freedmen need the presence of some authority to enforce upon them their new duties; and on the other, that so far from being true that "there is no county in which a freedman can be imposed upon," [speech of Judge Reed, constitutional convention,] there is no county in which he is not oftener wronged; and these wrongs increase just in proportion to their distance from United States authorities. There has been great improvement, during the quarter, in this respect. The efforts of the bureau to protect the freedmen have done much to restrain violence and injustice. Such efforts must be continued until civil government is fully restored, just laws enacted, or great suffering and serious disturbance will be the result.

INDUSTRY.

Contrary to the fears and predictions of many, the great mass of colored people have remained quietly at work upon the plantations of their former masters during the entire summer. The crowds seen about the towns in the early part of the season had followed in the wake of the Union army, to escape from slavery. After hostilities ceased these refugees returned to their homes, so that but few vagrants can now be found. In truth, a much larger amount of vagrancy exists among the whites than among the blacks. It is the almost uniform report of officers of the bureau that freedmen are industrious.

The report is confirmed by the fact that out of a colored population of nearly 350,000 in the State, only about 5,000 are now receiving support from the government. Probably some others are receiving aid from kind-hearted men who have enjoyed the benefit of their services from childhood. To the general quiet and industry of this people there can be no doubt that the efforts of the bureau have contributed greatly. I have visited some of the larger towns, as Wilmington, Newbern, Goldsborough, and both by public addresses and private instructions counselled the freedmen to secure employment and maintain themselves. Captain James has made an extensive tour through the eastern district for the same purpose, and has exerted a most happy influence. Lieutenant Colonel Clapp has spent much of his time in visiting the county seats of the central district, and everywhere been listened to by all classes with deep interest. Other officers have done much good in this way. They have visited plantations, explained the difference between slave and free labor, the nature and the solemn obligation of contracts. The chief difficulty met with has been a want of confidence between the two parties. The employer, accustomed only to the system of compulsory labor, is slow to believe that he can secure fruitful services by the stimulus of wages. The laborer is unwilling to trust the promises of those for whom he has toiled all his days without pay; hence but few contracts for long periods have been effected. The bargains for the present year are generally vague, and their settlement as the crops are gathered in requires much labor. In a great majority of cases the land-owners seem disposed to do justly, and even generously; and when this year's work is done, and the proceeds divided, it is hoped that a large number of freedmen will enter into contracts for the coming year. They will, however, labor much more cheerfully for money, with prompt and frequent payments, than for a share of the crop, for which they must wait twelve months. A large farmer in Pitt county hires hands by the job, and states that he never saw negroes work so well. Another in Lenoir county pays monthly, and is satisfied so far with the experiment of free labor. Another obstacle to long contracts was found in the impression which had become prevalent to some degree, i. e., that lands were to be given to freedmen by the government. To correct this false impression I published a circular, No. 3, and directed all officers of the bureau to make it as widely known as possible. From the statistical reports enclosed, it will be seen that during the quarter 257 written contracts for labor have been prepared and witnessed; that the average rate of wages, when paid in money, is from $8 to $10 per month; that 128 farms are under the control of the bureau and cultivated for the benefit of freedmen; that 8,540 acres are under cultivation, and 6,102 laborers are employed. Many of the farms were rented by agents of the treasury as abandoned lands, previous to the establishing of this bureau, and were transferred to us with the leases upon them. Nearly all have been restored to their owners, under the President's proclamation of amnesty, and our tenure of the few that remain is so uncertain that I have not deemed it prudent to set apart any for use of refugees and freedmen, in accordance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865. But many freedmen are taking this matter into their own hands, and renting lands from the owners for one or more years. The following communication indicates an interesting movement in this direction:

KINSTON, N. C., August 16, 1865.

Whereas we, a portion of the freedmen of Lenoir county, in the State of North Carolina, being desirous of embracing every facility which the United States government offers, to provide for ourselves the comforts of a permanent home; and whereas we have felt the importance of mutual labor and mutual interests, and believing that industry is the basis of progress, and being desirous of becoming good citizens, showing that the labor spent on us was not thrown away: Therefore,

Be it, and it is hereby, resolved, That we form ourselves into a society to purchase homes by joint stock, and for other purposes to be hereafter stated.

Be it further resolved, That we raise ten thousand dollars for the purchase of homesteads, and that the said sum be raised by the 1st of January, 1868.

And be it resolved, That this society shall be composed of the best and most reliable freedmen in Lenoir county. And it is further proposed to raise the required amount in the following manner, viz: two hundred and fifty men will compose the society, each to be assessed the sum of forty-eight dollars per annum, to be paid in monthly instalments of four dollars each.

ANTHONY BLUNT,
JAMES HARGATE,
EZEKIEL BLUNT, Committee.

I am also endeavoring to purchase or rent, for a long period, the lands upon which houses have been erected by freedmen, so that they may not lose what has been expended. The most important local interest of this kind is the Trent river settlement. The village was carefully laid out by Captain James, and now contains a population of nearly 3,000, all but about 300 self-supporting. "Although," says Captain James, "in interest a part of the city of Newbern, it lies outside of the corporate limits, and therefore came under no municipal regulations." I therefore issued an order erecting it into a separate municipality. I imposed a small tax upon the trades and occupations of the people, and a very moderate ground rent upon the lots, to raise a fund for meeting the necessary expenses of maintaining the settlement. They pay these sums with pleasure, deeming them an evidence of citizenship. From the fund thus raised the superintendent, assistant superintendent, a clerk, six nurses in hospital, and some fifteen mechanics and laborers employed about the settlement, are paid. A good market is now nearly completed, the stalls of which have been taken up beforehand at high rates. It needs only the power to sell these people their lots of land to induce them to put more permanent improvements on them. The settlement, as such, is by all confessed to be well ordered, quiet, healthy, and better regulated than the city proper.

EDUCATION.

The quarter has been one of vacation rather than active work in this department. Still some progress has been made, and much done to prepare for the coming autumn and winter. Rev. F. A. Fiske, a Massachusetts teacher, has been appointed superintendent of education, and has devoted himself with energy to his duties. From his report it will be seen that the whole number of schools, during the whole or any part of the quarter, is 63, the number of teachers 85, and the number of scholars 5,624. A few of the schools are self-supporting, and taught by colored teachers, but the majority are sustained by northern societies and northern teachers. The officers of the bureau have, as far as practicable, assigned buildings for their use, and assisted in making them suitable; but the time is nearly past when such facilities can be given. The societies will be obliged hereafter to pay rent for school-rooms and for teachers' homes. The teachers are engaged in a noble and self-denying work. They report a surprising thirst for knowledge among the colored people—children giving earnest attention and learning rapidly, and adults, after the day's work is done, devoting the evening to study. In this connexion it may be mentioned, as a result of moral instruction, that 512 marriages have been reported and registered, and 42 orphans provided with good homes.

FINANCES.

The financial condition of the bureau is clearly presented in the reports of Captain James, who, in addition to his duties as superintendent of the eastern district, has acted as financial agent, with the assistance of Captain Seely, assistant quartermaster. The duties of the department have been very great, and have been faithfully discharged by these officers. In July, Colonel Heaton, agent of the United States treasury, turned over to the bureau a large amount of real estate in Wilmington, Newbern and adjoining counties, which had been leased for terms varying from one month to one year. The collection of rents from several hundred lessees of tenements and farms has been a laborious work. But the examination and adjustment of claims for this property, and the restoration of it in accordance with the President's amnesty proclamations, has been more trying and perplexing. Nearly all, however, is now out of our hands, and unless a re-examination of these claims is forced upon us by application for rents, on the ground that the property was not abandoned, we shall be able, hereafter, to devote all our time to our appropriate work.

The following summary of operations presents the leading facts of the foregoing report:

Receipts for the quarter.....		$44,913 24
Current expenses.....	$4,350 34
For soldiers' families from bounty fund.....	7,977 25
Remitted to treasury.....	21,584 17
		33,911 76
Balance credited October 1, 1865.....		11,001 48

Farms, 128; acres on farms cultivated, 8,540; acres of pine lands worked, about 50,000; freedmen employed on farms, 6,102; contracts witnessed, 257; freedmen employed under them, 1,847; marriages registered, 512; orphans apprenticed, 42; schools established, 63; teachers employed, 85; scholars attending, 5,624; cases of crime reported for trial, 12; cases of difficulty settled, reported in full, 257; cases not reported in writing, several thousand; rations issued, 508,924—value of $106,365 11; hospitals, 14; sick in hospitals, &c., attended by direction of the bureau, 54,441; deaths, whole number of freedmen reported in hospitals, camps, and towns adjoining, 2,680.

Reports of sick and deaths embrace all cases in the vicinity of stations, and with which the bureau has in any way been connected.

Estimated crops: cotton, 853,700, pounds; corn, 32,715 bushels; sweet potatoes, 1,000 bushels, turpentine, 5,700 barrels; tar, 5,808 barrels.

The number of men engaged in fishing cannot be ascertained.

Many of the officers in command of troops in this department have given me their hearty support, and my own subordinates have been faithful and zealous in the discharge of their duties. I am specially indebted to Lieutenant F. H. Beecher, acting assistant adjutant general, for his industry; to Captain Thomas P. Johnson, assistant quartermaster, Captain George C. Almey, commissary of subsistence, and Surgeon M. K. Hogan, for their efficient management of their respective departments.

Very respectfully,

E. WHITTLESEY,
Colonel and Assistant Commissioner.

Major General O. O. HOWARD,
Commissioner of Bureau of Refugees, &c.

BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER, STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
Raleigh, N. C., January 15, 1866.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith my report of the various operations of this bureau for the quarter ending December 31, 1865. The figures and facts speak so plainly for themselves that I need add but very few remarks. Defective as our organization is in some respects, affected by its dependence upon, and subjection to, other branches of the War Department, yet, having got established, and its machinery put in motion, it is doing its work with vigor and success. Many changes among my subordinate officers have been caused by the muster-out of the regiments, but the losses sustained have been partially compensated by details from the Veteran Reserve Corps. My efforts to secure the services of citizens as agents of the bureau have not met with success. Immediately after your visit here in October I addressed a note to each member of the constitutional convention, requesting him to give me the name of some suitable persons in his own county to be appointed to this office; but though so many promised to you their hearty co-operation in organizing this agency, not one replied to my request. I have, however, by other means, found a few who were willing to accept the position, and some of them have done good service. Others have proved unfit for the duties required, not being able to comprehend that the negro can be a free man, or can have any rights which a white man is bound to respect. My experience so far is against the appointment of any other than military officers. Even these, after being mustered out, are not as efficient as when in the military service. They fail to command respect. They do not inspire the freedmen with confidence.

As the year has drawn to a close, all the officers of the bureau have been busy settling up claims for labor during the past season. The old story has been repeated thousands of times—no definite bargain made—no wages promised; but "massa said, stay till the crop is made and he would do what was right." On that point, "what is right," arises the dispute. But when the parties can be brought together and all the facts heard, it is, in most cases, easy to make a satisfactory decision. Captain Evans reported that as many as one hundred and fifty claims and difficulties of this kind were brought before him in Warren county at the close of the year. So long as these claims and questions of wages were unsettled, it was natural that the freedmen should refuse to enter into any new contracts for another year. They wanted a little experience to give them faith. And it gives me great pleasure to state that in a large majority of cases a fair settlement has been effected. I have put the question to officers in all parts of the State, "How large a proportion of the white people are willing to treat the negroes with fairness?" The answer is, "From three-fourths to four-fifths." The other fourth or fifth would oppress them or defraud them, if permitted. Perhaps a larger proportion might show a disposition to do this were it not for the restraining presence of a military force. One sitting a few days in one of our offices and listening to complaints from morning till night might suppose that the whole laboring population was unsettled; but such is not the case. The great mass have made their bargains for the coming year, and trains are seen moving from the towns to the farming districts. So generally have the freedmen sought employment and obtained it, that the demands for laborers cannot be easily supplied. If in some instances they leave their employers, it is no more than we should expect, and often it will not be difficult to discover a good reason. By an arrangement with L. P. Olds & Co., land agents, I have an intelligence office in nearly every county.

The expectation that lands would be granted by government, a hope first kindled by rebel politicians in their efforts "to fire the southern heart," and afterward increased by the confiscation act, has now passed away. All officers of this bureau discountenanced such hopes by public addresses and circulars widely scattered; but so fixed had they become before the war closed that it was not easy to eradicate them. When, however, Christmas actually passed, and the year ended without any gifts of the kind, it was admitted that we had told them the truth, and that they had been deceived by the talk of their former masters. So, also, on the other hand, have the idle and conscience-begotten fears of insurrection passed away. The holidays have gone by, and no outbreaks have occurred. All admit that a more quiet and orderly Christmas has never been enjoyed in this region. The history of the world may be challenged for another instance of such good conduct in similar circumstances as the freedmen have thus far maintained.

During the quarter thirty-seven cases of violent assault upon freedmen, or other criminal acts, have been reported to the military authorities for trial or such action as might be deemed proper.

Of these thirty-seven cases the only ones brought to trial, so far as this bureau has information, are those of "Issac and Wiley, freedmen of the town of Salisbury, Rowan county," on the charge of "larceny," of which they were found "not guilty," and discharged. Several cases reported during the previous quarter have been tried, and among them are—

1. Emanuel Baxter, (colored,) "assault with intent to commit rape;" not guilty.
2. John W. Gorman, (white,) "assault and battery;" guilty; fined fifty dollars, and imprisoned thirty days; fine remitted by reviewing officer.
3. Stephen C. Lee, (white,) "murder;" found guilty and sentenced to be hung; sentence remitted by reviewing officer on the ground that malice was not proved.
4. Joseph Corpening, (white,) "assault with intent to kill;" found guilty of "shooting with intent to maim;" sentence, five hundred dollars fine, and ninety days' imprisonment.
5. George A. Pitts, J. A. Propst, William Ristler, Alfred Sitaker, Thomas Williford, Gibson Kline and Dwight Russel, (white,) "riot and assault and battery;" Pitts, Propst, Ristler, Sitaker and Williford found guilty, fined and imprisoned; Kline and Russel acquitted.
6. Shock, (colored,) "rape on colored girl; finding, guilty; sentenced to be hung; sentence mitigated to one year's hard labor.
7. Monroe Davis, (white,) "riot and assault and battery;" guilty, and imprisoned four months.
8. Privates Bloom, Shannon and Lewis, 129th Indiana volunteers, "assault upon freedmen, &c.;" guilty, and sentenced to a loss of six months' pay.
9. Henry Brown, (colored,) "theft;" guilty and imprisoned two months.
10. Guion Earp, (white,) "maltreatment of freedmen and assault and battery;" guilty; sentenced to hard labor on public works two years.

Some of the cases reported during the last quarter are as follows:

1. Willis P. Moore, charged with the murder of a colored man.
2. Reddick Kearney and others, Pitt county, riot and murder of two freedmen.
3. Magistrates of Brunswick county sentenced two colored men to be sold into servitude for five years. This case was acted upon promptly, by General Crook, and the freedmen released.

Contrary to my fears, as expressed in a former report, there is no increase of dependents as winter advances. The rations issued have steadily diminished.

The demands for clothing have been great; but the supplies now on hand from the quartermaster's department are ample for men and boys. It is more difficult to furnish what is needed by women and children. There are many cases of great destitution among whites, which I should be glad to relieve; but as they are not "loyal refugees," they do not come within my jurisdiction.

While there has been a decrease of dependents, there has been a gratifying increase of schools and of pupils attending them, as will be seen in the admirably prepared report of Mr. F. A. Fiske, superintendent of schools, showing that, though the novelty of the privilege of learning is now gone, the interest of the people in the education of their children has not abated. In some instances planters have established schools for their employes, as a means of promoting good order and contentment. It is also very gratifying to see a few churches organizing Sabbath schools for colored children. The Baptist church in this city, setting a noble example, has already a large freedmen's Sabbath school in successful operation.

By means of the apprenticeship system, comfortable homes have been provided for a large number of orphans and other destitute children. The system is popular, but I am very suspicious of it. The practice of binding out children is dangerous, inasmuch as it fosters the old ideas of compulsory labor and dependence. Still, with proper safeguards it may be useful as a temporary expedient.

Under the direction of Surgeon Hogan, the hospital department is now well organized. His report exhibits fully the sanitary condition of freedmen, and the means used for the relief of the sick.

In the land reports forwarded herewith will be found a complete list of all farms and town lots restored with their estimated value, and another list of those remaining in the possession of the bureau. The lands remaining are of but little value, and will afford but small revenue. But the balance in the treasury will pay current expenses, until it shall be determined by Congress whether the bureau is to be continued or not; and if so, by what means it shall live.

For convenience of reference I present the principal facts gathered from the reports of staff officers and superintendents of districts in the following tabular form:

Very respectfully,

Major General O. O. HOWARD,
Commissioner.

E. WHITTLESEY,
Colonel and Assistant Commissioner.

Subsequently the witness handed in the following, which was also ordered to be annexed to his testimony:

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

SIR: Since giving my testimony before the Reconstruction Committee I have read the New York Tribune of this date, and have taken from its correspondence the enclosed items. I do not know the writers of all the articles, but the views presented are in the main just. I take the liberty of sending them to you, and request that they accompany my testimony.

Very respectfully,

E. WHITTLESEY,
Colonel and Ass't Com'r for North Carolina.

Hon. Mr. HOWARD, United States Senate.

[From the New York Tribune, February 3, 1866.]

NORTH CAROLINA.

The southern train, by way of Weldon, leaves Petersburg early in the morning. Leaving Petersburg we go directly south. The country for the first twenty miles is rolling, making splendid farm land; but the evidences of destruction are too plainly seen. No fences, buildings partly torn down, others with nothing standing but the chimneys, battered-up locomotives, starved-looking cattle, and the remnants of former camps, are ever present to the eye of the traveller. There are no signs of anything being done to recruit the country.

GASTON.

We arrived at Gaston, North Carolina, about 1 p. m. Here we had to get out of the cars and cross the Roanoke river in batteaux worked by negroes. The river is about the width of the Harlem, and we were not long crossing. On the south side of the river we took the Raleigh and Gaston train for Weldon, arriving at the latter place about half-past 2 o'clock. Here we changed cars again, but had to wait two hours before the train started. This gave me time to get dinner and to look around. I find the further south I get the worse are the hotels. In Richmond and Petersburg the oysters are as plentiful at breakfast, dinner, and supper as hash in an East Broadway boarding-house. All along the way to this point I learn it is almost impossible to obtain any kind of meat excepting bacon and chickens. It is singular, too, because the country along the Neuse and Roanoke rivers abounds in game. The rivers, too, have oysters and fish. I cannot see any reason for this paucity of meats, excepting that the negro has something to do with it; he seems to be the cause of everything.

ASPECTS OF THE COUNTRY.

Weldon and all the southern towns, as far as I have gotten, are of the meanest character. No beauty or taste is shown in the laying out of the streets or the construction of the buildings. Instead of the prettily-painted cottages, with their gardens and outbuildings, which we find in our northern towns, we see frame buildings without paint or ornament, log-huts, and a general look of decay. It is plainly seen what are the effects of slavery. Weldon is a small place, with a house called a hotel, a rum shop, and a grocery store. At 4 o'clock we took the Wilmington train, and arrived in Goldsborough about 10 o'clock p. m.

GOLDSBOROUGH.

Goldsborough is one of the most important towns in the State. It is situated on the Neuse river, and is the junction of four of the principal railroads in the south. The town has a few pleasant dwellings, but has the same southern look of the rest. It has about four thousand inhabitants, a daily newspaper, and a female seminary. It is the headquarters of a sub-district of the Freedmen's Bureau in North Carolina.

Having a letter of introduction, I called on Captain George O. Glavis, who is in charge of the bureau at this point. The captain is from New York, and when I met him I felt like being at home. He has the reputation of being a superb officer. Since I have been here I have had a chance of seeing some of the workings of the great Freedmen's Bureau.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Captain Glavis's district includes the counties of Johnston, Wilson, Wayne, Greene, Sampson, and Lenoir. He has his headquarters at Goldsboro', and visits each county at least once a week. There is no civil law, and he has to act as judge, jury, magistrate, sheriff, and everything else, in these six counties. There is a certain day, called "court day," fixed for each county. Yesterday was court day in Wilson county, and at the captain's invitation I accompanied him. After breakfast the captain, with the assistance of two clerks, began his court. There were about five hundred people, of all colors and classes, waiting for a hearing. They come in, state their cases, and are disposed of in quick order; it taking all day, however, to get through. It is hardly possible to give you a full idea of the nature of the business these people transacted. The negroes generally come to get hired out, or bound out if under age, to make complaint against former masters for wages retained, for rations, and the settlement of all disputes. Rations are rarely given except in very urgent cases; and no negro can make any complaint to the bureau unless he or she has made some contract for support for the ensuing year. This is a good rule, and compels the unwilling and lazy to go to work. Thus, you see, all the stuff about the Freedmen's Bureau being a refuge for indolent negroes is so much falsehood. All contracts for labor are made through the bureau, or else they are not valid in case of a disagreement between the parties. Consequently there are always a large number of planters constantly besieging the bureau for laborers. Yesterday Captain Glavis signed no less than forty contracts between planters and negroes. The contracts are printed in blank, and set forth the duties and requirements of each party. The most important one is that the employer shall do all in his power to promote the establishment of schools for the employe's children. Quite a number of children were bound out also. When a man wants a child bound to him he is rigidly examined by the captain, and must show that he is a citizen of good character, and must promise to treat the child while with him as it should be, and when it becomes free must give it clothing, a Bible, and a sum of money. Most of the complaints yesterday were made by negroes against their former masters for wages. If they have made a contract the captain hears the case and gives the complainant an order to the person complained of, requiring said person to settle with said complainant, or appear on next court-day to show reason for refusal. In case of a non-settlement both parties appear, their evidence is taken, and the captain decides to the best of his ability. Some cases are so complicated, and the parties concerned so unprincipled, that it requires the wits of a Philadelphia lawyer to arrange them. A couple of negroes brought complaint against an old planter, a former master, for wages. Plaintiff was ordered for trial, the case was heard, and it was clearly proven that the negroes were entitled to their wages. The planter, when he found that he had lost the case and would have to pay, presented to the captain a long list of charges for various things obtained from him by the negroes. The list was read over to the negroes, and the latter objected to portions of it. For instance, they were charged for two pairs of pantaloons when they received only one pair; for four pairs of shoes instead of two; for twenty pounds of bacon instead of ten, and a large doctor's bill. The unreconstructed and high-toned planter was sure this bill of charges would balance accounts with the "infernal niggers; but the captain asked him to take off his hat, hold up his right hand, and swear before Almighty God that every item charged was correct. Planter hesitated—he was old and tottering—and commenced to deign to ask his "niggers" if "they were sure it was only one pair instead of two pairs they received," and so on. He wouldn't swear to the list of charges, and the case was dismissed, the planter being ordered to pay the negroes their wages, and also to pay a fine for an attempt to swindle. This is a type of the thousands of cases that come before the bureau. It will give you an idea of the immense amount of work that is to be performed by the persons in charge of the bureaus.

FREEDMEN'S SCHOOLS.

Captain Glavis has a fine school for freedmen in Goldsborough. It has some three hundred day scholars of all ages and of both sexes, employing three white teachers and several colored assistants. There is also a night-school for grown colored people who are compelled to work during the day. It is held three evenings each week, and is always crowded. It is astonishing how eager these negroes are to learn to read and write. Several times during my travels I have noticed the servants at the hotels standing around the lobbies with spelling book in hand and muttering to themselves. What a blessing it is that the poor creatures have, at last, a chance to become enlightened. The building in which the freedmen's school is held is open every evening, excepting school nights, for prayer meetings. I strolled down to one of these meetings the other evening and went in. The room was well crowded with men and women. A negro preacher was delivering a lecture. For a long time I sat and listened to his homely language. Although it was rather amusing to hear his quaint and scarcely proper application of words, yet I felt sad and ashamed that my race should be guilty of so infamous a crime as keeping a people of such qualifications in ignorance and degradation. I felt like skulking out of the place as one ashamed of my color. From what I have seen of the colored man here in the south—and I have made it a point to study him—I feel confident that if our Congress in giving the freedman all the rights and immunities of a citizen, they will place him in a position that every man is entitled to be, and which he will fill with credit. Then he will have a country and a right to its benefits, and it will stimulate him to the elevation of his race from their present state of degradation.

THE FARMING LAND.

As I get further south the country looks better. The land all the way from Petersburg to Goldsborough is said to be the best kind of farming land. Cotton, tobacco, wheat, and corn can be raised in abundance. This point is about the commencement of the cotton district. From here to Charleston, and along the coast, is the turpentine, pitch, and tar country. In every train I met numbers of speculators coming south from the north. Turpentine speculation, people here say, is equal to cotton. The supply will be small this season on account of the scarcity of labor and capital.

NORTHERN CAPITAL WANTED.

I find that the large landholders and planters all through this section of the country are anxious to have northern men come and invest their capital in raising cotton. Most of them, to use a commonplace phrase, are "dead broke," and are compelled either to sell, rent, or lease their lands, or go into partnership with a capitalist in raising a crop of cotton. Speculators are mostly leasing the plantations; few want to buy. Quite a number go into partnership in this style: Capitalist to furnish all the labor, meaning the negroes and their feed, and all the mules and teams; planter to furnish the land, the feed for mules, and the ploughs and farming utensils, and then each receive half the crop. This is considered a very fair bargain.

LABOR.

About the question of labor there is a great deal of doubt. A large number of negroes went into the army, and when discharged, either remained north or went west. This makes negro labor scarce. The poor whites will not work in the cotton-field. Quite a number of the negroes have an enmity against their former masters and will work for none but northern men. The Freedmen's Bureau is doing all it can to correct this labor question. The negro feels safe when he makes a contract through this agency. Some of the bitter planters refuse to have aught to do with the bureau, and are trying the introduction of German emigrants south from New York. Two planters brought one hundred of these Germans on to Weldon on the same train with me. They told me they numbered one hundred and fifty when they left New York, but lost fifty while stopping at the various cities coming south. The planters contracted to give the Germans $140 per year, with quarters and rations. Those who were married, and brought their wives, were to get $120 per year, a house, two pigs to raise, and rations for all. The price paid to negroes varies—$120 per year, with rations and quarters; one-half of the monthly salary paid at the end of each month, and the balance at the end of the year, being the average rate of wages. Female field hands are worth from $60 to $80 per year, with quarters and rations. House hands do not get so much. Some of the old aristocratic planters are acting splendidly toward their former slaves. I know of a case where a rich planter, living within five miles of the town of Wilson, in this State, has divided up a portion of his immense estate of 5,000 acres, and bestowed a certain number of acres to each of his former slaves who are now working for him. They are paid their regular wages besides, for working the planter's farm, and are allowed so much time per week to cultivate their land.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR LABOR.

There are splendid chances here in these sunny regions for the people of the north. There is but one drawback, and that is the state of feeling existing among the inhabitants and northern immigrants. There is a large class in the south which entertains the bitterest kind of feeling against a northerner. This has been evident to me since I left Petersburg. As long as the military were here a northerner felt safe, but since the removal of most of the soldiers (there being only squads here and there in large towns) the complaints to the Freedmen's Bureau of depredations and insults to northern settlers and negroes multiply. Wise Union people are bitter in their denunciations of Gen. Ruger, the commander of this department. They say he is too lenient to former rebels, and fails to protect the Union people in their persons and property. They call him a second Fullerton.

ASSASSINATION IN GOLDSBOROUGH.

Yesterday the citizens in the neighborhood of Goldsborough did a cold-blooded and fiendish deed. It seems that there have been a number of complaints made to Captain Glavis by citizens of Wayne, Green, and Sampson counties of numerous robberies and acts of violence by a band of late rebel soldiers, who are inhabitants of Wayne county. They are said to be headed by one Frank Coley, the son of a rich planter living near Goldsborough. Coley is said to have shot a freedman dead. The evidence against him is very clear, the murdered freedman's own brother swearing to Coley's doing the deed. Captain Glavis determined to cause the arrest of said Coley. Accordingly he detailed as many men as possible to do the work. There are only eight soldiers on duty in the town. These are intended for the whole number of counties. Most of them are kept on duty in Goldsborough in guarding quartermaster's stores. Two men were as many as could be detailed. There lived in the town a young man named Andrew Wilson, who was formerly a Union scout. He was well acquainted with the country and the parties to be arrested. His services were accordingly secured to assist the soldiers. They received their orders and proceeded on their journey. Early Wednesday morning, Wilson and the two soldiers traced one of the gang to a house in the suburbs of Goldsborough, surrounded it, and demanded an entrance. It was refused, and they forced themselves in. They asked for a rebel named Peacock, and were told he was not there. They searched the house, however, and soon found him. He was brought out and recognized by Wilson. They told him he was arrested by authority of the United States. He consented to go along; but, after going a short distance, he tried to disarm Wilson, and, failing in that, he ran back to the house. He was ordered to halt several times, and failing to do so, was shot at and wounded. Wilson and the two soldiers saw it was impossible for them to make any arrests, so they returned. At one point near the town the soldiers separated from Wilson. They had not gone long when a squad of mounted men, composed of Coley's friends, came dashing down the road, and met Wilson at the end of the town. One of the squad asked him for his arms, which he gave up. Some one of the twenty-five unreconstructed then shot him. The first ball entered his chest, and he ran into a store near by. He was pursued and shot several times, and died in a few moments. The man whose store he ran into refused to allow him to remain, but threw him into the street to die. After the murder of Wilson the mounted party gave a yell and rode off. Threats have been made against Captain Glavis's life, and he does not know at what moment he may be shot or his house burned over his head.

This is a bad state of affairs, and General Ruger is surely to blame. If he has troops enough at his command he should send a sufficient number to protect the government's servants; if not, then he should appeal to the President or Secretary of War. This last act of the North Carolina unreconstructed should go to the Reconstruction Committee in Congress.

RANKIN.

I do not know the above correspondent, but, in the main, his views and statements, are correct. His condemnation of General Ruger is hasty and too sweeping. A force has been sent to Goldsborough to arrest the parties named.

E. WHITTLESEY,

Colonel and Assistant Commissioner, North Carolina.

[From the New York Tribune, February 3, 1866.]

NORTH CAROLINA.

Schools of the Association exist at Newbern, Roanoke Island, Elizabeth City, Edenton, Plymouth, Beaufort, Raleigh, Morehead City, Hull's Landing, Wilmington, Oxford and elsewhere.

Mr. Newcombe writes from Elizabeth City :

"No one can realize the earnest manner and eager desire these people exhibit for knowledge, without being an eye-witness of the same. With the children came many of the parents to hear and see. Each day some ten or a dozen would be present, until nearly all had visited the school to see the 'northern teachers;' to watch their movements and take notice of the exercises. I have seen, both in the day and Sabbath school, many—especially of the aged—first laugh, then weep for joy. Poor creatures! what a world has been closed to them, and now, how their minds hunger and thirst to enter it!"

At Newton the white citizens favor the formation of freedmen's schools, and the school-house, which hitherto has been used only for whites, was granted for colored people also.

At Cedar Grove, sixteen miles from Elizabeth City, the freedmen were anxious to have a school. An agent of the association writes :

"A subscription paper was started, headed by one of the poor whites, who has seriously felt the crushing power of slavery. He subscribed $10 and twenty pounds of nails. I learn from Mr. John Overton, a free-born negro who took charge of the paper, that $150 and seventy-five pounds of nails have been subscribed to build a school, and that a part of the lumber for the building is already upon the spot. But all is not sunshine. While a few of his white neighbors are ready and willing to show their sympathy in a practical way, others are violently opposed, threatening his life and the destruction of the building if erected. To give an effect to his threat a house which has been used for many years as a church by the colored people, though built and owned by the whites, was last Tuesday night set on fire and destroyed. Why? Because, at a meeting held the evening previous, a letter couched in words of encouragement, setting forth their right to build school-houses, was read.

"At Edenton the colored people aid the teachers in the payment of their house rent, &c. Some of the whites say that they are willing that the negroes should be taught to read, but, at the same time, they charge them $12 50 for the church building which they formerly granted free."

Two letters from Elizabeth City show that a reactionary disunion spirit has lately manifested itself in eastern North Carolina. We quote :

"ELIZABETH CITY, January 13.

"FRANCIS GEORGE SHAW, Esq. :—* * * You may have noticed in the New York papers the address of Governor Worth to the people of this State, which was issued December 30. It has, by his peculiar construction of the powers vested in him, appointed under the authority of the provisional government, produced a marked change in the manner and action of its 'peace-loving citizens' The governor says: 'Under existing laws it is believed that the powers of all officers appointed under the authority of the provisional government ceased with the discontinuance of that government.' The municipal officers of this town have accepted his construction, and we are now without any civil government. Has the provisional government ceased to exist? * * * I do not propose to discuss these questions; I only raise them to make more forcible what every observer must notice since the publication of this address.

"The swaggering air, the insolent look, the defiant manner and the reckless conduct are more apparent on all sides. All are but the earnest of what may be expected if the rebellious States are to be readmitted without first having the rights and privileges of its newborn freemen properly cared for and secured.

"Acts of violence have occurred here, shameful in the extreme, because wantonly committed without provocation or cause. The perpetrators of these vile acts have been disappointed in the quiet and peaceful deportment of the colored people during the holidays, and it would seem are determined to have trouble.

"The first violent act occurred last Saturday one week ago. A colored man was quietly standing upon the sidewalk, when, without any warning, he was assaulted by a white man, who shamefully bruised his face and head, and otherwise injured him.

"The Sunday night following six men, with faces painted black and coats turned wrong side out, entered several negro dwellings by smashing in the doors, frightening the women and injuring the men. In one instance a woman, who started to alarm her neighbors, was shot at; the ball passing through her clothes, grazed her sides. Her son was beaten and bruised because he had been known to have a pistol.

"Another case is that of Charles Everett, late 2d sergeant in the United States colored troops. Mr. Everett, since his discharge, has lived in this town, a quiet, peaceful citizen, has taken to himself a wife, and attended to his own business. He has had no quarrel nor unpleasant controversy with any one, white or black. Hence his colored neighbors were surprised at the attack upon him, and feel that no one can have any assurance of safety if such an outrage is allowed to be passed over unnoticed. His dwelling was forced open. He was ordered to get up. He came out of his bedroom, when one inquired, 'Is this Sergeant Everett?' He replied, 'Yes.' Then the same man, or one of the others—he is not certain which—lighted a match, that he could make more sure of his aim, and felled him to the floor by striking him over the head with the butt of his gun. He knew nothing more, and lay for some time insensible and nearly dead. It was a severe wound, though the skull was not fractured, as first thought. He is still confined to his house from the effect of it. Mr. Everett recognized, disguised as they were, two or three of his assailants, and reported their names to the proper officers in charge here. Yet no action, as we can learn, has been taken to bring them to justice. Neither Mr. Everett nor his neighbors can divine any cause for this unprovoked and uncalled for attack, only that he has been a faithful soldier in the Union army, and since his return home has been called by his friends and neighbors by the title he bravely won while in the service. * * * * *

"Do these acts indicate that magnanimity of which Colonel Worth so boastingly speaks? 'Being vanquished,' says he in his address, 'we submit as becomes a brave people. The President, as commander-in-chief of the military powers of the nation, magnanimously trusts us. I do not believe there is a citizen of the State who is unworthy of this confidence.'"

Sagacious governor! It requires no great keenness of sight to behold, here in eastern North Carolina at least, that the spirit of secession is as rampant as ever in the hearts of a majority of the people. Instead of reciprocating the magnanimous trust of the President, they take advantage of the governor's loose construction of the law to exemplify their patriotism in abusing "the inferior race" and in acts of insult to any and all who labor to elevate and improve them."

From his next letter of the 20th, we quote these additional facts:

* * * "Last Sunday night the rowdies actually shot a colored man about a mile out from town. After disturbing the people on their return from church, they proceeded to the Camden ferry and called for the boat. The man came, and while crossing the narrow river, was asked: 'Is that William Kinney?' He replied in the affirmative. Pop went a pistol. Some dozen or fifteen shots were fired, and one ball passed through the body near the kidneys. Not much is said about it, and I have not learned whether it is likely to prove fatal or not. What surprises me most is to witness the indifference on the part of the citizens generally. They take no more notice apparently of these outrages and murders than if so many dogs had been bruised and shot at. The persons who commit these acts are seen the next day mingling with the people on the streets and in the shops as though nothing unusual had happened. I could not have believed, without seeing it, that any people who call themselves Christians could exhibit such hardness of heart even for the hard treatment of dumb beasts, much less human creatures. Oh! what has slavery not done? It has perverted the Word of God, and taken away the heart of man to feel for his brother, whose skin is darker than his own.

"Let anything be done to relieve the wants and to better the condition of these poor people, and this chivalric Christian community is all excitement. While quietly pursuing my work, I was yesterday morning somewhat startled to learn that certain persons had called on the late mayor to induce him to convene a public meeting to investigate the truth of the story that a large lot of goods recently landed here for the freedmen were packed up at the hospitals, and were infected with contagious diseases. He who reported this story was the same man of whom I spoke in my letter as having raved like a madman when he saw the goods landed:

"I once had seventeen slaves, but they are gone; $17,000 lost. The — lazy niggers! You had better whip them and send them to work instead of giving them clothing. D—the northern people for sending it and the President for encouraging it! None of you don't know how to manage and treat the niggers. We can teach you that."

The upshot of this rumor was an examination of the goods, which were women's clothing, mainly, and school-books. "The school-books, I believe," adds the writer, "contained the infection dreaded. It is the schools that trouble them."

On the other hand, Miss Remington writes from Plymouth:

"Yesterday we heard something which cheered our hearts and deem worthy of honorable mention. Colonel —, a southern man, whose son was in the rebel army, and held by our forces at Fort Lookout (as prisoner,) sent word to us that he would give $10 for the support of the colored school."

The freedmen at Plymouth have aided the teachers as far as their limited means allow, and have formed a society pledged to defray expenses of rent for two houses—one as a teachers' home and one as a school-room. A teacher thus writes of Plymouth:

"No one who has not been in Plymouth since the war can have any true conception of the manner in which the houses have been destroyed. Scarcely a dozen dwelling-houses here have either becks on the doors or glass in the windows, and every house, except two, bears the marks of shot and shell. Many families who, previous to the war, had luxurious homes, are now living with all the windows boarded up, except perhaps those in one room in which they sit."

With an extract from a recent letter from Roanoke island we will close:

"The destitution is still great. Unless you can send us more for gratuitous distribution soon it will become fearful. The commandant says that those who come here are of that class who are driven by necessity from the homes where they have spent their lives in unrequited servitude, and after gathering the autumn's crops are no longer needed, and it will cost less to drive them out without food and shelter until their services are again needed.

* * * * * These things so stir me at times that I can only cry, 'Lord, help, or we perish!' * * * * * The government still continues its protection, and the troops appear at places where there is any danger of a collision of the races. The time has not yet come to wholly withdraw all military protection."

We should say, Not yet.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Here is a glimpse into life at the little town of Edenton:

"Such a quiet town as it is. No whirr of machinery or rattle of carriages—only the occasional cheery he-ho from a negro's throat to break the stillness. The very trees have a sleepy look as they nod above the silent streets. The town has suffered very little from the war, save in the general stagnation of business, and is in reality very pretty, though the many evidences of carelessness and neglect, the lack of paint, broken windows, and dilapidated fences grate harshly upon our New England ideas of order and thrift.

"The 'chivalry' stand at the corner of the streets in blissful idleness from morning till night. Of the ladies of the town we see very little. They spend the greater portion of their time in listless seclusion, mourning over the hopeless state which has overthrown their pet institution and substituted for the slave mart and its attendant honors our peaceful school for the freedmen.

"Our schools prosper finely. The attendance is excellent, and the progress of the pupils very satisfactory. In my division of fifty pupils, all can read and spell very well, and some study arithmetic. When the school first commenced, a little more than two months ago, they did not know a letter of the alphabet. They are eager to learn, and they go about it with unrivalled perseverance. They carry their beloved books everywhere with them, improving every opportunity of perusing them. On their way to and from school, and at recess, we can see them in little groups, walking and studying, the more advanced kindly assisting those not so fortunate.

"One boy, whom Mr. C—— engaged to cut wood, we discovered, after his work was done, studying his lesson for evening school by the light reflected upon the verandah through the windows of the room where we were taking tea.

"All are not black children whom we number among our band, though all have been slaves. One of my division, a boy of eleven, has fair hair, blue eyes, and Grecian features. Another, a little girl of seven, is as pretty a child as I ever saw. She has a clear complexion, brown eyes, and straight, silky brown hair. Hundreds of admired and idolized children in northern households have not so much beauty of face and manners, or sweetness of disposition, as little Emily Horton.

"I am particularly interested in the evening schools for older persons who cannot attend during the day. It is a pleasant sight—those sturdy young men and women, those of middle age, and those over whose heads many winters have scattered frost—alike bending earnestly over their books, eager to improve the glorious light which has dawned upon their long night of darkness.

"The colored people in this vicinity are very industrious, and their condition is better than in many parts of the south. They, however, have much to endure. The old plantation spirit is by no means extinct. The dethroned lords of the lash cling to the shadow of slavery with a death grasp.

"During a visit which we made in the holidays to the ruined town of Plymouth an incident occurred illustrative of the times. Five of us were exploring a fort in the vicinity of Plymouth. We, the ladies, leaving our friends discussing some point of military architecture, passed around an embankment which hid them from our sight, and came suddenly upon an old negro who was removing for firewood the remnants of the abattis. He touched his hat in the most approved style and stepped aside for us to pass, but we stood still, and Miss M—— began a conversation with him.

"'Well, uncle, how do you enjoy your freedom?' she asked.

"He eyed her suspiciously for a moment; then putting on a look of stupidity and indifference, added:

“‘Ah, missus, I don’ know—don’ know as I is free.’

“‘What!’ we exclaimed in astonishment, ‘don’t know that you are free! What do you mean?’

“‘No, missus,’ he persisted, ‘don’ know nothin’ ‘bout it; nothin’ ‘t all.’

“Just at that moment one of the officials who accompanied us came up. As the negro caught sight of the federal uniform the look of stupidity vanished as if by magic. Off came the old hat in a twinkling, and with a smile beaming all over his dark face, he turned to us exclaiming:

“‘Oh! I know you now. You’s not secesh; you’s friends, an’ I know what I is, too. Yes, missus, I’s a free man, tank God.’

“What do you of the free north think of liberty which may safely be avowed only in the literal shadow of the ‘blue?’”

The writers of the above extracts are teachers and reliable witnesses; though in their accounts of “destitution” they sometimes exaggerate a little.

The case of outrage at Elizabeth City was reported to me, and a small military force was sent there by General Ruger at my request.

E. WHITTLESEY,
Colonel and Assistant Commissioner.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1866.

Homer A. Cooke sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. State whether you hold any official position.

Answer. I was captain and assistant quartermaster in the Union army.

Question. Where did you serve as such, chiefly?

Answer. In North Carolina.

Question. Have you been in North Carolina since the close of hostilities?

Answer. I left North Carolina in December, 1865.

Question. What places did you chiefly visit in North Carolina?

Answer. I have been stationed at Newbern and Roanoke island, and visited, officially or otherwise, Morehead City, Beaufort, Washington, Edenton, Elizabeth City, Plymouth, and various other localities in the eastern section of the State.

Question. Have you been connected with the Freedmen’s Bureau?

Answer. I have had no connexion with the Freedmen’s Bureau except the intercourse naturally resulting from my position.

Question. What is the state of public feeling among the ex-rebels of North Carolina, generally, in relation to the government of the United States?

Answer. So far as my observation extends, I have not observed loyal sentiments among them.

Question. How do they speak of the government of the United States?

Answer. I have found a good many people among the intelligent, educated portion of the community who profess to be Union men, but, when their definition of Unionism is given, they want the Union as it was before the war.

Question. What do they seem to intend by that expression, the “Union as it was?”

Answer. They are rather vague and indefinite in their expressions. I have conversed with a great many of them, and generally they were not original secessionists. They take pains to impress upon you that they were not in favor of secession. They claim that the Constitution guarantees to them their rights, apparently overlooking the changes produced by the war.

Question. Do they speak generally in kind terms of the federal government, or in contemptuous, contumelious terms?

Answer. There are two distinct classes among them. The leading wealthy people, in conversation with officers of the army, do not speak, perhaps, unkindly of the government, but they claim a right to be represented in it. The mass of the people—the uneducated portion—seem to have no ideas whatever in relation to the general government, but simply as regards the State. But there is a very strong feeling of hostility towards northern men.

Question. When northern men come among them for the purpose of settlement or trade, how are they generally treated by the secessionists?

Answer. Very coldly.

Question. Are they received into social intercourse?

Answer. They are not, generally. Social intercourse between northern and southern men, and their families, is very rare.

Question. Are men from the north invited into the best families among the secessionists, or are they overlooked?

Answer. My observation has been almost invariable, that when northern men give any invitations to any party or assembly the southern men are invariably absent; and when southern residents issue invitations northern men are excluded. The same thing is perceptible in their churches.

Question. What are your ideas as to the security of northern men who settle there, in the enjoyment of rights of property and their rights as citizens? Are they as secure as secessionists themselves?

Answer. I should presume that in the larger cities and towns northern men would be secure from any personal violence or violation of law; but outside I would say they were not secure.

Question. Suppose the military forces should be removed entirely from North Carolina?

Answer. I think the northern people would be compelled to go with them or very soon after. They would be driven from the State by the disagreeable circumstances surrounding them.

Question. In such an event would you apprehend violence towards northern men on the part of secessionists?

Answer. I am not able to say to what extent; to a greater or less extent, either by the destruction of their property or by some other means.

Question. You mean to say that there is a general feeling of dislike and distrust towards men from the northern States?

Answer. I do. There is an unwillingness to meet, socially, northern people.

Question. Why is that?

Answer. I suppose it arises from a disinclination to have northern men settle among them; an unwillingness to trade with northern people if they can avoid it.

Question. Have you reason to believe that any considerable portion of the secession element in North Carolina still cherish the hope of southern independence?

Answer. I am not prepared to say that I think they have sufficiently matured their plans to cherish that idea at present; they are mainly absorbed in their situation at this time.

Question. Have you any reason to believe that there are such plans in embryo among them?

Answer. I have never seen in that State, parties whom I would expect to see leaders in any such undertakings, but I have seen many individuals who I have no question would readily follow in making such an attempt.

Question. Have you heard anything said among them in reference to a foreign war between the United States and England or France, or any other foreign power?

Answer. I have heard remarks of that nature, but not from responsible parties; not from educated people, but from the most ignorant portion of the community.

Question. From what you have observed and know of the general feeling among the North Carolinians, what part would they, in your judgment, be likely to take in the event of a foreign war between the United States and any European power?

Answer. I do not think there would be a unanimity of feeling on that subject.

Question. Would any portion of them be likely to join the enemies of the United States in that event?

Answer. It would be very difficult for me to say what parties would do under certain contingencies. I think the sympathies of many of them would be with the enemies of the United States; I have no doubt of that.

Question. Do you hear many of the rebels, those who have taken an active part in the rebellion, express regret for the part they have acted in the war?

Answer. I never heard one. At the time of the congressional elections in November, the sentiment of the people of the State was exhibited as clearly as at any time since the war. No unconditional Union man can be elected to any office whatever. One of the candidates for Congress said that he could not take the test oath if he would, and would not take it if he could, and that it was a disgrace to any man in North Carolina to say that he was able to take it. He was a successful candidate; he was elected.

Question. To what office?

Answer. A representative in Congress.

Question. What was his name?

Answer. I think it was Mr. Turner, but I will not be positive as to the name.

Answer. Do you know what his residence is, or was?

Answer. I cannot state his residence at the present time; I have heard it stated. It was a matter of common report; it was said at a public meeting. I did not hear it myself, but I learned it from various credible sources.

Question. You heard it from gentlemen on whose veracity you would rely?

Answer. I should, sir. I know of but two men who were candidates for Congress at that election who could take the oath; these candidates were in the first and second congressional districts of North Carolina.

Question. Can you give their names?

Answer. One is Mr. William Bond; the other is Mr. Robert F. Lehman, of Newbern. Mr. Lehman received, I think, only about a hundred votes in the district, and these were mainly from the northern people in Newbern.

Question. Do you think that the voters generally in North Carolina look upon actual service in the rebel army as a merit rather than as a demerit?

Answer. Undoubtedly, sir. If it is not regarded as a merit, it certainly has their sympathy and support; it attracts their sympathies and enlists their support.

Question. Among what classes of whites in North Carolina do you find the strongest feeling against the United States—the low and uneducated, or the educated and well-bred?

Answer. I do not know that I can answer that question correctly, because among the educated and refined people they have the art of concealing their sentiments under a courteous manner, so that it is sometimes difficult to ascertain their real sentiments.

Question. What class are the most out-spoken on that subject?

Answer. In answer to that question I would say that there is a great lack of moral courage in the south, and that persons occupying the highest positions in society, socially and otherwise, in conversation with northern men individually, will assent to all their propositions, but when they meet their own people will retract everything they have said: while among the ignorant classes they make no concealment of their feelings. The feeling of the poor classes of the whites seems to be concentrated against northern men without any particular reference to the government.

Question. What is the main ground of that prejudice against the northern men?

Answer. I suppose, sir, it is owing to the teaching they have received before the war; it has been inculcated by public speakers before the war that northern men are hostile to them, encroaching upon their rights.

Question. How do they feel generally in reference to the abolition of slavery?

Answer. I think, sir, they have an unwillingness to converse on that subject; they all admit in so many words that slavery is dead, that it is abolished; and that is about as much as they like to say in regard to it.

Question. What is their treatment generally of the freedmen?

Answer. I should say, in reply to that, that the freedmen are treated much better when they are near where the Union troops are stationed; but, from all the evidence that I can gather, I believe that outside, when there is no army to protect them, they are treated with great cruelty in some cases.

Question. Do you hear of cases of maltreatment of the blacks, such as flogging and other acts of cruelty?

Answer. I have heard of numerous cases. I do not know that I could mention any specific cases at the present time, giving dates and names.

Question. I merely ask whether you have heard of such from what you regard as credible sources.

Answer. I have heard from persons, who I have reasons to believe make correct statements, that in many of the interior counties slaves are held at the present time in a state of servitude as they were previously to the proclamation.

Question. And have you heard of cases of flogging or torture of any description?

Answer. I have heard of different cases of punishment. These particular cases of flogging I should not be so apt to hear of as I would of those of a more violent nature, such as shooting.

Question. Have you heard of cases of shooting freedmen by whites?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Have those cases been frequent or rare?

Answer. The means of communication between military posts and society outside were not uniform, and it was only occasionally that communication could be held. Therefore it would only be an inference; but that inference would be that punishments were frequent, and that the instances of cruelty were numerous.

Question. Do you find among the secessionists of North Carolina a general feeling of kindness and regard for the copperhead party of the north?

Answer. I think there is no doubt on that point. They desire the success of the democratic party, believing that it would yield them what they call their rights.

Question. They have the idea that, if the democratic party should obtain an ascendancy in the government, they, the secessionists, would have their rights?

Answer. Yes, sir. What they mean by rights is the power, I suppose.

Question. And in that case they anticipate that all their slaves would be given back to them, or the value of them?

Answer. I think their ideas on that point are somewhat indefinite, but at the same time there is no doubt that they earnestly desire the success of the democratic party, supposing that it will confer privileges upon them. I think they entertain a vague hope that somehow, not clearly apparent to themselves, slavery will be again established through that agency. I might say that there is a class of men in that State who would be ready to accept the principles of republican government as understood by loyal people at the north, but they have not the courage to acknowledge it before their own people.

Question. Do the secessionists still hold it to be the true doctrine that the United States had no authority to coerce a rebel State?

Answer. I do not know that I have heard that question discussed particularly; but the people there have a way of reaching that matter by simply saying that they owe their allegiance to the State, and that wherever the State goes they must go; the general government is not considered in that connexion.

Question. Do they consider that the question of the right to secede has been settled by the war?

Answer. I do not think they do; I think they regard it in this way: That the war simply settled the question that the north was the strongest. They are free to acknowledge that they were beaten; but I do not think that, generally speaking, they abandon any principle which they have heretofore maintained.

Question. What effect has President Johnson's liberal policy in granting pardons and amnesties to rebels had upon the minds of the secessionists there; has it made them more or less favorable to the government of the United States?

Answer. I can, perhaps, better answer that question by saying that every unconditional Union man of my acquaintance in that State is opposed to that policy.

Question. How do the secessionists feel about it?

Answer. They claim the President as their friend in that matter.

Question. Has this liberal policy made them more or less friendly in their feelings towards the government of the United States; has it made them more respectful to the government, or more contemptuous towards it?

Answer. The fact is certain that the feeling of hostility against the government of the United States is much more intense there than it was six months ago. I do not know that I could state precisely what the cause was. My own opinion would be that at the time of Lee's surrender they were ready to accept of any terms that might have been offered; but that, no rigorous condition having been imposed, they have been led to think that they have a friend in high station.

Question. And they rely on President Johnson more than they do upon Congress; is that the fact?

Answer. Certainly, sir. They are very hostile in their manifestations as regards the majority in Congress.

Question. How do they speak of the majority in the two houses of Congress?

Answer. In terms of deep and malignant hatred.

Question. What are some of the epithets they apply to them, if they apply any?

Answer. They are spoken of as radicals, who would ruin their country if they cannot rule it.

Question. Is that the tone of secession newspapers published in North Carolina?

Answer. I do not know of a newspaper in North Carolina that comes up to the standard of what I should call loyalty to the government.

Question. How do the secessionists regard the efforts to establish schools among the colored people?

Answer. They are not at all pleased, so far as my observations extend; and it has been very difficult to establish schools, excepting where they are directly under the military protection.

Question. Without that protection would it be possible in many localities in North Carolina to keep up a colored school at all?

Answer. I do not think it would.

Question. Would not the secessionists disperse the scholars, drive out the teacher, and tear down the school?

Answer. I think so. I think the school-house would be burned, or the teacher subjected to so much annoyance and insult of every kind that it would be impossible to keep the school without military protection.

Question. Have you given any attention to these colored schools?

Answer. I have. I did so before the organization of the Freedmen's Bureau. I had charge of what was then called the contrabands, before the term freedmen was used. There were some three thousand of them in Newbern, and I had frequent occasion to understand the means pursued for their improvement and education.

Question. Does the negro show an alacrity and desire to acquire education?

Answer. It is very remarkable to what extent it goes in all classes. Their desire for improvement is very remarkable. Their schools are promptly attended, and the progress made by the negro children is very satisfactory, I think, up to a certain point; fully equal to any white children of the same age. After they have reached a certain point I should say that the white children progress more rapidly; I mean when their reasoning faculties begin to be called into exercise.

Question. Do the blacks appear to be willing to make sacrifices of property to acquire education?

Answer. Yes, sir. I can give you an illustration showing the desire for general improvement of that race. When I was at Roanoke island I had under my care about one hundred men employed in the quartermaster's department. One of those men was foreman of carpenters, of whom we had twelve or fifteen employed. He was fully competent to draw plans and construct buildings as well as any white man I ever saw. He was employed by the government at thirty-five dollars a month. I told him that if he desired to leave, as he had a family, I knew that he could get employment elsewhere at higher wages. He said he felt it his duty to remain, in order to instruct others of his race, so that they would be able to obtain a living and an education. As soon as that department was discontinued there he immediately obtained work at three dollars a day, as he could have done a year before. The difference in his pay was substantially a contribution on his part for the benefit of the colored race, for their general improvement by his example and efforts.

Question. Is there any other instance of a striking character which you wish to state illustrating their desire of education ?

Answer. It was customary among nearly all, or many of them at least, (some being of an age greater than myself, forty-six,) at all their leisure hours to have a book. They would sit down at any hour, and with the limited education which they had gathered from their children and others they would endeavor to improve their knowledge of reading. I never had any difficulty among that class of people in obtaining a reasonable amount of labor—a fair day's work for a fair day's wages; and I have had some of them employed under circumstances which were very dangerous to their health and even to their lives.

Question. State whether, in your opinion, they are as willing to work as what are called the low whites of the south.

Answer. When I was in Newbern, in the fall of 1863, there was a good deal of scarcity in the country around, and consequently there were a great many persons coming in, both white and black. Almost invariably I found among the blacks a desire to labor. I had charge of getting logs and wood, and various other branches of the quartermaster's department, and many of the blacks came to me desiring to get work from the government, and I employed them. The whites did not desire to work to so great an extent. These whites were called loyal refugees. Their loyalty consisted in the fact that they had nothing to eat where they were, and came to Newbern to get something to eat.

Question. They came to the United States granary ?

Answer. Yes, sir. They did not remain loyal altogether as long as they were fed. I employed some of those men and the negroes, and, considering the difference of color, I endeavored to place the whites in a position where they would have some advantages; but I found a decided disinclination on their part to labor; and during the time they were employed there was almost constant disagreement between them and the blacks, while there was none between the white northern men and the blacks in my employment.

Question. What is your profession ?

Answer. I am an editor. I have been engaged mainly as publisher and editor of newspapers for the last fifteen or twenty years in Lowell and Lawrence, Massachusetts.

Question. Are you a New England man ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Do you think of any other facts which you deem it of importance to state to the committee ?

Answer. I do not think at this moment of anything that would be of interest.

Question. How do the ex-rebels feel about the payment of the federal war debt? If it was left to them to vote yes or no on the question of paying it, what way would they vote generally ?

Answer. They would vote no, without doubt.

Question. It would not be a very close struggle ?

Answer. It would be about as unanimous as the vote in this district on the question of negro suffrage.

Question. Suppose the question were referred to them whether or not they would pay the rebel war debt, how would they vote there generally, yes or no ?

Answer. I think their vote would be in the affirmative, to pay it; because the mass of voters are under the influence of a few men, and those men are directly interested in the debt, as they hold the bonds.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1866.

Reverend Hope Bain sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. Goldsborough, North Carolina.

Question. How long have you resided there ?

Answer. Eleven years.

Question. What is your profession or occupation ?

Answer. I am a clergyman.

Question. Of what denomination ?

Answer. Universalist.

Question. Were you at Goldsborough during the rebellion ?

Answer. Yes, sir, all the time, aside from my absences on clerical duties.

Question. How do the secessionists in North Carolina, so far as you have seen, feel towards the government of the United States at present ?

Answer. To judge from what I have heard them say, and their acts, I should suppose they did not feel very kindly. That is the conclusion I have arrived at from my daily conversations with them at home and in travelling.

Question. State whether you hear frequent expressions of dislike and contempt towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I cannot say that I have heard anything like contempt further than that, though they consider they were overpowered, they were not subdued.

Question. They mean to say that their opinions are the same as they were before.

Answer. Yes, sir; that is a pretty general thing.

Question. Do you hear any expressions of regret among them at having taken up arms against the government?

Answer. No, sir, no regret.

Question. Is it not, on the contrary, rather a subject of pride and exultation?

Answer. It is the subject of a good deal of pride. I have been placed in a position where I could obtain some knowledge of them. Governor Holden appointed me a justice of the peace, and in addition to that appointment I held the chairmanship of the committee to administer the amnesty oath. In doing so I have necessarily come in contact with a great many of them. I administered the oath in the entire county of Wayne, and I must say, from their conversation and the way they acted, that they did not care much about the oath, although I qualified them with all the solemnity I was capable of. One prominent rebel by the name of Lane, who had been a lieutenant or captain in the rebel army, came to me one day and said, "I want to take that damned nasty oath." "What do you mean?" said I. "Do you not administer an oath?" said he. "Yes, sir," said I. "Then," said he, "I want to take it." I found from his expressions that he was just as much of a rebel as he was before; and at that very time he was a candidate for the office of clerk of the superior court.

Question. An elective office?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And he took the "damned nasty oath"?

Answer. He took the "damned nasty oath," and offered himself as a candidate for clerk of the superior court. He afterwards manifested the same disposition to me. His father, who lives in the city with me, is a prominent man; was prominent in the rebellion; was a tax-gatherer for the entire State, and is a man of great influence.

Question. Did his father take the amnesty oath?

Answer. That I cannot say. It seems to me he was not pardoned at that time. I am satisfied he did not take it from me. They shunned me because I was very particular about the manner in which I administered it. There were others of the committee who were not so particular as I thought they ought to be, and they went to them in preference to me.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the federal debt contracted in the prosecution of the war—are they willing to pay it?

Answer. There is no willfulness expressed on that subject whatever. Their expression is, that they have quite enough of their own debts to pay.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the confederate debt—would they be willing to pay it also?

Answer. I cannot say as to that. They would be very willing that their money should be made good. They regret that they had not a sufficient number of soldiers to enable them to succeed in the rebellion. They said that if they had been able to obtain enough soldiers they would have got their freedom.

Question. Do you know anything about their future plans?

Answer. I do not. They would be sure to keep them from me. There are only three Union men in the town where I live—myself, the postmaster, and an old man of over eighty.

Question. In case of a foreign war between this country and England and France, what would be the course pursued by the secessionists?

Answer. I believe that a majority of them would go with the enemy. Speaking with a prominent man, to whom I administered the oath very reluctantly, he said to me, "In less than five years, sir, you will see a different state of things." I did not feel disposed to say much to him about it, but I administered the oath, and as he took it he said, "I take it now, but I don't take it willingly." He is a man of property. They take the oath so as to be eligible as voters, in order to put down the Unionists. I told Governor Holden, with whom I am intimately acquainted, that I thought he had done wrong in recommending the pardon of many whom he did recommend; but I believed then, as I still believe, that the governor did it in order to secure his election to the governorship. The Union men of Wayne county got together to select men for the magistracy of the county. They could only fix upon eighteen persons whom they could recommend. They sent those eighteen names to Governor Holden; but subsequently there were other lists sent up, increasing the number to thirty eight, while we were sure there could be but eighteen Union men in the whole county. There were eighty-four magistrates nominated in the State by a man who professed to be a Union man, but who proved to be a traitor; and out of those eighty-four magistrates we have only four Union men all told. That is precisely our position.

Question. Could a Union man be elected to an office in North Carolina?

Answer. I think not. No Union man could be elected in Wayne county.

Question. Is your legislature now in session?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What is its particular character?

Answer. I think it is secession. I think a majority of its members are secessionists. We have some good Union men, but they are very few. In the western part of North Carolina there are truer Union men than in the eastern or central part.

Question. Men who have borne arms in the rebel ranks are generally preferred, I suppose, for office.

Answer. Yes, sir. There was a man who, I supposed, was a guerilla, Colonel Kennedy. He ran for the convention and was elected; after that he ran for sheriff of the county and was elected. He is one of the most hostile men, an out-and-out rebel, and does not deny it.

Question. Had he taken the amnesty oath?

Answer. I presume he has, else he could not hold office.

Question. Do you regard Governor Holden as a true Union man?

Answer. I really do not know what to say about that. I leave it in doubt. We are intimately acquainted. I think that Governor Holden would try to do right, but an aged politician, as he is, having a view to office, is easily swayed from the right path.

Question. How do they feel down there about the emancipation of their slaves?

Answer. Very sore. When the President declared emancipation, the professed Union men went over in a body to rebellion.

Question. How are the secessionists disposed to treat the freedmen in North Carolina?

Answer. They were not satisfied at all with the emancipation of their slaves. Necessity, however, drives them into a sort of conciliation. As a general thing the negroes do not like to hire with their former masters. They are willing to hire, but not with them, and I do not blame them for it. I have been assisting, and still am assisting, the Freedmen's Bureau, and I know considerable about them. Negroes come in and hire out for $120 a year, and, not being accustomed to money, they think that a great amount. One gentleman in the neighborhood hired quite a number at that rate, paying them $2 50 a month, and reserving the balance to the end of the year. If they continue to work faithfully, they get the full amount of their pay; if not, the matter is at an end, and they forfeit what is due to them.

Question. Is that a rule of the bureau?

Answer. No, sir; but the bureau has to submit to it, inasmuch as the employer and the negroes make the agreement. We have a very good man in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau there—a Swiss. About fourteen or sixteen miles from Goldsborough there has been a gang of men banded together, one of them being the son of a wealthy man named Cooley. Two negro men came to Raleigh, having two fine horses with them and three at home, their object being to hire a farm from Cooley. They called at his house, but he was not at home. His son told them that he would be home next day, and asked them to stay over Sunday. They remained until Monday morning; but, as Cooley did not come home, the son told them where they could get land, and they started for the place. They had not gone further than about three miles before they were overtaken by young Cooley and two others mounted. They stopped the negroes and wanted them to swap horses, which they did not want to do. Cooley's two companions went on ahead, leaving him in chat with the negroes, when he deliberately shot down one of them while they were riding together. The other got down to see about his brother, when Cooley fired two shots at him, but missed him. The negro then ran into the woods, leaving his dead brother in the road, and leaving the two horses, which he never got back. Three or four weeks ago three soldiers were sent out in company with a man who knew the gang to try and arrest the murderer. They got to Cooley's house between dawn and sunrise, and inquired for him, but they were told he was not there. A man whom they met there made an offer as if he would take the gun from one of the soldiers, when the soldier shot him. They then left the place and retreated to Goldsborough. The three soldiers got in, and the guide got as far as the precincts of the town, when he was shot down dead; I saw his corpse. Some ten or twelve had mounted on horseback and followed them into the town, where they committed the murder. That is the position we are in.

Question. Are these scenes of violence of frequent occurrence in the State?

Answer. No, sir; this took place in the northern part of the county. In the southeast part of the county another occurrence took place, which I will mention. I had induced some officers, when the army was at Goldsborough, to give to negroes some decrepit mules, saying that they could go out in the country and cultivate some uncultivated land. They went out on the land of a Mr. Atkinson and made a good crop. About the time to house it, they had a religious meeting one Sunday evening, when a band of men came to the meeting-house and took from them the coats they had on their backs, which they had got from federal soldiers; then they took their knives and meat and laid, and last of all, they took their mules also. That occurred some two months ago. The Freedmen's Bureau has no soldiers to protect the negroes.

Question. Was any attempt made to arrest and punish these offenders?

Answer. Yes; the agent wrote to the captain of the Home Guard to arrest these men. The captain of the Home Guard sent word that he had his hogs to kill and could not go. Then the lieutenant was called upon, but he could not go. The blacks pursued them until they came to a bridge that was burned over the river, and they could not go any further. Six weeks after that the Freedmen's Bureau had one of the men arrested, and he is under bonds of five thousand dollars to appear for trial. There ought to be a well-mounted company of soldiers kept regularly at such posts. There are some wealthy men in the county who have excellent land which they do not use, and I really think there would be no impropriety in leaving them so much land, and renting out the balance, if not confiscating it, to pay expenses. One of these rebels last year made $14,000 in cotton. This year the negroes will not work for him.

Question. How do they feel in reference to the blacks remaining with them?

Answer. They are for having them sent away—colonizing them somewhere—they do not say where.

Question. Did you know of any combinations or associations among the blacks, having in view any outrages on the property of the whites, last Christmas?

Answer. None, whatever; I heard rumors, but I believe they were without foundation. I have spoken to many negroes about it, and I never believed there was the slightest foundation for suspecting anything of the kind.

Question. You do not suppose that any such plan ever existed?

Answer. No, sir, I don't believe it; but there is great cause to provoke the negroes to insurrection.

Question. Is there any other fact that you wish to mention to the committee?

Answer. I do not know of anything in particular.

Question. What effect has President Johnson's liberality in granting pardons and amnesties had upon the minds of secessionists?

Answer. I think that he has done it for an effect. I was speaking to a prominent man on that subject recently. Said I to him, "You have got your pardon?" Said he, "Yes; President Johnson is as dependent upon us as we are upon him." "In what way?" said I. Said he, "He will be a candidate for the presidency, although he says he will not be, and, doubtless, he wants to make us his friends." But even in that I think he will be foiled. I believe that if Robert E. Lee were pardoned, and were to set up for President, the south would give him ten votes for the one they would give to Mr. Johnson. If Zebulon Vance, the ex-robber governor, was pardoned, and was to run in opposition to Mr. Worth, our present governor, he would get twenty votes for Worth's one. Worth was elected against Holden. I do think that if ever I can see the President myself, I will talk to him about these things. I have got a letter of introduction to him, and, if he will allow me, I will tell him in all kindness what the effect of his liberal policy is. I preached in twenty counties prior to the war, and I have been since notified of the fact that I cannot go there to preach any more. I have asked what the matter was, and have been told, "You have taken sides with the north; you are a sympathizer with them. If you were not with us, you ought to have left the country." My answer has been, "No; I was not dissatisfied with the United States. It was you that were dissatisfied, and you should have left the country." I do believe that of those twenty counties I cannot go into more than one county to preach, and I am not satisfied that I could even go there with safety.

Question. Do you think that North Carolina is fit to be readmitted into the Union?

Answer. No, sir; I do not. In some of the western counties there are a few loyal men.

Question. You do not think there is loyal feeling enough in North Carolina to justify Congress in readmitting her into the Union?

Answer. I do not; I wish I could think so.

Question. If they had another opportunity, do you think they would try to get out of the Union?

Answer. I think so; that is my candid opinion.

Question. And you think that they would even join a foreign government at war with the United States if by doing so they could secure their independence?

Answer. I do think so; and, furthermore, I do not think it safe for the negroes to be there unless some strenuous effort is made for their protection, and for the protection of loyal men. We are classed together. About three weeks ago a mob passed by my house, calling out for the "old gray-headed son of a bitch of a Yankee sympathizer." Some time afterwards they came back, uttering the same evil towards me. I really think they will burn my house yet.

Question. Do you regard your life as safe?

Answer. No, sir. I am not afraid, but I do not think I am safe.

Question. Is such treatment as you have mentioned common to Union men?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1866.

Dexter H. Clapp sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What position have you been recently occupying in the service?

Answer. I was lieutenant colonel of the 38th United States colored troops. I am now lo cated in Pitt county, North Carolina. I have been on duty in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, in charge of twenty counties in the central part of North Carolina. I was on such duty from July 7, 1865, to January 15, 1866.

Question. Of what State are you a native?

Answer. New York.

Question. Have you mingled much with the people of North Carolina since you have been there?

Answer. I have been constantly brought in contact with all classes of people.

Question. How do the secessionists of North Carolina feel towards the government of the United States?

Answer. They have no inclination of opposing the government by open war any further. I think they have no more love for the government than at any time during the rebellion, and only submit to it as a necessity. The more sensible portion of them intend to make the best that they can of it.

Question. Do you hear regrets expressed frequently at the results of the fight?

Answer. I hear, very constantly, evidences of great regret at the result of it among a large portion of the people. There is a great desire to get back fully into the Union. I am well satisfied that it is now the intention, when they get back, to unite with whatever parties at the north they can unite with to repudiate the national debt. That has been settled on and has been brought to my attention.

Question. Did that information come to you from sources entitled to your respect and credence?

Answer. It did, sir. Perhaps I should not say there is a settled arrangement or conspiracy for the purpose, but that it is a sort of common understanding, an expected thing. Some of the most sensible and shrewd men in the State have told me so.

Question. Do they seem to surmise that there is any such party at the north as will consent to a repudiation of the national debt?

Answer. Yes, sir; they expect to succeed in it.

Question. That northern party, I suppose, is what we generally call the democratic party or copperhead party?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How do they feel toward the black republican party of the north?

Answer. They look upon them with the greatest hatred, the greatest ill-will imaginable for one class of men to feel towards another.

Question. Would it be safe for a member of that party from the north to attempt to establish himself in North Carolina and to carry on business there?

Answer. There would be great danger at the present time to a person known as a radical. There would be great danger to any northern man when military protection is withdrawn; still I do not mean to say that I am afraid to remain there.

Question. What effect would it have to withdraw the United States troops and the Freedmen's Bureau from North Carolina?

Answer. I think that all northern men would be in great danger of personal injury, and that the freedmen would be without any protection whatever, and subject to great oppressions and wrongs of all kinds. I think that killing freedmen would be the rule.

Question. How many federal troops are there in the State of North Carolina now?

Answer. Three regiments.

Question. Where are they chiefly stationed?

Answer. I think there are five companies at Raleigh; six men at Goldsborough, simply guarding some government stores; there is a portion of a regiment in what is called the eastern district, at Newbern. There are three regiments altogether in North Carolina.

Question. How are the Union troops treated down there by the secessionists?

Answer. As a general thing they are treated respectfully. The secessionists dare not treat them in any other way. There is a very wholesome fear of the federal soldiers. A lieutenant died at my house a short time ago, who attempted to make an arrest connected with a series of most outrageous murders. I can relate the circumstances if you desire it.

Question. Go on and give the narrative.

Answer. Some eight weeks ago several returned rebel soldiers, from Pitt county, went into the village of Washington and commenced shooting and beating Union men. Several assaults were made, and at least one Union man was publicly whipped in the streets, and some negroes were wounded. One of the party was badly wounded by a person whom they attacked. On their return they met on the public highway a negro. They first castrated him and afterwards murdered him in cold blood. These persons a short time afterwards went into the village of Washington and gave themselves up to the civil authorities and were placed in jail; but they soon escaped by overpowering the jailer. An order was issued by General Paine, commanding the eastern district, to the police of that county to arrest them. This was not done, and no effort whatever was made to arrest them. General Paine then ordered the chief of police, of Pitt county, to be tried by military commission for neglect of duty. General Paine was soon afterwards relieved from command, to be mustered out of the service, by an order emanating, I presume, from the Secretary of War, but not connected with this matter. I think for some weeks no further action was taken in the matter.

Question. Where is General Paine from ?

Answer. From Boston, Massachusetts. Meanwhile this party continued to commit outrages on freedmen and Union men. I know that several negroes were shot by them, and it is reported to me that a large number were shot and otherwise maltreated by them. On the 25th of December the father of one of these parties, an old man named Kearney, was at the store of Church Perkins, in Pactolus, Pitt county, and left about two o'clock to go home. About that time an elderly man answering to the description of that man rode up to a plantation called the Ebon place, where two negro boys, ten and twelve years old, were playing in the yard, no other persons being at the plantation. He ordered them to go before him on the road, threatening them with his double-barrelled gun. He took them a quarter of a mile down the road and then one mile direct into a swamp, and there he shot them, killing one instantly and wounding the other. The one who was wounded soon came back, and with his father and the mother of the one who was killed went to Pactolus and reported the matter to Lieutenant Smith. He went with them and found the body; shortly after that reports were made to the district commander at Newbern that this party was intending to "clean out" (that is the phrase they use) certain northern gentlemen in that vicinity, and a party was sent by Colonel Wheeler, consisting of Lieutenant Kenyon, of the twenty-eighth Michigan, and eight mounted men. They succeeded in arresting all but one of this party, but the prisoners escaped the same night. Two nights after, the soldiers returned to the house of this man, Phil. Kearney, a man of considerable wealth, and, in endeavoring to make the arrest, Lieutenant Kenyon was shot. The gentleman living next to Kearney's refused to admit Kenyon into his house, although he was in a dying condition. He was brought to my room at Pactolus, and after about four days he died. A party of soldiers are now at that place endeavoring to arrest this man.

John Stanly, a nephew of Governor Edward Stanly, of North Carolina, the law officer of the eastern district under the provisional government, told me at the time of these transactions that it would not be safe for any person to express in any public place his disapprobation of these acts; that his life would be immediately the forfeit thereof.

Question. Is Stanly still in office ?

Answer. No, sir; he went out with the provisional government; he would not stay in the country, and has gone to California.

Question. What is your opinion about the danger of any person expressing disapprobation of these atrocities ?

Answer. Personally, I think he exaggerated a little, and yet at that time his remark was correct. I intend to live there, and I intend always to express my opinion; but things here look as if it might be dangerous. I am now living on a cotton plantation at Pactolus.

Question. How many persons do you suppose this gang was composed of ?

Answer. About five. Of the thousand cases of murder, robbery, and maltreatment of freedmen that have come before me, and of the very many cases of similar treatment of Union citizens in North Carolina, I have never yet known a single case in which the local authorities or police or citizens made any attempt or exhibited any inclination to redress any of these wrongs or to protect such persons. The substance of this statement was made by me in correspondence with Governor Holden. That seems to me the worst indication of the state of society there—worse than the fact that these things take place.

Question. Do you suppose that the omission on the part of the authorities to interfere and enforce justice arises from their own fears of the ruffians, or from their sympathies with the ruffianism ?

Answer. I think it comes from both causes; it would not be correct to assign either as a specific cause.

Question. How did Governor Holden demean himself towards such outrages; did he make any efforts as governor of the State to punish them ?

Answer. I know of no such effort that he has made.

Question. Have these scenes been brought to his attention ?

Answer. I cannot say that they have, but he must have known of them.

Question. Have they not been subjects of newspaper comments ?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have known of several instances in which outrages were committed, and in which he exerted his influence with the military authorities to have them passed over. I can specify some particular instance.

Question. Do so.

Answer. A sergeant of the local police, Gulion Earp, of Johnson county, brutally wounded a freedman when in his custody, and while the man's arms were tied, by striking him on the head with his gun, coming up behind his back; the freedman having committed no offence whatever, that was shown.

Question. How is that military police organized; is it constituted under the State laws ?

Answer. No, sir; it is constituted by the military authorities, and it was supposed that the best Union men were selected for the duty. This freedman lay in the hospital, which is under my charge, at the point of death, for several weeks. The sergeant of the police had searched his house previously for stolen meat, but did not find any. The same day he whipped another freedman, having searched his house and found no stolen property there. He whipped him so that from his neck to his hips his back was one mass of gashes, and so that after being untied he sank on the ground and lay there insensible all night, and was found there next morning. While Sergeant Earp was under my charge, and while I was investigating the matter, very many prominent citizens interested themselves to have him entirely discharged, he having been tried by a military commission and sentenced to one month's imprisonment. I was told by General Hardin, commanding the central district of North Carolina, that a large portion of the members of the constitutional convention interposed, first, with General Ruger for his pardon, and then by a petition to the President, to whom the proceedings have all been sent. I do not know whether any action has been taken by the President or not.

Question. Was Earp imprisoned on conviction?

Answer. He was paroled by General Ruger, awaiting the publication of his sentence. He had been imprisoned some six weeks.

Question. Are scenes like these which you have described of frequent occurrence in North Carolina?

Answer. They are, in portions of it, not immediately in the vicinity of military posts, but away from them.

Question. Does a Unionist or a freedman stand much chance for justice in the State courts?

Answer. I think not, emphatically. There is so great a demand for labor in North Carolina that that demand is operating very favorably, indeed, for the protection of the freedmen, and is his only protection, except the military, at the present time. Those counties where there were the greatest number of freedmen find now that they have not near enough black laborers. All who were there have hired out and gone to work. They did this at Christmas time. Before that they objected to hire for another year. I had twenty planters from Edgecombe county, the best cotton county in the State, applying to me for laborers. I could hire out two thousand colored men in one day if I had them. The high price of cotton is the only protection, aside from the military authorities, that I know of for the freedmen. I regard that as a providential protection.

Question. Do the planters appear to be willing to pay freedmen fair wages?

Answer. Portions of them do, and portions of them do not.

Question. Suppose it were left within the power of the people of North Carolina at this time to say whether or not they would reduce the black race again to slavery; would they do so?

Answer. They would, sir.

Question. Do you suppose that there are any persons of consequence in North Carolina who contemplate another secession, or a movement for southern independence?

Answer. I have no reason to think that there are. I think they are thoroughly subdued, as far as fighting is concerned.

Question. In case of a war between the United States and any foreign power, such as England or France, and in case there should happen to be a prospect of securing southern independence, so called, what would be the course that would probably be taken by the secessionists of North Carolina?

Answer. I think the large majority of the secessionists of North Carolina would adopt any course giving them any reasonable hope of obtaining independence, but I think they have no idea of fighting.

Question. For that purpose they would, in your opinion, join the common enemy?

Answer. Yes, sir, I believe a large portion of them would do so if they thought there was any reasonable prospect of success; but I am clear in the idea that they would not fight the north any more. They are entirely satisfied with their experiment.

Question. Go on and relate any other facts that you may know of, illustrating the state of feeling in North Carolina.

Answer. A freedman by the name of Cotton, living at Plattsburg, Chatham county, was assaulted by a white man. He defended himself. A fight ensued which terminated in the freedman's running away to preserve his life. He was arrested by the military police and put into jail, which was the means of saving his life from the mob. He was tried by the provisional justice the same night (Saturday night) about ten o'clock, and sentenced to be publicly whipped at the pillory. The sentence ran in this way: "Give him ten lashes at 10 o'clock; let him wear a barrel-shirt for two hours," (that is, a barrel with one head out and a hole cut into the other head large enough to let a man's head through,) "twenty lashes at 12 o'clock; then to be tied up by the thumbs for two hours, his toes touching the ground only; then nine lashes; then to be tied up by the thumbs for two hours more." The deputy sheriff remonstrated against inflicting the penalty. He was ordered by the provisional justice (Long) to inflict the punishment, and if he refused to do so he should be punished himself. While the justice was writing out the sentence in the court-room, the negro was assaulted by the man with whom he had the difficulty; the white man first snapping a pistol at the freedman, then striking him with it twice on the head, felling him to the ground insensible and in an apparently dying condition. The deputy sheriff removed the colored man to the jail, and states that he went to the justice and remonstrated against inflicting the punishment under those circumstances, stating that he did not expect the freedman to be alive in the morning; and even if he were, he would die under the infliction of the penalty. He states that the justice still insisted upon his inflicting the penalty, which the deputy sheriff did, with the exception, as he states, of letting the negro's feet rest partially on the ground. This penalty was inflicted in violation of the laws of the State of North Carolina, which only allow a man to be whipped on sentence after a trial by a jury—that is, a white man. In this case there was no jury; there was an examination simply by the justice.

Question. Who appointed that blackguard justice?

Answer. Governor Holden.

Question. Were these facts ever brought home to the knowledge of Governor Holden?

Answer. I cannot say that they were.

Question. Is he still in office?

Answer. No, sir; the provisional government has passed. I will state, also, that for two months I was utterly unable to get this justice brought to trial, although every effort in my power was made. The black man lived through the punishment, but I never could find him afterwards. In the lower portions of Johnson county, and in Sampson and Duplin counties, being in the vicinity of the battle of Bentonville, many freedmen had obtained worn-out horses and mules from the army and from the battle-field. These have all been taken away from them, either by midnight robbery or open violence. The military police and local militia have repeatedly, in different sections of the district, disarmed the negroes against all authority and against military orders; members of the military police are often brought up before the military authorities for such offences, but there is such a vast amount of work to be done by the military, that it is impossible to do full justice. In the immediate vicinity of military posts things are in a very good condition. They are a great deal worse in some sections than in others. General Hardin, commanding the district, has been very constant and efficient in his labors to maintain order and to insure justice to all classes.

An old colored woman named Juney, and her daughter, Mary Ann, were whipped by William Barnes, an aged planter in Wilson county, so cruelly, that when they came before the officers of the bureau, their backs, from the neck to the hip, were a mass of gashes. For some four months I endeavored to have this man brought to trial, but was unable to do so on account of the exertions of the prominent citizens of Raleigh and Goldsborough. These are representative instances which illustrate the general state of feeling there.

Question. Do you imagine that it would answer to withdraw the United States troops and the Freedmen's Bureau from North Carolina?

Answer. I do not; I think it would be very disastrous indeed; I think it would crush out the Union sentiment.

Question. And produce a state of anarchy?

Answer. Yes, sir; although I think they would have such a system as they have been used to having. The negroes would be subdued, and also the Union men, and the people would establish a sort of civil government and maintain order after their manner.

WASHINGTON, February 23, 1866.

J. A. Campbell sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. What official position do you hold?

Answer. I am lieutenant colonel and assistant adjutant general of the department of North Carolina.

Question. Are you connected with the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. How long have you been holding that position?

Answer. Ever since the department of North Carolina was organized, which was in the latter part of January, 1865.

Question. At what places have you chiefly spent your time?

Answer. Until the capture of Raleigh, on the 14th of April, I had spent my time between the coast and Raleigh in the field, at Wilmington, Newbern, and in the field. Since the capture of Raleigh I have been stationed in that city.

Question. Have you travelled much about the State since you have been there?

Answer. Not very much; I have been as far as Greensborough at the west. I went up there at the time of the surrender of Johnston's army, to arrange some preliminaries with General Schofield.

Question. How do you find the state of public feeling in North Carolina toward the government of the United States and toward the loyal people? I refer, of course, to the secessionists.

Answer. I think they feel as disloyal to-day as they did in 1861; I think they have no greater love for the government; if anything, their hatred is deeper. They have no feeling of respect for the administrators of the government in all its branches—nothing but a deep-seated hatred among the secessionists. There are loyal men in the western part of the State, most of them; I see that in some of the representatives which they send to the legislature. I have not been further west than Greensborough.

Question. What proportion of the people, in the great body of the State, are loyal—that is, friendly to the government?

Answer. I do not think that there is more than one-fifth of the people loyal, perhaps one-fourth, including the western part.

Question. On what is this opinion of yours founded that they are bitterly hostile to the government of the United States?

Answer. I am brought into contact with the citizens daily from my position. I always see those who have business with the commanding general, and am brought into contact with them and hear their expressions and opinions. I judge also from the tone of some of their newspapers.

Question. What do their leading citizens say about the government? What expressions have you heard, habitually or occasionally, from them, on which you found that opinion? What incidents have come under your observation leading to that belief?

Answer. A member of the present legislature told me one day that the people there would never have the same love for the old government that they had before. I judge it also from the remarks that I have heard from leading men to the effect that they were tired of the Yankees there and wanted to see them out, and from the votes which they gave for their candidates for State offices at the election for governor called by the provisional governor.

Question. When?

Answer. In October last. The candidates for governor were Governor Holden and Mr. Worth. Worth was run by the secession party.

Question. Had he been a rebel?

Answer. He had not been an active rebel; at the commencement of the war he was a Union man. He was treasurer of the State before the secession of the State. He continued to hold his office as treasurer during the time the State was out of the Union, and was appointed by Governor Holden provisional treasurer.

Question. These two were rival candidates for the governorship in October, 1865?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Of what party was Holden the nominee?

Answer. He was the nominee of the Union party, or what they call the Union party there. Holden, however, had been at the commencement of the war a very bitter opponent of the government of the United States; but for the two years preceding the close of the war, he had been an opponent of Jefferson Davis. He was appointed by President Johnson provisional governor, and he appointed Worth as provisional treasurer. Worth was taken up by the secessionists, those who were looked upon by all parties as rebels; while Holden was taken up by the other side. The cry of his newspaper organ (it used to be owned by himself, and I believe it was still kept in his name) was this: "The issue before the people is 'Holden and go into the Union, or Worth and stay out.'" That was the motto of Holden's paper. By these means Holden got many votes from men who would otherwise have given their votes to Worth.

Question. Was that a paper of large circulation?

Answer. Yes; I think it is a paper of pretty large circulation and of considerable influence. It was formerly the democratic organ of the State; Holden was formerly its editor, and it was really the leading paper of the State for a dozen years or more. It was still conducted nominally by his son while he was provisional governor.

Question. Did Worth address the people during the canvass?

Answer. He did.

Question. What was the general tone of his remarks?

Answer. The general tone of his remarks was to the effect that he was as good a Union man as Mr. Holden. I never heard any of his speeches, but I know that that was the general tone of his friends; they all claimed to be Union.

Question. What do they understand by being Union men? What is the general idea attached to it?

Answer. I think that they mean that a Union man is one who is willing to accept the situation that has been forced upon them.

Question. Are they not all willing to accept the situation as forced upon them?

Answer. A great number of them accept it under protest. They would be very willing, if an opportunity occurred, to oppose the government, if they thought there was any chance for them in doing so. I think it could be stated in this way: That there are almost positive that there is no chance for a successful opposition to the government of the United States by arms. If they thought there was a chance, (but they would have to be very certain, because they have had such a lesson already,) if they were very certain of success, I have no doubt that three-fourths of that State would turn against the government.

Question. Suppose we should have a foreign war with England or France, and there should be apparently a prospect of establishing southern independence, so called; what would you anticipate would be the course pursued by the people of North Carolina?

Answer. The answer I have just given you would apply to that in some manner. They have had such a terrible lesson that they would have to be very certain; but in case they were very certain they could unite with a foreign nation, so as to achieve their independence, I think three-fourths of the people would do it.

Question. State whether you have heard remarks of that kind among influential men.

Answer. No, sir; I never heard remarks of that kind. I judge merely from what I see in the newspapers and from the general tone of the people. They would not be apt to make such a remark to me. I have no social intercourse with the people down there.

Question. Have you been in the habit of hearing contemptuous expressions towards the government of the United States among the North Carolinians—expressions of hatred, ill will, and dislike, or towards the loyal people of the north?

Answer. Not so much myself, but they have come to me through other sources.

Question. You have been so informed by others?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. By persons who were truthful?

Answer. Yes, sir; from persons in whom I have every confidence, and whom I know to be truthful. They would not make any remark of that kind in my presence.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the payment of the United States debt contracted in the prosecution of the war—would they repudiate it if they could?

Answer. I can only judge from my general knowledge of the people, and I have no doubt in the world that nineteen-twentieths of the people of that State would repudiate it if they could.

Question. What would they do in regard to the confederate debt contracted in the prosecution of the rebellion—would they assume it and pay it, or would they repudiate that also?

Answer. They would assume and pay that part of it for which they think the State of North Carolina is responsible. The State of North Carolina, I believe, indorsed some of the bonds. The debt is in such a condition that they consider the State of North Carolina responsible for part of it. That part of it they would pay.

Question. What is the general feeling in North Carolina towards the freedmen?

Answer. I think the feeling is hatred more than anything else. It is a vindictive feeling, a determination to wreak upon them vengeance for what they think they have suffered themselves.

Question. State whether you have authentic information of maltreatment of freedmen on the part of whites; and give some instances, whether within your personal knowledge or derived from reliable information.

Answer. I have had official reports made to me of at least two hundred cases of maltreatment of different kinds, more or less, some of them cases of homicide. One man named Ivy was tried before a military commission, sentenced, and a few days since sent to the Auburn penitentiary for ten years for killing a freedman. Another, a woman, Mrs. Ball, was being tried at the time I left Raleigh for the murder of a freedman. I do not know whether it was made out murder or justifiable homicide; but as the case was reported to me it was murder. Another woman, Temperance Mealy, living near Salisbury, I think, shot a slave. She was tried by a military commission, and sentenced to pay a fine of $1,000, which fine I am told was made up for her within two or three days by the citizens of the county.

Question. What county was that?

Answer. I think she lived in Rowan county. It was in that portion of the State, at all events.

Question. Can you state any other instances of maltreatment of the blacks?

Answer. There was a case reported in Pitt county of a man named Carson who murdered a negro. There was also a case reported to me of a man named Cooley who murdered a negro near Goldsborough. Neither of these men has been tried or arrested. We have not been able to arrest them, and, of course, I do not know certainly that they committed these crimes.

Question. How many troops are stationed in North Carolina now?

Answer. Three regiments and one battery of artillery.

Question. What regiments are they?

Answer. The 37th United States colored troops, raised mostly along the coast of North Carolina, the 128th Indiana infantry, the 28th Michigan infantry, and a company of the 3d United States artillery.

Question. At what points are they chiefly stationed?

Answer. They are stationed at the forts at the mouth of Cape Fear river, at Fort Macon, at the mouth of Neuse river, at Morehead City, Wilmington, Newbern, Raleigh, Salisbury, Ashville, Morganton. I believe that there are from one to four or five companies at each of those places.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there are guerilla bands in North Carolina prepared to do mischief or to disturb the peace?

Answer. I do not know that I can state that that is the case. It has been reported to me several times that there were such bands, but in sifting the reports down I could not find that they were organized bands, which went regularly to work; although I have known of persons banding together and taking the law into their own hands. A case occurred at Goldsborough not long since, where a guide went out with two United States soldiers to arrest a man. They could not find the man whom they went to arrest, but they saw another man at his house who, as the guards told me, attempted to run. The guide halted him, told him that they came to arrest him, and shot him immediately. The citizens got after the guide, followed him into the town of Goldsborough, and shot him inside the town. The party consisted of from twenty to thirty citizens.

Question. Did they shoot him by way of avenging the crime which he committed in shooting the man he was in pursuit of?

Answer. Yes, sir. I went to Goldsborough the next day, and the agent of the bureau reported to me that there was an organized band there. I took about twenty men with me and went into the country some ten miles, but I could find no evidence that there was any organized band. I think it was just a party got up on the spur of the moment to kill this guide.

Question. Were the persons who shot the guide arrested and brought to justice?

Answer. I tried to arrest them that day. I arrested two of the men whose names were reported to me. One of them escaped, and the other I could not find anything against. Up to this time the others have not been arrested, but I was assured by a member of the legislature, who lives in that county, that they would be arrested by the civil authorities. I was assured by a committee of citizens at Goldsborough, who came to see me, that if I would promise that the man who shot this guide would not be interfered with by military law they would have him arrested and tried by civil law. I replied to them that I would not promise any such thing; that if he had been arrested by civil law I did not think the military would have interfered, but that we claimed the right to interfere if we chose, anyhow. A few days afterwards a member of the legislature told me that they would have these men arrested and tried by the civil law.

Question. Do you know whether they have been arrested?

Answer. They had not been up to the time I left Raleigh. I left Goldsborough that same evening. I had taken a company of men there with me to make the arrests; but I brought them away because I found that the parties were all gone, and I knew that they would stay away as long as the soldiers were there.

Question. Was the guide a Unionist?

Answer. There were different reports about that.

Question. Was he a native of North Carolina?

Answer. I was told by the citizens of Goldsborough that he was a native of Michigan, a deserter from a Michigan regiment. I was told by some other citizens that he was a native of North Carolina. I really do not know anything about it. The sheriff of the county told me that he had him in jail there for eight months; and I was told by another person, who was a witness in the case of the United States against Gee, the keeper of the Salisbury prison, that that guide was a spy of Gee's in the Salisbury prison. I think, from all the evidence I could find about the guide, that he was an outlaw and had been the terror of the country; and I thought that perhaps that was the reason why the citizens had armed and come out after him.

Question. Was there any excuse for his firing on the man of whom he was in pursuit; was there any justification for it?

Answer. Not the least in the world that I was able to find out. I saw the man myself, and saw his wound. The bullet entered the hip from behind and came out above his left groin.

Question. Was the guide armed?

Answer. He was armed.

Question. Is that allowable?

Answer. It is something we never allow. I do not know where he got his arms.

Question. Did the guard order the guide to fire?

Answer. Oh, no; the guide ordered the guard to fire, but the guard would not do so, and he fired himself. I do not blame the people so much for shooting that guide. The man whom he shot he had never seen before. I speak of that as the only case where it was reported to me there was an organized guerilla band. I went down to find it out, and I was convinced that it was not an organized band. I believe there was another case reported to me from Pitt county, but I know less about that than about this case.

Question. What would be the consequence of a withdrawal of the troops of the United States from North Carolina?

Answer. I think that if the United States troops were withdrawn from North Carolina the property of loyal men and the persons of freedmen would not be safe.

Question. Why not?

Answer. The feeling against them is so vindictive and bitter.

Question. If the great mass of the people of North Carolina had it in their power, would they re-establish the slavery of the black race there, think you?

Answer. I think they would.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the education of the blacks?

Answer. I cannot answer that. I have never heard any remarks made about it particularly.

Question. How do they treat the Union men from the north?

Answer. I think that they would be disposed to take every lawful advantage of them which they could, as long as our troops are there; and after the troops were gone I think they would be disposed to take every unlawful advantage.

Question. Do you think they would be inclined to expel them from their midst?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have no doubt they would be inclined to do that.

Question. Are the rights of Unionists from the north and south safe in the State courts of North Carolina?

Answer. It is a pretty hard thing to say about the courts; but I do not think they would be. If I had any property I would not trust it before the courts there as against a rebel.

Question. What is your opinion as to the effect of that feeling of dislike on the minds of jurors who might be called on to try cases between man and man? Would a Unionist be likely to receive an impartial verdict at the hands of a North Carolina jury?

Answer. I do not think he would.

Question. Have you heard of any complaints on that account since you have been there?

Answer. I do not recollect that I have heard of any complaints in cases of trial by jury. I have heard of several complaints in regard to the action of magistrates as against Union or northern men. I believe that by the laws of North Carolina any man can swear before the clerk of the court that a party indebted to him is attempting to leave the State and to swindle him, and can get a writ for his arrest. There was a case of this kind two days before I left the State. It was claimed that a gentleman from the north had not fulfilled a contract, and owed another party a certain sum. This party went before the clerk of the court and swore out a writ, and had the man arrested. The sheriff brought him up to my house, with his attorney, who stated to me that there was, to his knowledge, nothing against the man except what was already covered in a suit in equity. In default of five thousand dollars bail he would have had to go to jail until the session of the court, next month, I think.

Question. Did he give the bail?

Answer. He could not give the bail.

Question. What did you do?

Answer. I went down to General Ruger, commanding the department, and, on the affidavit of the party who was arrested, the general told me to direct his release by the sheriff, and to place the party in military arrest until such time as the judge (who was absent) should return. The next day there was a case of a similar character against another man, except that there was no suit already covering the case. The sheriff came to me with the man. In default of five thousand dollars bail he would have been taken up into one of the county jails and kept in jail there till November next. All that I did was, by direction of General Ruger, to tell the man that I placed him in military arrest, and to give a paper to the sheriff telling him that he could make that return on his writ, that this man was under military arrest, and that the State of North Carolina being under martial law, he was not liable to arrest by the civil authorities. That is the way the case stood the time I left. I refer to these instances to show what the feeling is, and what justice a northern man can get in the courts there.

Question. Is ex-Governor Holden esteemed to be a loyal man in North Carolina?

Answer. He is to-day looked upon as a supporter of the President.

Question. What effect, in your judgment, has President Johnson's liberal policy in granting pardons and amnesties to the rebels had upon their minds towards the government of the United States? Has it increased their love for it, or has it had an opposite effect?

Answer. I do not think that it has increased in the least their respect and love for the government.

Question. Has it had a tendency to make them more or less defiant and contemptuous to the government?

Answer. It has had a tendency to make them more defiant, I think.

Question. In case the government of the United States was in danger of destruction or overthrow, would they lend it a helping hand?

Answer. I do not believe they would, unless it was done against their will by drafting, &c.

Question. Would they willingly lend it a helping hand?

Answer. No, sir; I do not think they would.

Question. Do they appear to like some other government better than they do that of the United States?

Answer. I have never heard any expression in regard to that. I cannot answer it with certainty.

Question. Is there any party in that State that favors the idea of a monarchy rather than a republic in this country?

Answer. I do not know that there is any large party that favors that idea. I think that number of planters and aristocrats about Raleigh do.

Question. What amount of popularity has Jefferson Davis in the State of North Carolina?

Answer. I think that Davis is not a very popular man in the State.

Question. What faults in his character do they point out?

Answer. The system of nepotism and favoritism which he pursued in the appointment of officers in the army and in the civil government, and the injustice which they thought he did to the State on several occasions, are some of the principal objections to him.

Question. Do you think of anything else that you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. Nothing, except that my observations have been mostly in the central and eastern part of the State. I cannot speak so much for the western part, which I understand is more loyal. I have been speaking of the central and eastern part of the State, and especially about Raleigh, where I have been stationed about a year.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1866.

General Rufus Saxton sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. You were in command in South Carolina?

Answer. I was assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau there.

Question. How long did you occupy that position there?

Answer. I was assistant commissioner from the time of the organization of the bureau in June last until the 15th of January, when I was removed.

Question. Who removed you—the President of the United States?

Answer. I do not know, sir; I was removed by order of Major General Howard, the Commissioner.

Question. Who was appointed in your place?

Answer. General R. K. Scott, of Ohio.

Question. At whose request have you reason to believe you were removed?

Answer. I have reason to believe that I was removed through the influence of the late rebels in South Carolina.

Question. What leading rebels among them do you refer to?

Answer. I cannot answer that question from positive knowledge; I only can give my general impression that I was removed through the influence of William Whaley, Governor Aiken, of South Carolina, and others. Governor Aiken, claiming to be elected the member of Congress from the Charleston district, came to my office and desired me to restore to his possession the lands formerly belonging to him, on the ground that they were not abandoned. He abandoned his lands to cast his fortunes with the confederacy shortly after the arrival of the expeditionary corps, commanded by General Sherman, in 1861. General Sherman, upon his arrival in South Carolina, issued a proclamation promising all persons who should remain quietly in their homes ample protection for life and property. There was nothing to prevent Governor Aiken from casting his fortunes with the Union. I was informed, in addition, by authority which I deem reliable, that Governor Aiken was largely interested in blockade-running, profiting more largely by it than almost any other. I had located a number of freedmen, who had always been loyal, in forty-acre tracts upon these lands in accordance with my orders from Major General Sherman, (Special Field Order No. 15.) For these reasons I declined to return to Governor Aiken the property claimed by him, without positive orders to do so from the War Department. I was, shortly afterwards, and after the visit of the lieutenant general to South Carolina, mustered out of the service and relieved from duty as the State commissioner. I have no positive information upon the subject, but it is my strong belief that it is to the misrepresentations of such men as Governor Aiken, William Whaley, and others who have been disloyal, to the authorities, that I owe my removal. If their statements could have been met by those of the real Union men and of the intelligent freedmen, the case might have been different.

Question. Do you know whether Governor Aiken took any part in the rebellion?

Answer. I have understood that he was engaged in blockade-running, and that he profited largely by that; I can only say this from report. That is the general rumor and impression.

Question. Did this report come to you from such authentic sources as to lead you to believe it?

Answer. It came to me from a gentleman who stated to me that he had seen the dividend on account of stock of those engaged in blockade-running, and that a large share was given to Governor Aiken as one of the stockholders. He told me that he had had this paper in his own possession; he had it not then, but he informed me that he knew where it was. I understood that he had seen it himself.

Question. Was that a truthful man who gave you this information?

Answer. I believe him to be so; he was a minister.

Question. Have you any objection to giving his name?

Answer. No, sir; I refer to Mansfield French, of Charleston.

Question. Can you state whether any report of the fact of his having been engaged in blockade-running was ever made to the government of the United States?

Answer. No, sir; I cannot. I can state that it was generally believed in Charleston by every person whom I heard speak of it.

Question. Did Governor Aiken reside in Charleston during the war?

Answer. He resided in that vicinity, I understood.

Question. Did this reverend gentleman state to you the amount Governor Aiken made by blockade-running?

Answer. No, sir; he did not. He only stated that he had profited much larger than any other person in the firm.

Question. Do you know Governor Orr?

Answer. I do not.

Question. What is the general impression down there about the late election between Governor Orr and Wade Hampton?

Answer. It is the general impression that General Wade Hampton was elected by a considerable majority. I have heard that fact asserted positively.

Question. How did it happen that he was not declared governor?

Answer. It was understood that the votes were thrown out, perhaps as a matter of policy.

Question. Thrown out by whom?

Answer. I cannot say.

Question. Are you able to state who composed the board of canvassers who declared the result of the election?

Answer. I cannot say at present.

Question. Were they officers of the State?

Answer. I cannot say, but I would recommend a full investigation into the election of Governor Orr.

Question. Was or was not that board composed of State officers of South Carolina?

Answer. I do not know how the votes were counted or how the election was conducted.

Question. Is Governor Orr esteemed to be a loyal man in South Carolina?

Answer. I think he is as loyal as the average of South Carolinians.

Question. Describe the kind of loyalty of which that average of South Carolinians, in your opinion, is possessed.

Answer. I believe that Governor Orr belongs to the best class of so-called loyal men in South Carolina. I believe there is a small portion of people in South Carolina who desire earnestly to fulfil their obligations to the United States government. I believe that a large majority, probably nine-tenths, of the people of South Carolina are opposed to the government, and look to their connexion with it as the greatest calamity which could befall South Carolina, and desire a separate organization. I believe that a Union man holding and advocating Union sentiments cannot be elected to any office in the gift of the whites of South Carolina. It is my belief that Governor Orr's great popularity in the State in former days influenced a large vote in his favor; and it is my further conviction that his popularity was weakened by the less prominent part he seemed to have taken during the rebellion. Had he been as active as Wade Hampton, his popularity would have been increased in proportion. I mention this as the indication that there is no real reformation; that, in their own words, they are overpowered, not conquered, and that they regard their treason as a virtue, and loyalty as dishonorable. General Wade Hampton positively declined to be a candidate for the office of governor. Had the white people of South Carolina thought that he would accept, in my opinion his majority would have been far greater than it was.

Question. How are secessionists there in the habit of speaking of the government of the United States; what is their tone and style in speaking of it?

Answer. They speak of it as "your government," or as the "United States government;" I have yet to hear a single one, even though he had taken the oath of allegiance, call it "our" government. They speak of it as the government of a foreign nation. I think their hatred of the Yankee, as they call him, is thoroughly intense.

Question. Have your opportunities been good to learn the state of popular feeling in South Carolina towards the government of the United States?

Answer. They have been peculiarly favorable; I have travelled over portions of the State and have conversed with large numbers of people in my office; I have talked with the freedmen, and I have studied the reports of my agents throughout the State. I think I have had better opportunities of discovering the real state of feeling there than any other person, from my position.

Question. Suppose the United States should be engaged in a war with any other powerful nation, such as England or France, and suppose in the progress of the strife it should become apparent to the South Carolinians that they had a reasonable chance, by connecting themselves with the common enemy, to achieve their independence and shake off the government of the United States; would they or not, in your opinion, do so?

Answer. I believe the feeling would be as unanimous to join that other government against the United States as it was when that State seceded from the Union at first—that is, among the white people.

Question. Does this feeling, in your judgment, more particularly pervade the higher classes, or the middle classes, or the lower classes of the whites, or does it pervade them all?

Answer. I think it pervades throughout. I think there are exceptions to it among the educated, but they are few, and I think that the vast number of the ignorant are still guided by the same counsels which guided them in seceding.

Question. How do the leading politicians in South Carolina feel in regard to a republican government, as you and I understand it; I do not speak of universal suffrage or negro suffrage, but of a democratic republican government, such as is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and such as exists in other States of the Union?

Answer. I think they are opposed to it.

Question. State whether you have heard expressions on the part of persons of standing and consideration in South Carolina, or whether you know from any reliable sources, that such is the feeling.

Answer. That such is their feeling is so apparent to me from all my intercourse with them and from my conversations with them, that I cannot, at present, specify any individual case in which this subject has come up; but it is my belief that it is the burden of nearly all their discussions on government. If I had supposed that my attention would have been called to that subject on this examination, I would have been more particular on this point, and would have been able to furnish many instances corroborative of this view.

Question. Do you think that, to use a common, plain expression, the great masses of the people of South Carolina hate the government of the United States?

Answer. I do, sir.

Question. What is their feeling towards northern men, and particularly those who have been hearty and earnest in the prosecution of the war to put down the rebellion?

Answer. Their feeling is hostile to northern men. As a general thing the United States uniform is more likely to expose a person to insult than to respect; and a man in full rebel gray uniform can go from one end of the State to the other without receiving the slightest disrespect.

Question. How are Union men, whether officers or civilians, treated by the secessionists of South Carolina, socially?

Answer. They are treated with entire neglect, and, so far as my experience goes, with discourtesy. My wife has seldom walked the streets of Charleston without being insulted. I, myself, have seldom passed through the streets without receiving, from man or woman, indignities.

Question. In what form would these indignities be exhibited?

Answer. By contortions of the countenance, making up faces, and perhaps claiming the whole of the sidewalk, and in other ways. I speak in that connexion of women. I have been informed that other officers' wives have been subjected to the same discourtesies by southern women, who represent in more direct and more unmistakable terms the true state of feeling than the men do, from the fact that they are less politic. I believe that if the army was removed, the situation of northern men, if they expressed Union sentiments, would be perilous; they could not remain there. Teachers of colored schools throughout the State give it as their opinion that they would be unable to remain there for a day but for the protection of the United States troops.

Question. And particularly of the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. And particularly of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. What military force has the United States in South Carolina?

Answer. I cannot answer positively. I should say about 5,000 men; perhaps not so many. They have been mustering out lately.

Question. Where are they principally stationed?

Answer. Scattered over different portions of the State. If it were not for the protection afforded by those troops the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau could not remain there.

Question. Do you think they would be driven out by violence?

Answer. Yes, sir; it is my belief they would be assassinated.

Question. What chance do Unionists, especially Unionists from the north, stand for protection and security in the State courts of South Carolina?

Answer. The State courts have been so merged in the military courts that I cannot answer that question positively. It is my opinion they would stand a very poor chance. They have what they call provost courts, composed of citizens and one officer. It has been my habit to require reports of outrages in different parts of the district to be sent to me while I was commissioner, and I have a large pile of them. At the end of the month I have been in the habit of making an abstract of these reports touching on the different cases brought to my attention. These reports will cover but a small portion of what actually happens. Northern men would probably fare just as bad in the courts as the freedmen, and it is my belief that there are large numbers in South Carolina who would consider it no greater crime to kill an agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, who claims justice for those committed to his charge, than to kill a negro.

Question. Have you any statement in writing going to illustrate the treatment of the whites toward the freedmen?

Answer. I have briefs of the reports that reached me of many aggravated cases occurring within the several districts. I have the original reports in my possession. (Witness presents the briefs, referred to and which are annexed to his testimony.)

Question. How do the whites in South Carolina feel about the education of the freedmen?

Answer. I believe it to be the desire of a large majority of the white people that they shall not be educated. Some intelligent planters, however, have assured me that they would not oppose the education of the freedmen.

Question. Do they generally appear to want the black people to remain among them?

Answer. If they could manage them in their way they desire them to remain.

Question. How do you think they will manage them if the federal troops are withdrawn, and the Freedmen's Bureau is withdrawn?

Answer. I think it will be the purpose of their former masters to reduce them as near to a condition of slaves as it will be possible to do; that they would deprive them by severe legislation of most of the rights of freedmen. I think that the black codes that have passed the legislature of the State are a sufficient indication of the truth of what I say, and the most unjust contracts which they try to force upon the freedmen, and which they ask the aid of the military authorities to enforce.

Question. If the State should have its own way in regard to the freedmen, what, in your judgment, would be the result in the course of time?

Answer. I believe it will lead to insurrection and a war of races, in which the United States troops will be called upon to aid in the extermination of the black race. I think it is the belief of a great majority of the former masters that the freedom of the black race is a failure, and that slavery is his best condition, and that they desire to pursue such a policy as to prove that they are correct in that belief. I can see no hope for the freedmen except through the care of the United States government.

Question. State whether that doctrine is inculcated by persons of condition in South Carolina, from the pulpit, in lectures, discourses or essays, that slavery is the best condition for the black race.

Answer. I believe it is; I have seen it in their papers. I think they go as far in that direction in the pulpit and press as it is possible for them to do without being subjected to the restraint of martial law.

Question. Are you aware that the blacks have arms to any considerable extent in South Carolina?

Answer. I believe that a great many of them have arms, and I know it to be their earnest desire to procure them.

Question. While you were in command there has any request been made to you to disarm the blacks?

Answer. I cannot say that any direct request has been made to me to disarm them; it would not be my duty to disarm them, as I was not the military commander, but I have had men come to my office and complain that the negroes had arms, and I also heard that bands of men called Regulators, consisting of those who were lately in the rebel service, were going around the country disarming negroes. I can further state that they desired me to sanction a form of contract which would deprive the colored men of their arms, which I refused to do. The subject was so important, as I thought, to the welfare of the freedmen that I issued a circular on this subject, which circular not having been approved by the military commander was not published, as I was required by my instructions to get his approval to all my circulars before I issued them. (Witness furnishes copy of circular referred to, which is annexed to his testimony.) I will further add, that I believe it to be the settled purpose of the white people of South Carolina to be armed and thoroughly organized, and to have the whole black population thoroughly disarmed and defenceless; I believe that is the settled policy.

Question. What would be the probable effect of such an effort to disarm the blacks?

Answer. It would subject them to the severest oppression, and leave their condition no better than before they were emancipated, and in many respects worse than it was before.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that they would submit to be disarmed quietly?

Answer. I do not believe that they would, provided the United States troops were withdrawn and the State relieved entirely from the presence of martial law.

Question. Do you think they would resist by violence such an attempt to disarm them?

Answer. They would, provided the United States troops were not present; their respect to the United States government is very great. The whole teachings of the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau have been to them that they must never lift their hands against the United States government, and they have seen the effect of the late rebellion, so that whatever the United States government says they will observe to a very great extent. But if the government protection were withdrawn, and they were left entirely to their former owners, and this attempt to disarm them were carried out, I believe there would be an insurrection.

Question. Have you an apprehension that that state of feeling among the blacks which you have now described generally prevails throughout the cotton, sugar, and rice-growing States?

Answer. So far as I am informed, I believe it does; I believe there is a feeling of a mutual want of confidence between the former owner and the slave. The former owner has no knowledge of the freeman, he does not understand him; his whole teaching as a slave has been to conceal his feelings from his master, and the late master knows less of the negro's character than any other person; he has no faith in the negro's capacity for freedom, no faith in his capacity to take care of himself, and believes that slavery is his best condition. The negro believes that his former master wishes to make him a slave again, and has no confidence in his promises. He desires particularly not to make any contract or to work for his old master, preferring to work for northern men. Northern men can get all the labor they require, with capital; but not so with the former slaveholders; the only way this feeling can be broken down and a mutual confidence restored is to give the negro all his rights, and for the old master to show him that he has given up the idea of making him a slave and is willing to recognize his rights. This, I think, will restore mutual confidence, peace, and harmony, and thus there will be a thorough reconstruction, and not before.

Question. What extent of intelligence did you discover among the freedmen of South Carolina?

Answer. I found many of the leading men very intelligent; I found some men as intelligent as any other men of a different color. Of course the large mass of them is ignorant and degraded. They have all the vices which slavery has entailed upon them.

Question. Have they any knowledge of military drill and discipline?

Answer. Large numbers of them have been in our army, are well drilled and understand the use of arms. I suppose that in South Carolina there are four or five thousand blacks who have been in our army.

Question. Have any of them held military grades?

Answer. They have been sergeants and corporals. There is one instance of a colored man being a surgeon in our army: there are several instances where colored men have been officers; one colored man has been major, another captain, and several have occupied the position of lieutenant.

Question. Do they seem to show an aptitude to acquire a knowledge of military matters?

Answer. I think they do. I think they are the easiest troops to learn military drill that I have had any experience with. They take to it naturally. They have a great idea of time, and, so far as my experience goes, they make good soldiers.

Question. Have you ever seen them engaged in actual operations in the field against the enemy?

Answer. Yes, sir; I have been in battle with them myself.

Question. On more occasions than once?

Answer. I have never sent in a regiment but once. I sent in one regiment on John's island, and they fought as bravely as any regiment I ever saw. Out of 800 men they left 90 on the field. They made separate and distinct charges, and rallied and carried the point.

Question. What force were they fighting?

Answer. They were fighting a battery of rebel artillery and a regiment of infantry—a superior force, I believe. They were ordered to drive the regiment out from behind some temporary works which concealed them, and they succeeded in driving them out. I have the testimony of rebel officers whom they fought against, and they said they fought well. I have known of their fighting bravely in Florida. I sent a regiment under my command into Florida, and the testimony of every one was that they did their duty bravely, thoroughly, and well. They did well in Fort Wagner. I sent a detachment of the 33d regiment in the vicinity of Pocotaligo. They went up for a particular purpose, and one company, under a captain, accomplished the object for which I sent them up. On their return they were pursued by a large body of cavalry—probably a regiment. They took different roads, but one company came down upon this company of colored troops. They fought them, emptied a good many saddles, and drove them back. They brought off the prisoners which they captured and got away themselves. For a small party it was a very creditable fight, and so well did they do their part that, in a flag of truce the next day from the rebels, they told me that they thought we had a thousand negroes there. My entire experience with them in Florida and South Carolina was that they make excellent soldiers, and that was the verdict of every officer with whom I have conversed.

Question. Are they as steady and self-possessed under actual fire as white troops?

Answer. I believe they can be trained to be so with good officers. It very much depends upon the officers. I could discover no difference in their conduct upon the battle-field. I think that as sentinels and for picket duty they are peculiarly adapted. They are better for that than white soldiers on account of the peculiarity of the negro. The negro can see better at night than the white man, and he is peculiarly excellent as a sentinel or out on picket duty, and skirmishing.

Question. Is he as shrewd and cunning as the white man in that kind of service?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think he is, fully.

Question. How do you find the black in regard to truthfulness?

Answer. The vices of slavery have been shared by them and others. Their whole life has been one of concealment, and they had to lie to avoid punishment. I do not consider them any more untruthful than any other people, or any more truthful. I think they share all the vices and all the virtues of our common humanity. Perhaps under the condition of slavery they are not so truthful. But I think they are as truthful as any other people in the same circumstances. I am aware of all their vices and all their faults, but I think they have no more vices or faults than are shared by any other race.

Question. Do they evince a love of education, generally?

Answer. Their desire of learning is intense. They feel that is one of the means by which they are going to be elevated; and they have a particular avidity and desire to learn. All the schools established there by northern benevolence are crowded by children, and the teachers have assured me that their progress is as great as that which they have seen among white people at the north, owing, probably, to their great desire to learn. I have been surprised at the progress of the colored people at the schools.

Question. What is your opinion of the capacity of the negro for sustaining himself; is he industrious and thrifty in a state of freedom?

Answer. I think he shares with other races of men a natural disinclination to work, but in no greater degree. I have employed large numbers of them in the cultivation of cotton for the government, and, by paying them regular wages, I have had no difficulty in inducing them to work, while in slavery the only stimulus to industry was the lash. The stimulus of the free laborer, necessities, will be all that is required to make him industrious and thrifty. Before I was assigned to duty as assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and while in command of a military district in South Carolina, I endeavored to test, as far as was in my power, the industrial, intellectual, and moral capacities and aptitudes of the negro. I established regulations for the cultivation of two or three of the abandoned sea islands in South Carolina, (St. Helena, Ladies', and Port Royal,) and appointed local superintendents to oversee and direct their labors. By the payment of moderate wages, and just and fair dealing with them, I produced for the government over half a million dollars' worth of cotton, besides a large amount of food beyond the needs of the laborers. These island lands were cultivated in this way for two years, 1862 and 1863, under my supervision, and during that time I had about 15,000 colored freedmen of all ages in my charge. About 9,000 of these were engaged on productive labor, which relieved the government of the support of all except newly-arrived refugees from the enemy's lines and old and infirm who had no relations to depend upon. The increase of industry and thrift of the freedmen was illustrated by their conduct in South Carolina before the organization of the Freedmen's Bureau by the decreasing government expenditure for their support. The expense in the department of the south in 1863 was $41,544, but the monthly expense of that year was steadily reduced, until in December it was less than $1,000, and this has always, I believe, been the case since the close of the war. The causes which have led to an interruption of labor since the war are easily explained. Previous to the termination of the war the negroes heard from those in rebellion that it was the purpose of our government to divide up the southern plantations among them, and that was one of the reasons the rebels urged among their own people to excite them to greater activity in the rebellion. Our own acts of Congress, and particularly the one creating the Freedmen's Bureau, which was extensively circulated among them, further strengthened them in this dearest wish of their heart—that they were to have homesteads—and General Sherman's Special Field Order No. 15, which ordered their colonization on forty-acre tracts, and in accordance with which it is estimated some forty thousand were provided with homes. Public meetings were held, and every exertion used by those whose duty it was to execute this order to encourage emigration to the sea islands, and the faith of the government was solemnly pledged to maintain them in possession. The greatest success attended the experiment, and although the planting season was very far advanced before the transportation to carry the colonists to the sea islands could be obtained, and the people were destitute of animals and had but few agricultural implements and the greatest difficulty in procuring seeds, yet they went to work with energy and diligence to clear up the ground run to waste by three years' neglect; and thousands of acres were planted and provisions enough were raised to provide for those who were located in season to plant, besides a large amount of sea-island cotton for market. The seizure of some 540,000 acres of abandoned land, in accordance with the act of Congress and orders from the head of the bureau for the freedmen and refugees, still further strengthened these ignorant people in the conviction that they were to have the lands of their late masters; and, with the other reasons before stated, caused a great unwillingness on the part of the freedmen to make any contracts whatever. But this refusal arises from no desire on their part to avoid labor, but to the causes above stated. All officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau were instructed to correct these impressions among the freedmen that they were to have lands; but so deep-seated a conviction was difficult to eradicate. The entire want of confidence between the freedman and the late master, neither of whom has any faith in the other, the absence of capital on the part of the land-owners to pay for labor, may also be reckoned among the reasons why some of the freedmen do not go willingly to work. They fear that they shall never be paid. For those who can gain their confidence, and from whom they feel sure of receiving their pay, they will labor as faithfully as any other race. To test the question of their forethought and prove that some of the race at least thought of the future, I established in October, 1864, a savings bank for the freedmen of Beaufort district and vicinity. More than $240,000 has been deposited in this bank by the freedmen since its establishment. I consider that the industrial problem has been satisfactorily solved at Port Royal, and that, in common with other races, the negro has industry, prudence, forethought, and ability to calculate results. Many of them have managed plantations for themselves, and shown an industry and sagacity that will compare favorably in their results—making due allowances—with those of white men. There is nothing to fear for the future of the freedmen if the government, which has made them free, protects them, by standing between them and those who sought to destroy this nation and keep them in slavery, until such time as the State laws shall make all men equal in the possession of civil and political rights irrespective of color.

Question. Is there anything further that you wish to state to the committee?

Answer. I desire to append two circulars, which express the principles which governed my administration of the offices of the Freedmen's Bureau in South Carolina, and to add a few of the results of my experience, which may give more force to my testimony. I have aimed to be just to all, irrespective of color or condition; have labored to break down all antagonism, encourage friendly feeling between the freedmen and their former owners, by showing them that their interests were identical; that each should be just to the other and respect all the other's rights. I was fully impressed with the importance of maintaining friendly relations with former masters, and was careful to be just to all parties, and not to exercise any authority not set forth in my instructions. I only asked even-handed justice for those who were committed defenceless to my care, contented oftentimes not even to secure this, always holding out the olive branch. I was not met in the same spirit. The late slaveholders of South Carolina still believe that the loyal black man has no rights that they need respect, and have not been taught that hard lesson for them to learn: that they must treat those they once owned as free men and deal justly with them; that exact justice to all men, of whatever color or condition, is the wisest expediency and the truest policy, and that educated free labor is the most profitable. An experience of nearly four years has convinced me that the only safety for the republic is to give the black man the right of suffrage. With this in his hands there would be little need for any special Freedmen's Bureau. Without it, and left to the oppressive legislation of his late owner, the result would be fearful to contemplate. Another proof that those lately in rebellion have not repented of their treason, is the determination, which almost universally exists, to see that the national debt contracted to save the nation's life shall be repudiated, and it surely will be if they ever should get into power. This one fact is enough to show the hollowness of their professed loyalty. The love of the freedmen of South Carolina for the memory of Abraham Lincoln amounts to worship, and his loyalty and devotion to the Union cannot be questioned. Give the freedman the ballot and he will take care that the vote of South Carolina is always given for the Union, and he will never vote to repudiate the debt which was contracted to save it and to give him his freedom. Nor will he ever permit the debt contracted to destroy the nation and keep him in slavery to be assumed by the United States. There are numerous intelligent leaders among the freedmen, who fully understand the meaning of suffrage—enough of them to guide the more ignorant; and, so far from there being any danger to the peace of the country and to our institutions in giving so many ignorant men the right of suffrage, I believe it to be the only means of avoiding great and imminent dangers.

The following are the briefs of reports referred to in the foregoing testimony, and ordered to be appended thereto:

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA,
October 30, 1865.

ABBEVILLE DISTRICT.

A planter, early in the war, removed all his servants (200 in number) from John's and Edisto islands to his plantation in Abbeville where some ninety (90) have since died. During the past summer—that is, since the re-occupation of the State by the United States government—he has treated them as in former years, having an overseer and two drivers on the plantation to keep the people at work. During that summer the freedmen raised a large crop of corn, wheat, rice, cotton, potatoes, flax, and sorghum, but they received from the planter not even as much as their former rations, and, on the 2d of October, he sent eighty-one (81) of them to Charleston, telling them that they had no share in the crop, but promising to meet them in Charleston, which promise he did not fulfil. They were entirely destitute, and I sent them to John's island, supplying them with rations. Such cases as the above are not uncommon, and similar ones are reported in Anderson and Orangeburg districts. As fast as the crops are harvested, it is feared that many of the planters will pursue the same course.

ANDERSON DISTRICT.

One man was shot and killed in presence of his wife, who begged for his life. Two other men were tied up, cruelly flogged, then shot, (and it is believed killed, as the men have disappeared,) while the wife of one of the men received fifty (50) lashes.

BARNWELL DISTRICT.

Affidavits of colored men have been received in regard to the outrages committed there, which show a terrible state of affairs. On one plantation three colored women were severely whipped, and on another a woman was unmercifully flogged because she refused to leave the place. A woman and her children were taken from her husband, carried to another plantation, and are now kept there against their wills. Four (4) white citizens, with a white soldier, broke into the house of a freedman who was sick, tied his hands behind him and swung him up to a post for an hour or more, then chained him and left him so for more than two days. Another beat a freedman violently over the head with a stick, and, drawing a knife, threatened to stab him if he moved while the white man attempted to tie him. On some of the plantations the freedmen do not get a share of all the produce, the planters withholding the cotton crop on some plea best known to themselves. This latter practice is almost universal throughout the State. A regular pass and patrol system for the restriction and punishment of the freedmen, such as was in vogue during the time of slavery, is reported to exist. One woman was tied up with her clothes over her head, and her naked person whipped so violently as to inflict severe wounds. She was driven from the plantation without any pay for work done, and threatened with death if she informed the authorities of the abuse.

she had received. Two freedmen were whipped by their master, who took them to the commanding officer at Barnwell, who told him "to whip them again, as they had not had half enough." This officer is reported to pay no attention to the complaints of freedmen. With such an officer in power, it is hardly possible to protect them from abuse. Lawlessness on the part of the freedmen must be expected under such circumstances. It is reported that a band of sixty (60) of them are organizing for the purpose of robbery. The leader of it and three (3) men have been captured, and one (1) escaping was shot, and afterwards died of his wounds.

BEAUFORT DISTRICT.

In this district, the board established by orders from headquarters department South Carolina to decide as to whom it is proper to issue rations, compel the personal attendance of all applicants. Much suffering results therefrom, as many maimed, bed-ridden, or infirm cannot come. Two died, near Beaufort, from starvation, the agent having no food to give them. The officer at Beach Branch is reported as assisting the planters in acts of injustice and cruelty to the freedmen. In one case a woman and her children were brutally whipped and driven off the place after the crop was harvested. Two men were tied up four feet from the ground, and left in that position for more than two hours.

CHARLESTON DISTRICT.

The agent reports a general hatred of the freedmen, which, indeed, might be reported of every district in the State. That they are harshly treated while travelling by rail, though they pay their fare, and that their sick are not allowed to travel on the trains. Believes that the colored people will desert the country if the whites continue to act as they have done. One planter, assisted by a United States sergeant and a negro-driver, tied up three men and three women.

COLLETON DISTRICT.

A freedman was shot on one of the plantations, but by whom has not been ascertained. A woman was tied up by the thumbs, and kept so for more than an hour.

DARLINGTON, WILLIAMSBURG, AND MARION DISTRICTS.

The reports show, in general, a better state of affairs than elsewhere. The freedmen are self-supporting, and there is little or no conflict between the two races, though there are individual cases of injustice and dissatisfaction. The officer acting for the bureau believes that many of the negroes could obtain good wages north, and that it would be well for all parties if some of them could receive free transportation to the northern States. Thinks that the freedmen will be persecuted if the military are withdrawn. This is the opinion of all officers of the bureau, and, indeed, of many of the citizens. Many of the planters are not making contracts for the ensuing year, as they are waiting to see what legislation may be made in regard to labor.

EDGEFIELD DISTRICT.

Several affidavits have been received in regard to the cruelties practiced here. One freedman with three children, two male and one female, were stripped naked, tied up, and whipped severely; threats of murder being made if complaint was made to the military. Another man was whipped severely with a stick, and cut over the eye with a knife, and as he ran away to escape from their cruelties was shot at. A woman was severely whipped and carried off to jail, and as she has disappeared, fears are entertained that she has been murdered. Another woman was tied fast to a tree and violently lashed with a buggy trace, receiving one hundred lashes. Two children were severely whipped, and their mother driven off the plantation without any pay for work done.

GEORGETOWN DISTRICT.

It is reported that the planters, with the assistance of the military, compel the freedmen to do work not called for under their contract. On one plantation a freedman was twice beaten severely over the head with a stick and refused rations.

Affairs are, in general, worse in the interior of the State where military force cannot readily reach the plantations. It is difficult to reach the murderers of colored people, as they hide themselves, and are screened by their neighbors.

Names and dates of all the occurrences stated above can be given if desired.

CHARLESTON, S. C., November 21, 1865.

GENERAL: I have the honor to herein submit a brief made up from reports received from the acting sub-assistant commissioners and agents of the bureau in South Carolina during the month of October, 1865. It shows, as far as can be ascertained, the state of affairs in the several districts of the State.

RECONSTRUCTION.

ABBEVILLE DISTRICT.

A planter, early in the war, removed all his servants, two hundred in number, from John's and Edisto islands to his plantation in Abbeville, where some ninety (90) have since died. During the past summer—that is, since the repossession of the State by the United States government—he has treated them as in former years, having an overseer and two drivers on the plantation to keep the people at work. During that summer the freedmen raised a large crop of corn, wheat, rice, cotton, sweet potatoes, flax, and sorghum; but they received from the planter not even as much as their former rations, and on the 2d October he sent eighty-one (81) of them to Charleston, telling them they had no share in the crops, but promising to meet them in Charleston, which promise he did not fulfil. They were entirely destitute, and I sent them to John's island, supplying them with rations. Such cases as the above are not uncommon, and similar ones are reported in Anderson and Orangeburg districts. As fast as the crops are harvested it is feared that many of the planters will pursue the same course.

ANDERSON DISTRICT.

BEAUFORT DISTRICT.

In this district the board established by orders from headquarters, department of South Carolina, to decide as to whom it is proper to issue rations, compel the personal attendance of all applicants, and much suffering results therefrom, as maimed, bedridden, or infirm, cannot come. Two (2) died near Beaufort from starvation, the agent having no food to give them. The officer at Beach Branch is reported as assisting the planters in acts of injustice and cruelty to the freedmen. In one case a woman and her children were brutally whipped and driven off the place after the crop was harvested. Two men were tied up four (4) feet from the ground and left in that condition for more than two (2) hours.

CHARLESTON DISTRICT.

The agent reports a general hatred of the freedmen, which, indeed, might be reported of every district in the State; that they are harshly treated while travelling by rail, though they pay their fare, and that their sick are not allowed to travel on the trains. Believes that the colored people will desert the country if the whites continue to act as they have done. COLLETON DISTRICT.

A freedman was shot on one of the plantations, but by whom has not been ascertained. A woman was tied up by the thumbs and kept so for more than an hour.

DARLINGTON, WILLIAMSBURG, AND MARION DISTRICTS.

The reports show, in general, a better state of affairs than elsewhere. The freedmen are self-supporting, and there is little or no conflict between the two races, though there are individual cases of injustice and dissatisfaction. The officer acting for the bureau believes that many of the negroes could obtain good wages north, and that it would be well for all parties if some of them could receive free transportation to the northern States. EDGEFIELD DISTRICT.

Several affidavits have been received in regard to cruelties practiced here. One freedman with two (2) male and one (1) female children were stripped naked, tied up, and whipped severely, threats of murder being made if complaint was made to the military. Another man was whipped severely with a stick and cut over the eye with a knife, and as he ran away to escape their cruelty was shot at. A woman was severely whipped and carried off to jail, and, as she has disappeared, fears are entertained that she has been murdered. Another woman was tied fast to a tree and violently lashed with a buggy-trace, receiving one hundred (100) blows. Two (2) children were severely whipped and their mother driven off the plantation without any pay for work done.

GEORGETOWN DISTRICT.

It is reported that the planters, with assistance of the military, compel the freedmen to do work not called for under their contract. On one plantation a freedman was twice beaten severely over the head with a stick and refused rations.

Affairs are, in general, worse in the interior of the State, where military force cannot readily reach the plantations. It is difficult to reach the murderers of colored people, as they hide themselves and are screened by their neighbors. Names and dates of all the occurrences stated above can be given if desired.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, December 19, 1865.

ABBEVILLE DISTRICT.

Here a planter worked nearly one hundred (100) hands near Cokesburg, ten (10) of them on the South Carolina railroad for six (6) months, (the planter receiving their wages,) and the remainder on his plantation, raising a crop of corn, wheat, rice, cotton, &c. After the crop was harvested the laborers were brought to Charleston, where, being destitute, they had to be rationed by government. After their arrival in this city the planter distributed fifty dollars ($50) among them. The largest amount any one received was one dollar and twenty-five cents, ($1 25,) and from that down to fifty cents, (50,) some receiving nothing. One peck of dry corn per week was the only ration furnished the farm hands.

BEAUFORT DISTRICT.

It is stated that the superior provost court here is outrageously unjust towards freedmen and northern whites whenever they are opposed by secessionists. That the court being violently secession in sentiment, while allowing negro testimony gives it no weight whatever if white witnesses appear on the other side. A case is reported where a horse in the possession of a freedman was taken from him and given to a late rebel soldier, the cost of court, ten dollars, ($10,) being adjudged against the freedman, although the freedman brought full proof that the horse came into his possession a long time previous to the date given by the soldier as the time he lost him. In another case the defendant lost his horse, and was kept in jail ten (10) days in default of payment of costs, being finally released on the protest of the agent; since the protest of the agent was sufficient to release the defendant it would seem as if the court must have been conscious of injustice done the freedman.

BARNWELL DISTRICT.

Here a grocer is reported as killing a freedman; the murderer has not yet been captured, but his store and property have been taken possession of by the bureau. A soldier is reported as wounding a freedman for resisting him; what cause the soldier had to interfere with the freedman is not stated. Both these cases are being investigated by a board of officers.

The disposition shown by the planters to turn off the freedmen without compensation for their labor, as mentioned in the report for October, still continues. It is thought that troops cannot be withdrawn with safety from this section, and that to preserve peace and order after New Year's day more force will be needed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

BEAUFORT DISTRICT.

A great many freedmen are in the district who have been laboring for planters in the interior of the State, and who have now sent them to the coast, without pay (either in money or provisions) for the summer work. As, under existing orders, the agents cannot help them, universal thieving is already a first consequence of their destitution.

CHARLESTON DISTRICT.

Many difficulties exist here in the way of new contracts being made. The planters say they are desirous to contract, but they do not offer sufficient pay to induce the freedmen to come to terms with them. The planters propose to pay established rates of wages in money or produce (at market rates) according to the number of tasks performed, leaving all disputes which may arise between them to the provost or civil courts.

CHESTERFIELD DISTRICT.

Here the officers of the bureau are principally employed in the distribution of the crops. There are no schools as yet, but there are three about to be established, and soldiers will be detailed as teachers. There are about two hundred (200) white refugees here who need rations.

DARLINGTON, WILLIAMSBURG AND MARION DISTRICTS.

No contracts have yet been made here for the next year, but arrangements for them are being perfected which it is hoped will result favorably. There are no schools as yet, but efforts are being made to procure suitable buildings, and to detail soldiers as teachers.

EDGEFIELD DISTRICT.

Here a woman was threatened with whipping because she did not run fast enough at her work, and her mother deprecating such threats, she (the mother) was severely cut in the face by a heavy blow given with a board, and on the two then leaving the place, they were not allowed to take with them even their personal property. Certain freedmen report that a man was shot down in his own house, and that in many places men have been found lying dead.

GEORGETOWN DISTRICT.

The reports from this district are encouraging both in regard to the present conduct of the employers and employes, and as to fair prospect of satisfactory arrangement being made for the ensuing year. The officer in charge believes that affairs should be trusted to the provost courts rather than to the constant pressure of military or other arbitrary power. There is a marked change among the freedmen in their ideas of the duty they owe to the government, the law, and the decisions of the courts. A portion of the planters favor the system of hiring by the year, paying according to the number of tasks performed, while others are disposed to contract on the basis of division of the crop, one-half to the employer, one-half to the laborers, their half to be divided among them according to the number of tasks respectively performed. The planters are better satisfied with the bureau than heretofore, and many influential parties are favorable to its continuance. Small-pox prevails to some extent, and hospital facilities are of the utmost importance; a hospital is now being established there under the supervision of a surgeon of the bureau. The freedmen are procuring a suitable lot for a school building, and as relating to schools everything is progressing favorably.

HORRY DISTRICT.

The officer having been in the district but a short time, has not made much progress in the affairs of the bureau, but he reports a very favorable state of affairs between the white and freed people.

KERSHAW DISTRICT.

A freedwoman states, that on leaving her late master and employer, she was not allowed to bring away her two (2) children, aged nine (9) and twelve (12,) and that they are now kept there against their own and her will.

ORANGEBURG DISTRICT.

Here a school-house, and small building for the teachers' use, has been built at a cost of three hundred dollars ($300) for material, the labor being done by the soldiers without expense to the government. It is thought that the freedmen will make contracts for the next year. It is thought troops cannot be withdrawn with safety. Garrisons from headquarters of the district are at Aiken, Barnwell, Bamberg, and Branchville.

RICHLAND DISTRICT.

The officer here thinks contracts will be entered into for the ensuing year, and some indeed are already being made. One has been made with Wade Hampton, who takes the freedmen to Mississippi. He gives full hands ten dollars ($10) per month, and three and a half (3½) pounds meat and a peck of meal per week. There is no end to the complaints of brutal treatment and injustice towards the freedmen in the upper country, but they cannot reach such cases without mounted men, of which at present they have but few. There are gangs of bushwhackers in the upper country who rob and beat the colored people numercifully. Two murders have been committed in Laurens district; when the authors of these outrages can be reached, the cases are referred to the provost courts for action. A citizen of Lexington, who murdered a freedman, has been sentenced to imprisonment for life at Albany, New York. The military aid the bureau as much as they can. The health of the freedmen is improving, and crops are being divided promptly. The schools are doing well, pupils regular and punctual in their attendance, neat and clean in their appearance, and manifest great interest in their studies. Schools have been established at Winnsborough.

SUMTER DISTRICT.

As yet no attempts have been made to renew contracts, but the entire attention of the officer has been given to the division of the crops. No schools have been organized, except one small one which a colored man has been teaching. It is thought that the number of dependents will increase at the end of the year, as planters will turn off those who cannot work. This will probably apply in a greater or less degree to the whole State.

WILLIAMSBURG DISTRICT.

A freedman states that, on the 25th of November, he, with eight (8) others were hunted down and caught by sixteen (16) white men, carried to a plantation, kept under guard all night, and the next morning bucked and whipped, some of them nearly to death. After which they were compelled to promise never to divulge the outrage, under penalty of being shot. Others of the party who escaped from their persecutors were shot at. The man who makes the statement received three hundred and seventy (370) lashes, as his back now bears witness, it having been seen by a member of my staff. The stepmother of complainant (an old woman) received three hundred (300) lashes, while others of the party received two hundred (200) and three hundred (300) lashes. It appears that two (2) days previous to the outrage two (2) white men, representing themselves to be "Yankees come to divide the crops among the freedmen," made their appearance in the district. The freedmen, being glad to have their crops divided, treated the men well, and believing them to be friendly descended freely upon their wrongs and sufferings, and expressed themselves ready to die for their deliverers. The white men took their names and several localities, and were thus enabled afterwards to easily trace them out.

The names of the whites are known, and the general commanding the department has been requested to bring them to justice.

The majority of freedmen in the district are unwilling to contract with their former masters, as they intend at the close of the year to seek other employers, and in many cases they still entertain the hope that land will be given them. Those who were in the path of Sherman's army say they were told so by the soldiers. Every endeavor has been made by addresses and circulars to disabuse their minds of this impression, and it is believed that these endeavors are surely though slowly producing their proper effect and causing the freedmen to see the necessity of labor and the desirability of remaining with their present employers, rather than seeking work in unknown and untried localities. Most of the planters are desirous of renewing their contracts, fearing disturbances would otherwise occur at the end of the year; but they are not as conciliatory as they might be towards the freedmen, nor as just as they should be in the rate of wages offered. The colored people, without exception, and many of the whites, desire the troops to remain. The ladies of Williamsburg, hearing that the troops were to be withdrawn, sent a petition to the commanding officer asking that they might be retained.

The freedmen believe that in the absence of United States troops they would have no redress in the case of oppression or outrage by their former masters, and the whites seem to apprehend lawlessness on the part of the freedmen; besides, the whites say, and are undoubtedly right in so saying, that none but United States military officers, or agents of the bureau, have any influence with the freedmen, as the latter have no confidence in those who have been slaveholders. Many cases of violence to freedmen by white residents have occurred in different parts of the State during November, which are not detailed in this report, as the particulars have not been received at this office. General Ames has sent a small garrison to Hamburg district on account of the many outrages committed there. Many people are leaving the interior and making their way to the coast, notwithstanding the many arguments and endeavors made to dissuade them from so doing and to induce them to remain and enter into contracts.

In some parts of the State, militia companies have been organized under the sanction of the provisional governor, and here the whites would like to have the United States troops withdrawn, that the State militia might take all police duties into their own hands. It is perhaps questionable whether the late proceedings of certain of these companies are such as to make

It desirable that these duties should be given up to them, and the freedmen left to their prejudiced management.

The outrages which still continue in the interior show the necessity of some restraining influence.

Wherever the arm of United States military law cannot reach, the whites, being consequently free to act as they choose, are almost sure to abuse the negroes.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 15, 1866.
ANDERSON DISTRICT.

Here, in July last, a planter proposed to his hands that they should sign a contract to work for him during their lifetime; they refusing, the planter drove them away without food or compensation for labor done. Four of them (three men and one woman) went towards Columbia, but before reaching there they were overtaken by two white men, mounted and armed, whom the planter had sent in pursuit. Asking the freedmen where they were going, and being told, they seized them, and taking them to the adjacent woods, tied two of the men by their hands and feet to trees, leaving the third man to hold their horses; the whites then each fired a shot at each of their two victims, killing them instantly; the third escaped by running to and jumping into a creek near by, the whites firing at but not hitting him; they then stripped the woman naked, gave her fifty lashes on the bare back, and compelled her to walk back to the plantation; she was then put to the plough by day, and confined by night for a week, without anything to eat. At this time an officer happened at the place, to whom the woman told her situation. The officer took her and her children to the place where her husband and the other man had been killed, found remnants of the bodies and buried them, then sent the woman and her children to Charleston. On her arrival she gave birth to a dead infant; her sickness preventing her from telling her story until this time. The planter paid the two murderers for their services with twenty yards of cloth, three bushels of rice, two bushels of salt, and a government wagon. The case has been referred to the department commander, with the request that the murderers be brought to justice.

BEAUFORT DISTRICT.

Agent on St. Helena island reports two decisions of provost court. In the first case a freedman was found guilty of ordering the former owner off the place and threatening to shoot him if he did not leave; he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of one hundred dollars and costs, ten dollars. In the second case two white men went to the place they formerly owned; they were charged by the freedmen with threatening their lives unless they left the place; they turned out one man, threatening to shoot him if he came back. Notwithstanding strong evidence against them, they were acquitted, but advised to be more careful in future. The inference is that the color of the parties affected the decision of the court. Large numbers of the old and infirm, utterly destitute, are coming into the district from the upper country.

CHARLESTON DISTRICT.

A freedman reports that his employer beat him violently, and then, being irritated against the freedman because the court decreed seventy-five dollars damages for the assault, refused to give him any portion of the crop. The owner was in the rebel army, and returned to the place some months after the working of the crop had been commenced by the freedman. In another part of the district a young woman big with child was, without any provocation thereto, tied up by the thumbs, and while in that position was brutally kicked by the overseer, the family of the woman being ordered off the place. From another part of the district a planter took his old hands into North Carolina, and after working them nearly all the year, sent them, with little or no compensation, to make their way to their old home as best they might. On another place two of the hands, a man and a woman, were stripped naked and brutally whipped, and another who left on that account was deprived of a horse, his personal property, and refused any share in the crop. In another part a planter had one hundred people on his place, who have made for him a good crop, of which he refused to give them any part, even for their immediate use and support.

COLUMBIA DISTRICT.

The officer reports alarming destitution; numbers of aged and infirm are coming in. There have not been as many complaints as formerly of brutal treatment. He thinks many contracts will be made for 1866, as both planters and freedmen seemed disposed to come to terms, and a better feeling and understanding has arisen between employers and employes. School are flourishing and the number of scholars is increasing.

GEORGETOWN DISTRICT.

Here the number of applicants for support is increasing as the cold weather comes on and the slender crops of the freedmen become exhausted; no more rations are issued, however, than is actually necessary. Every contract made in 1865 has been broken by the freedmen, the crops raised being barely sufficient to keep them from starving.

No contracts have been made for 1866, though the planters generally are anxious to agree to any reasonable terms, and the officers try to induce the freedmen to contract. The idea that they are to receive lands still prevails in the face of orders and verbal explanations to the contrary. The officer thinks that they may contract if they find that they are to receive no lands. Reports that many freedmen are supporting themselves by shooting game, and that stealing is becoming prevalent. States that the whites apprehended an outbreak during the holidays, and that proper precautions were accordingly taken, but that such caution was quite unnecessary, as the freedmen were perfectly quiet. They have no confidence in the planter's word, and the presence of an officer is imperative in every transaction. Small-pox still prevails to a considerable extent.

ORANGEBURG DISTRICT.

All here is very quiet; no disturbances of any kind are reported. Crops are being satisfactorily divided, but are generally very small. Few contracts are being made for 1866. Some freedmen are desirous of contracting, but receive little or no encouragement from the planters. Some planters refuse to contract because they fear orders from the bureau conflicting with State legislation on the subject. They desire, in fact, and are working for, the abolishment of the bureau, as they want to manage the freedmen without its assistance, but it is doubtful whether their management would be a judicious one. The freedmen have no faith in their late masters, but rest it solely in the bureau. Much difficulty and distress is anticipated in consequence of the planters' disposition to drive away the aged and infirm on account of their inability to work. Schools are doing well. Many utterly destitute refugees are in the district.

Besides those causes specified in the report, where freedmen have been driven away by their employers without pay for labor done, a report has been received from one of the agents on the coast, giving a list of seven planters who have thus defrauded their employes out of pay to the amount of seventeen hundred dollars, ($1,700.)

The following are the circulars referred to in the foregoing testimony, and ordered to be appended thereto:

PROPOSED CIRCULAR OF BRIGADIER GENERAL R. SAXTON.

[Circular No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER, BUREAU REFUGEES,
FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS, SOUTH CAROLINA,
Charleston, South Carolina, January 8, 1866.

I. All officers and agents of this bureau are required to see that it is well understood between the planters and freedmen that no deductions of wages are to be made for the following holidays, viz: New Year's, national and State fast days, Fourth of July, national and State thanksgiving days, and Christmas day; nor will the freedmen be required to work on those days, excepting to perform such necessary labor as is required on the Sabbath day.

II. It is reported that in some parts of this State armed parties are, without proper authority, engaged in seizing all fire-arms found in the hands of the freedmen. Such conduct is in plain and direct violation of their personal rights as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." The freedmen of South Carolina have shown by their peaceful and orderly conduct that they can safely be trusted with fire-arms, and they need them to kill game for subsistence, and to protect their crops from destruction by birds and animals.

III. The planter who refuses to make a fair and reasonable contract with the freedmen residing upon his place will not be permitted to remove them from his plantation, unless they should refuse to enter into fair and reasonable contracts with said planters, nor then, only upon application to, or approval by, the proper agent of the Freedmen's Bureau.

IV. In cases where contracts between planters and freedmen prescribe penalties for their non-fulfilment on the part of the freedmen, no other penalties than those designated in the contract can lawfully be inflicted upon the freedmen by the planter. In cases of sickness, where the freedman works for a share of the crop, and no damage results to the crop from such sickness, no deduction must be made from the freedman's share of the crop.

The provisions of this circular will be published to both the planters and the freedmen, and will be strictly enforced throughout the State of South Carolina.

By order of Brevet Major General R. Saxton, assistant commissioner.

Assistant Adjutant General.

CIRCULARS ISSUED BY BRIGADIER GENERAL R. SAXTON.

[Circular No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS ASS'T COMMISSIONER BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN,
AND ABANDONED LANDS, SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA,
Beaufort, S. C., June 10, 1865.

In accordance with Special Orders No. 238, current series, from the War Department, the undersigned hereby assumes control of all matters relating to refugees, freedmen, and abandoned lands, as assistant commissioner of the bureau for the States of South Carolina and Georgia, headquarters at Beaufort, South Carolina, where all communications relating to the Freedmen's Bureau for the above-mentioned States should be addressed.

To this bureau is intrusted the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, the educational, industrial, and other interests of refugees and freedmen, and the location of such as may desire it on homes of forty (40) acres, where, by faithful industry, they can readily achieve an independence. I earnestly solicit the co-operation and aid of the military authorities of the department in this work. The policy which has been pursued on the sea islands of South Carolina and Georgia will be continued, subject to such modifications as may be made from time to time by the head of the bureau at Washington. No such relation as master and slave will be recognized, as every man, woman, and child within these States has been declared "forever free" by President Lincoln's proclamation of January 1, 1863; and all commissioners are required to protect those within their jurisdiction in the enjoyment of their rights. The freedmen should accept with thankful hearts the great boon of liberty which a kind Providence has vouchsafed to them, and by industry and good conduct prove themselves worthy of it, showing to those who have no faith in their capacity that in freedom they can become better men and better citizens. The late masters should heed the teachings of the great struggle through which the nation has passed, and accept the result as the verdict of the Almighty against human slavery.

Adopting the noble creed of our late honored President, "with malice towards none, and charity to all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right," let us strive earnestly to establish peace and good will, and, recognizing the inalienable rights of all men, do what we can to inaugurate for our country a fairer future of happiness and prosperity.

R. SAXTON,
Brevet Major General, Assistant Commissioner.

[Circular No. 2.]

HEADQUARTERS ASS'T COMMISSIONER BUREAU REFUGEES, FREEDMEN,
AND ABANDONED LANDS, SOUTH CAROLINA, GEORGIA, AND FLORIDA,
Beaufort, S. C., August 16, 1865.

To the Freedmen of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida :

In entering upon that portion of my duty which relates to your welfare, I deem it proper to address to you a few words of counsel. By the emancipation proclamation of President Lincoln, the laws of Congress, and the will of God, you have been declared "forever free." At the outset of your new career it is important that you should understand some of the duties and responsibilities of freemen. Your first duty is to go to work at whatever honest labor your hands can find to do, and provide food, clothing, and shelter for your families. Bear in mind that a man who will not work should not be allowed to eat. Labor is ennobling to the character, and, if rightly directed, brings to the laborer all the comforts and luxuries of life. The only argument left to those who would keep you in slavery is, that in freedom you will not work; that the lash is necessary to drive you to the cotton and rice fields; that these fair lands which you have cultivated so many years in slavery will now be left desolate. On the sea islands of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, where your brethren have been free for three years, they have nobly shown how much better they can work in freedom. Over forty thousand are now engaged in cultivating the soil, their children are being educated, and they are self-sustaining, happy, and free. Some are working for wages; others are cultivating the land on shares, giving one-half to the owner.

The agents of the Freedmen's Bureau will aid you in making contracts to work for fair wages for your former masters or others who may desire to hire you, or will locate you on small farms of forty acres, which you can hire at an easy rent, with an opportunity to purchase at low rates any time within three years. These are splendid opportunities. Freedmen, let not a day pass ere you find some work for your hands to do, and do it with all your might. Plough and plant, dig and hoe, cut and gather in the harvest. Let it be seen that where in slavery there was raised a blade of corn or a pound of cotton, in freedom there will be two. Be peaceful and honest. Falsehood and theft should not be found in freedom; they are the vices of slavery. Keep in good faith all your contracts and agreements, remembering always that you are a slave no longer. While guarding carefully your own rights, be as careful not to violate your neighbor's. "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you."

In cases where you feel that you have been wronged, it is neither wise nor expedient to take redress into your own hands, but leave the matter to be settled by three impartial friends of both parties. In cases of difficulty between white men and yourselves, you should appeal to one of the agents of this bureau in your vicinity, who may appoint one referee, the other party one, and you should appoint a third, and the decision of the majority should be considered final. By this easy mode of settling difficulties much trouble may be avoided.

In slavery you only thought of to-day. Having nothing to hope for beyond the present, you did not think of the future, but, like the ox and horse, thought only of the food and work for the day. In freedom you must have an eye to the future, and have a plan and object in life. Decide now what you are to do next year; where you are to plant in the spring, and how much; and in the autumn and winter prepare your land and manure for the early spring planting. After being sure that you have planted sufficient corn and potatoes for food, then put in all the cotton and rice you can, for these are the crops which will pay the best. Bear in mind that cotton is a regal plant, and the more carefully it is cultivated the greater will be the crop. Let the world see ere long the fields of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida white with this important staple cultivated by free labor.

In slavery the domestic relations of man and wife were generally disregarded. Virtue, purity, and honor among men and women were not required or expected. All this must change now that you are free. The domestic altar must be held sacred, and with jealous care must you guard the purity of a wife, a sister, or a daughter, and the betrayer of their honor should be punished, and held up to universal condemnation. You are advised to study, in church and out of it, the rules of the marriage relation issued from these headquarters. Colored men and women, prove by your future lives that you can be virtuous and pure.

No people can be truly great or free without education. Upon the education of your children depends in a great degree the measure of your success as a people. Send your children to school whenever you can. Deny yourselves even the necessaries of life to keep your boys and girls at school, and never allow them to be absent a day or an hour while it is in session.

Your liberty is a great blessing which has been vouchsafed to you, and you should be patient and hopeful. The nation, through this bureau, has taken your cause in hand, and will endeavor to do you ample justice. If you do not obtain all your rights this year, be content with part, and if you act rightly all will come in good time. Try to show, by your good conduct, that you are worthy of all, and whatever may happen let no uneasy spirit stir you up to any act of rebellion against the government. Strive to live down, by your true and loyal conduct, the wicked lie and weak invention of your enemies, that in any event you would rebel against that government and people which have sacrificed so many precious lives and so much treasure in your cause. Could you rise even against those who would oppress you, or against a government which has given you a right to yourselves, your wives, and children, and taken from you the overseer, the slave trader, the auction block, and broken the driver's whip forever? I have no fears on this point, and trust you to show those who have how groundless they are, and that you are willing to leave your cause in the hands of the government. Ever cherish in your hearts the prayerful spirit, the trusting, childlike faith in God's good providence, which has sustained so many of you in your darkest hour.

The assistant commissioners and agents of this bureau will publish this circular to the freedmen throughout these States, and ministers of the Gospel are requested to have it read in all the churches where the freedmen are assembled.

R. SAXTON,
Brevet Major General, Assistant Commissioner.

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1866.

Captain Alexander P. Ketchum sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. You reside at Charleston, South Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir: I have been stationed there since October last.

Question. What position have you occupied there?

Answer. I have been acting assistant adjutant general for General Howard, charged with the restoration of the Sea Island lands, under special instructions.

Question. That has been your principal duty?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How do you find the condition of the secessionists of South Carolina, so far as your observation extends; are they friendly to the United States, or are they hostile?

Answer. To answer the question in one word, I should say they are not friendly to the United States. There are reasoning men among them who are friendly to certain policies, and who profess friendship to the government, but I think this is more for personal reasons than because they have any real friendship for the United States.

Question. Can you give any reason why you have drawn this inference; whether it is from expressions you have heard used, or from the acts which they commit?

Answer. I was stationed at Savannah in February, 1865, on General Saxton's staff, charged with carrying out the order of General Sherman in Georgia. I resided then with a southern family and came in contact with southern gentlemen. As a general rule, even the most intelligent among them looked upon the United States as an aggressive power, and complained bitterly and in unequivocal terms of the position of subjugation to which they said they were reduced. I saw no spirit of friendship manifested towards the government, although there was an expressed willingness to submit to the necessities of the situation. They complained in many cases of the officers charged with carrying out the orders of government, were quite frequent in their expressions of dissatisfaction with the negroes, and were bitterly hostile to the order of General Sherman relative to sea-island lands. Officers of the late rebel army expressed themselves in strong phrases against Union officers, and in some instances insulted them openly. I do not recollect that they used violence in the first instance, but at the hotels they would abuse them, calling them d—d Yankee officers, wearing the d—d uniform of the United States. These insults were on one or two occasions resented, and violence was the result.

Question. Who got the best of it?

Answer. The Union officers.

Question. You considered that right, didn't you?

Answer. Most assuredly I did. They said they had nothing to expect from the United States government. The rebellion was crushed. They at first anticipated the entire confiscation of their lands—expressed that expectation often, in my presence—and it was remarkable that notwithstanding these expectations the people were, comparatively speaking, submissive and prepared to abide the issue. They would sometimes lose control of themselves, and speak in severe language, but in general were quietly submissive to the authority of the government. Afterwards, when a different policy from the one they expected began to appear, on the part of the government—when the amnesty proclamation was published and the lenient or liberal policy of President Johnson announced, I thought I saw a marked change in their demeanor; they were more aristocratic and less inclined to submit to the authority of the government of the United States. On the 4th of July the negro firemen of Savannah desired to parade with their engines, but were forbidden. I was then in charge of Freedmen's Bureau affairs at that city, and asked the superintendent of the fire department why he had forbidden the negroes to parade. He said they wished to practice with their engines, which could not be permitted that day. I assembled some of the firemen and in presence of the superintendent asked them whether that was their purpose. They said it was not, and that they would be satisfied to parade with their engines on the streets. The superintendent then answered that it was too late to make the request; that if it had been presented in due form in time, it might have been granted. I told him there was no reason why it should not be granted now; that this was the first Independence day they had had the opportunity of celebrating since their emancipation, and I thought they should be allowed to parade; that if he refused I should carry the matter before higher authority; I could see no good reason for making an invidious distinction between the black firemen and the white firemen, who had been permitted to parade. I then presented the request officially, and he yielded. The firemen paraded, but a mob of secessionists attacked them, dispersed them, and seized their engine, which they with difficulty obtained again. One of the colored firemen brought action the next day in the provost court, presided over by a United States officer, against a person he named, one of the mob, as he alleged, for assault and battery. He had four witnesses. The judge decided they had no cause of action, and the case was dismissed; but the plaintiff and his four colored witnesses were not allowed to return home, but remanded to jail.

Question. How did that happen?

Answer. It was for a reason unexplained at that time. I was informed that no order was issued, and that the officer directed to keep them in jail did not at first know why they were sent there. I was then out of town. When I returned these men had been tried, convicted of perjury, and sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and to serve six months in prison, this being the severest sentence the court could inflict.

Question. Who was the judge?

Answer. A captain of a Connecticut regiment; he is now out of the service.

Question. Do you remember his name?

Answer. It does not occur to me now. I visited the colored men in jail; they said they had been put there unjustly; that they were not guilty of perjury, but had sworn truly; that if they had made a mistake in the man, which they could not believe, they had, so far as they knew, sworn truly, and had been tried, sentenced, and imprisoned, without a fair hearing. I went to the court, saw the judge, and asked for an explanation; he gave a very unsatisfactory one. I then requested him to furnish me with an attested copy of the record of the proceedings; he did so. I discovered that these men had been tried upon a charge quite different in character from the offence of which they were convicted; they were not charged with perjury, but with malicious prosecution; yet they were convicted of perjury. I discovered from the record that the testimony adduced in court was entirely inadequate for such conviction; that there was really no sufficient testimony touching upon the point in question. I made a statement of the proceedings to the officer in command at Savannah, General Davis; at first he agreed to remit the fine, but allowed the sentence of imprisonment to remain; I submitted to him that, if anything was to be remitted, the entire sentence should be; if they were guilty of perjury to any extent, the sentence was not too heavy; he assented, and ordered their release promptly.

Question. If I understand you, this second suit was brought against the plaintiff and his witnesses for malicious prosecution, and that the provost judge convicted them of perjury?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. The suit for malicious prosecution being for the recovery of damages to the injured party, and the conviction of perjury, which is a public offence, and not a private suit at all?

Answer. Yes, sir. I found they had not even been heard on their own behalf, but were convicted entirely upon the testimony produced in the first case; they desired to introduce further testimony in the second case, but were refused by their own counsel; they had two counsel assigned them by the provost judge—one an ex-rebel judge, and the other a lawyer who had been in the rebel army. These two men, as they said, told them that it would be better for them not to undertake to give any testimony, and thereupon arose in court and said a few words, making a brief appeal to the humanity of the judge to the effect that they hoped their clients would be well and fairly treated. I was entirely satisfied that it was a case of wilful and malicious prosecution upon the part of the white men, and intended to be the commencement of a series of suits against freedmen for the purpose of keeping them out of the courts if possible, and not permitting them to testify against white persons. The case was much talked of, and I have no doubt the action of General Davis in the matter had a good effect.

Question. What has become of the Connecticut captain who acted as provost judge?

Answer. He was mustered out of service very soon afterwards, at the time his regiment was mustered out.

Question. Do you know where he is now?

Answer. He is at his home in Connecticut.

Question. Does his name occur to you now?

Answer. I cannot recollect it.

Question. Was he never called to account for his proceeding?

Answer. He was not. I did not get the order revoking the sentence until just before he was mustered out. Had there been time, I should have felt it my duty as an officer to have preferred charges against him.

Question. How do the people of that section of country feel on the subject of the education of the freedmen?

Answer. There are a few gentlemen of the more intelligent class who say they are in favor of their education and in favor of establishing schools; but these are very few; I have met such in the cities, but not in the country. Indeed, I think the feeling in the rural districts is different from what it is in the cities, particularly Charleston and Savannah. At Augusta there is more bitterness of feeling apparently than in Savannah. I was travelling in a stage between Savannah and Augusta, perhaps three months ago, being unknown to any of the parties present; they were all secessionists, and talked freely; one was a young man of education and ability, and all of them gentlemen of intelligence. This young man talked freely about the Freedmen's Bureau, and the officers of that bureau; he said, as a general thing, they were impracticable men, and not doing the right thing. His plan was this: if a negro was caught in the act of stealing, he should be severely punished; if caught the second time, he should be hung at once, without ceremony. His opinion was indorsed immediately by the several gentlemen present. The general tenor of the conversation convinced me that there was no disposition among those gentlemen, at least, to treat the negro with fairness.

Question. In case of the removal of the federal troops and of the Freedmen's Bureau from South Carolina, what would be the probable condition of the freedmen?

Answer. After very great deliberation upon that subject, I predict that, in that event, an insurrection of the blacks would follow within a very few years.

Question. How would it be brought about?

Answer. The pride of opinion of the South Carolinians is such that, even in face of conviction, the people of the State will not renounce their old opinions; the planters will naturally fall back into the old system of slavery, or as near to it as they can get. The negroes have no confidence in them as a class, and the planters make it a rule, through the public prints and in conversation, to speak against the negro; they admit that he may do well, and that in some cases he does well, but say that generally he is a failure, and not to be trusted. There is a very general lack of confidence between the planter and the freedman. The Freedmen's Bureau has been a great blessing to both, because it has been a mediator between the two classes; it has endeavored to persuade the freedman to trust his employer, assuring him that the bureau would see justice done him; it has urged the master to give up his prejudices and treat the negro fairly, and has called him to account when he has been in fault, so that the negro in many cases—in most cases—goes to work satisfied that the bureau will protect him in case of attempted injustice. The intelligent men among the negroes speak despairingly when the idea of withdrawing the troops and the bureau is broached. A gentleman of South Carolina is very frank upon this subject, but would not express his opinions publicly; he is a liberal-minded man, and knows but two southerners who altogether agree with him: he believes that if the bureau is withdrawn and the military, there will be an insurrection of the blacks within a few years. These thoughts are not expressed publicly, and this is the only person I know of in South Carolina who talks thus frankly. General Sickles the other day showed me letters received from his subordinate officers relative to the counties of Edgefield and Laurens, and two neighboring counties in South Carolina, very near to Columbia. They report that there are organized bands of "regulators"—armed men—who make it their business to traverse these counties, and maltreat negroes without any avowedly definite purpose in view. They treat the negroes, in many instances, in the most horrible and atrocious manner, even to maiming them, cutting their ears off, &c. In one case, two citizens of one of these counties testified against these parties, and were instantly compelled to leave the county, barely escaping with their lives. The citizens are bound in honor, by an understanding or compact among them, not to testify against these regulators; so that it is impossible to get evidence against them unless the negroes give it. The evidence seems complete that these atrocities have been carried on in the counties referred to. We have a military force there, but it is sparsely distributed. General Sickles, on receiving these reports, promptly ordered a force of cavalry and infantry to pursue these men, and take them if possible, dead or alive; if taken alive, they are to be brought to Charleston, where he will have them tried, and, if convicted, immediately executed.

Question. Is he succeeding in catching any of them?

Answer. He had just received the letters and ordered out the troops as I left Charleston.

Question. How numerous is it supposed these regulators are?

Answer. It is supposed they are quite numerous—sufficiently so to seriously disturb these counties at present. They form into bands of perhaps twenty or thirty, I should suppose, from the reports I have heard. I was at Augusta, Georgia, a short time ago, a city situated right opposite Edgefield, South Carolina. General Tillson, the assistant commissioner for Georgia, reported a very bad condition of things in that county, (Edgefield.) The planters were making contracts with the negroes for $20 a year, and the military officer there, a lieutenant, was approving them. I reported the case promptly to General Saxton, and he had another officer sent there. General Sickles has said it may become necessary to remove the colored population entirely from two of these counties, and that if it does become so he will remove them and send them to counties where their labor is solicited at fair wages. General Scott, the assistant commissioner for South Carolina, was at Georgetown, in that State, a few days ago, and returned to Charleston on Friday last. He reported that the colonel commanding at Georgetown told him that the officers of Union troops stationed there, belonging to the 29th Maine and the 54th New York regiments, were almost as hard in their treatment of the freedmen as the rebels themselves. They are volunteers desiring to leave the service, and are reckless in their conduct. The officer in command is very well disposed himself, and doing all he can to stop these outrages, but says that this is the spirit of the military officers stationed there. General Scott, as I was about leaving, urged me in the strongest terms to represent to the government the very great importance of retaining a military force in South Carolina, and also some agency to do what the Freedmen's Bureau is doing now. (The bureau he believes the best agency.) He considers it vital not only to the interests of the freedmen, but to the interests of the whites and the eventual reorganization of the State. I have had an opportunity of learning the views and feelings of many gentlemen in regard to the bureau. One, a planter, a gentleman of education and culture, was at the office of the assistant commissioner to have rations issued to the planters, that they in turn might give them to the freedmen, and so run their plantations the present year; the value of the rations to constitute a lien on the crop. (The plan has not been approved.) After talking of the matter freely, and showing his desire to receive help from the bureau, he conversed further with myself and the assistant commissioner: then returning to my desk as he was leaving, he said, with much excitement, "Captain, where do you reside?" I answered and invited him to call upon me. He said, "I will do so; I want to see you somewhere outside of this damned bureau."

Question. Did you meet him subsequently?

Answer. Oh, yes, sir; I met him a number of times. We have much business intercourse with such gentlemen, and prefer not to yield to excitement in the transaction of business, desiring rather to hear and learn the truth. I will mention a conversation which occurred on a steambout between Charleston and Savannah. The conversation was with a gentleman, formerly a planter, and now desirous of getting back his sea-island plantations, which I could not restore to him, because he was unable to make a mutually satisfactory arrangement with his people. He said to me that the Charleston Mercury had made a number of prophecies which had come true, and one other which time would show the truth of, viz: That when the war was ended, poison and the knife would take the place of the bayonet and the sword; it was unpleasant, he said, to think of coming upon a man during his sleeping moments and making way with him, but these things might still occur; that the government must conciliate the white man of the south; must give him back his property; especially must it restore the sea-island property; that if it failed to do so, some men might become desperate. It was quite easy, he said, to make way with an officer without entering his room: he could be seen through a pane of glass, and reached quite as effectually as if he were in the same room.

Question. Was this a man of influence?

Answer. I do not think him a man of much influence. He had been a wealthy man—a planter. I do not think he represents the feelings of a majority of the planters, although he seemed to think he did. There are very few, I believe, who would indorse the sentiments he expressed.

Question. He is one of the sea-island proprietors?

Answer. Yes, sir. I do not mention his conversation as an indication of the prevailing sentiment of the south, for I honestly believe it is not, yet it shows what some southern men of position will say, even to a Union officer. He indicated, further, that it would be very unsafe for a northern man to remain in the south in case the government should fail to conciliate the southern white people. A gentleman, formerly of large wealth and an eminent rice planter of South Carolina, but now very much reduced in circumstances, proposes to work his plantation on the northern-farm principle, and was talking with me in regard to obtaining capital. I asked him why it is that the newspapers of the south abuse the negroes and the Freedmen's Bureau as they do, and make it appear that the Yankees, as they term them, may not be able to live in safety on a South Carolina plantation. "How do you expect to succeed," said I, "if you continue to abuse the negro, who is your laborer, the northern man, who is your capitalist, and the bureau, which is your mediator to arrange your relations with your laborers?" He said this was owing to the pride of opinion of the south. It could not give up its pride of opinion. He, himself, personally, had done so, but the people, as a mass, would not do it. In numerous conversations I have spoken with planters of what I termed the State suicide of South Carolina, as exhibited in her present course. They seem to see the force of the remark, and to assent to it in theory, but there is no one of them bold enough to come out publicly and oppose the prevailing sentiment of the people. In a conversation upon the railroad I heard a gentleman from the up country, as it is called, say that if the confounded Yankees would leave the south the planters would get along well enough with the "nigger;" they knew how to manage him. The speaker was bold in his remarks, and very loud. A gentleman next to me in the car, discovering I was an officer, seemed disposed to be apologetical. He said the gentleman opposite did not seem to know how to manage his negroes; as for himself, he could get along very well with his. He gave his negroes to understand that if he should catch one of them stealing he would take his life. And he added to me that he would be willing to lose his own life, if the government so decreed, for the purpose of carrying out his threat upon the negro who should dare to steal from him.

Question. Did he say he would take the life of the negro without trial or judgment?

Answer. He said nothing about trial or judgment, but simply spoke of catching the negro himself stealing his property. He then spoke of the negro in terms which I have often heard used, degrading him to one step above the baboon, and defended his theory by numerous arguments. I felt that, though he was, perhaps, succeeding very well now with his people, he would not, perhaps, succeed so well if he were at liberty to carry out all his theories.

Question. Do the mass of the people of South Carolina seem to have repudiated, or laid aside, the doctrine of the right of secession?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. They accept the position, though; acknowledge the fact that they are subdued, and that their scheme of secession, for the present, is a failure?

Answer. They acknowledge that fully.

Question. Do I understand you to say that no instance has come under your observation where a South Carolina secessionist has renounced the doctrine of the rightfulness of secession?

Answer. Not one.

Question. How much willingness did you observe, upon the part of the whites of South Carolina, to allow civil rights to the blacks; that is, the domestic rights of father and child, husband and wife, &c., the right to acquire property by regular, legal title, and the right to sue in the courts, and obtain redress for their wrongs in that way?

Answer. The domestic relations, I think, they are willing to respect. They profess a willingness to have the negro testify in the courts, but it seems to me they generally take the ground that his testimony against a white man is of little worth. I think there is a decided opposition to the negro's holding real estate, by lease or in fee. The intense opposition that exists to the negro's settling on the sea-island lands is, I think, that it will establish a precedent; that the negro will thereby hold estate, the government acknowledging his right to hold it. They attach less weight to their theories than to the practical result of them: they are afraid if the negroes hold their lands by lease it will be difficult to get possession of them again. A reverend gentleman from the upper part of the State said, in reply to questions addressed to him on the subject, that the South Carolinians would never permit the negro to hold real estate—never! That was his individual sentiment. Some southern men profess to feel differently.

Question. How do they appear to feel in respect to the education of the blacks?

Answer. Many profess indifference, and a very few publicly advocate it. I do not think there would be any serious opposition to it in the immediate neighborhood of the cities, but feel sure there would in the back counties.

Question. Is the treatment of the negro more harsh in the rural districts than in towns?

Answer. I think so.

Question. In case of a war between this country and any foreign power, what do you think would be the feeling of South Carolina secessionists in regard to such an issue as that?

Answer. I think they would watch the indications with the utmost care, and would side with our opponents, if they found they could, by doing so, assist in the destruction of this government. I honestly and firmly believe this.

Question. Would that be the course of the mass of the people; or would there be a division of opinion? What course would the leaders pursue?

Answer. I think, eventually, that would be their course.

Question. And they would, eventually, carry the masses with them, would they not?

Answer. I think so; although such a movement would be approached with great caution.

Question. Do they entertain any scheme of secession based upon any such state of facts as this? They are anxious to have their senators and representatives admitted into Congress; there is no doubt about that?

Answer. There is no doubt about that.

Question. They think there is a great majority for it?

Answer. So they say.

Question. Suppose these men were admitted into the Senate and House of Representatives from South Carolina and other rebel States, and suppose a man were to be elected as President of the United States who would renounce the right of coercion as Mr. Buchanan did, thus leaving the executive and legislative branches of the government composed of men who denied the right of coercion; what would be the course likely to be pursued by the secessionists? would they reassert secession and go out of the Union again?

Answer. They have been taught a fearful lesson, and I do not think they would be disposed to venture upon another war.

Question. But suppose Congress and the administration were composed of such men that no coercion would be used?

Answer. Then I think they would go out again.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that is one of the ultimate objects at which they aim? Is that one ground of their great anxiety to be represented in Congress, that by an alliance with a party at the north they may obtain control of the government?

Answer. That is my opinion, though I do not base it upon anything they have stated to me, for they are very judicious in what they say on this subject in presence of northern men. I have seen so much of the secessionists that I have but little faith in their loyalty; I have been forced to this conviction, although I have hoped for better things.

Question. How have you been treated socially by the secessionists?

Answer. I have had scarcely anything to do with them socially.

Question. Have you ever been invited to their houses?

Answer. Never but once, since I have been at Charleston; the invitation came from a party quite humble in place and position. Their social hostility to us I think is complete. At Savannah I boarded with pleasant people, secessionists; but through the city the same social distinction was observed. These distinctions are so marked in southern cities that northern people who board and lodge with, and so support southern families, are sometimes denied a participation in the social receptions of these very families they support, although persons of refinement and good social position. The southerners socially ostracize even those upon whom they are dependent. This practice is very general. I think there is a disposition to permit pleasant relations between themselves and our officers in some cases, but it is for personal reasons. A few days since a lady of Charleston spoke to one of our officers of the bitterness that exists between the north and the south, and said she hoped that bitterness would continue; she wished to see it continue to her dying day, and never wanted it obliterated or modified.

Question. Does it appear to be a dislike, a cultivated habitual dislike to the northern people, because they are such, or what is the foundation of it?

Answer. Not because they are northern people, but because they acknowledge in their hearts the superiority of the north, the superiority of northern enterprise and the northern mind; I believe this firmly. They think their power as a community is departing; that their immense estates are eventually to be divided up, and bought by northern men and negroes; that before the law, at least, the negro will be equal with the white man. A theory which may seem strange, is more or less current. There are thousands of mulattoes at the south whose fathers are white gentlemen of high standing in the community. I believe there is an intense and peculiar feeling of hate existing on the part of the whites towards colored persons of this class, the fear being that the latter will have an equal civil standing with the whites—will acquire riches, perhaps, and influence, and that the baseness and wickedness of slavery will then be made to appear before the world in a light which will be agonizing to the southern people; the advent among them of northerners who have caused the destruction of slavery, bringing poverty to the inhabitants and liberty to the negro, with possible future advancement. These facts, combined with a dislike of the north, to which they have been educated, cause them to hate northern men with a malignant hate.

Question. Will it not take a long time to allay this hatred?

Answer. The inner feeling, perhaps, will never be allayed, but the outward manifestation of it, I firmly believe, can be prevented by a rigid course upon the part of the government. I remarked to a gentleman of Charleston that I could tell what was going on at Washington by the bearing of the southern people without seeing the newspapers. When a lenient policy prevailed, I observed in the people an autocratic reserve, and an exacting manner towards United States officers. If the other policy, which obtains more generally in Congress, was in the ascendant, their bearing was totally different; a gentle spirit was manifest, they would be well behaved, submissive and resigned. He greeted the remark with a smile, and although a southern man himself, and a Charlestonian, did not deny the truth of what I said.

Question. What number of federal troops are there now in South Carolina?

Answer. I can give you an approximate estimate; perhaps there are four or five thousand in the whole State; I doubt if there are more.

Question. Stationed chiefly where?

Answer. On the coast, I think, chiefly, at Port Royal, Charleston, and Georgetown, though they are scattered, of course, throughout the State. The great body of them, and particularly the colored troops, are near the coast.

Question. How many colored troops are there in South Carolina?

Answer. A majority of the troops in the State are colored, perhaps three thousand altogether. General Sickles spoke to me in the highest terms of the colored troops, of their usefulness in South Carolina, and of the propriety of retaining them for the purpose of harmonizing the labor system. He says it is universally the case that they succeed better in this, when well officered, than white troops; and this testimony is given, in some cases, even by planters themselves. Still, none of the citizens are prepared to come out publicly and say such is the case.

Question. Have you had experience with black troops during the war?

Answer. Yes, sir, though not to any extent in active service. I was for some time stationed at Port Royal before I belonged to a colored regiment, and had a little experience with them. I am now connected with a colored regiment.

Question. How do they take to discipline?

Answer. Admirably well. I believe they can be made very efficient. The colored man of the army feels that he is brought up to a noble position, a position of respectability, and generally desires to continue in the service; while the white soldier often feels that he is degraded in position when he takes a place in the ranks. Therefore the white soldier is more ready to leave the service, now particularly, while the black soldier is proud of his place, and content to remain in it. So far as discipline is concerned, I think the black regiments stand as high as any. The inspecting officer for South Carolina called one of the colored regiments at Port Royal a model regiment in every respect, and said that on the whole even the 6th regiment of regulars, stationed at Charleston, did not surpass them.

Question. Have you seen black troops under fire?

Answer. No, sir; I have not.

Question. Do you know how they behave under fire?

Answer. Yes, sir. I am acquainted with officers of colored regiments; was at Port Royal when Colonel Higginson's regiment was organized, and have been near when they have been in action at Fort Wagner and other engagements. They were at first ridiculed; yet many who were most unfriendly now have entire confidence in them.

Question. Do they fight generally as well as white troops?

Answer. I believe they do.

Question. State, if you are able to do so, what amount of lands have been disposed of under General Sherman's order; or, rather, parcelled out to the blacks?

Answer. I can make an approximate estimate. Not having seen General Saxton's report, I judge that upon the sea-islands and abandoned rice plantations seventy-five thousand or one hundred thousand acres have been actually parcelled out.

Question. Not more?

Answer. Perhaps more; but at the outside, I think, it cannot possibly be more than two hundred thousand or three hundred thousand acres. I can only make a rough estimate.

Question. The lands so disposed of are chiefly upon the islands, are they not?

Answer. Almost entirely. Some are upon rice plantations in the neighborhood of Savannah, but only very few.

Question. Can you state whether they are cultivated well and faithfully by the blacks who occupy them?

Answer. The blacks desire exceedingly to cultivate them; but they are waiting for government action, and do not know whether to go to work or not. I think their labor upon these islands would have proved an entire success if the people could have known what would be done with regard to their possessory titles. Last year they settled there so late in the season that a fair crop could not be raised. In some cases full crops were raised; but in others it was impossible to realize more than half a crop. This year there has been great uncertainty and great tribulation among the people.

Question. Has there been any squabbling among the old proprietors of the lands or their heirs for possession?

Answer. Perhaps so; a dignified squabble. There have been differences—perhaps not many outright quarrels. The evidence seems clear that in some cases they have used threats—have threatened to remove the negroes from the plantations. The negroes have often become much excited at the return of a former master who had been oppressive in his treatment of them. The reports that have gone out of their bad treatment of whites who have visited the islands have been true in a few cases only, and then because visitors did not pursue the proper course. Instead of reporting themselves to the officers in charge, they would undertake to land where they pleased and go where they pleased over the islands, and the negroes, naturally suspicious, have sometimes carried them, under escort, to the officer in charge. This, of course, was considered by the whites a great indignity. I went once with a number of planters to Edisto island. As we were about to land, the colored sentinel, as usual, stood at his post, and before I could explain the object of our visit, these gentlemen hastened toward the dock. He stopped them. I approached the sentinel, told him who I was and why I was there, reported at once to the officer in charge, and obtained permission for the party to land; but one of them, in talking of it afterwards, said it was a shame and an offensive thing to be prevented from going to his own plantation by a colored soldier. The poor fellow, he said, was not to blame; the government had placed him in a position he was entirely unfit for; but it was none the less unpleasant to southern gentlemen.

Question. How many negroes have been located on these lands, as nearly as you can determine?

Answer. I do not think there are now located on these lands in South Carolina and Georgia, excluding Port Royal, more than twenty thousand men, women, and children.

Question. Are they generally blacks who were formerly located there, and owned by their masters who owned the island lands?

Answer. I could hardly say, generally.

Question. Where did the others come from?

Answer. They are persons who escaped from the interior to our lines during the war, and parties who came with General Sherman. In many cases they were formerly located on the islands, but not in a majority of cases.

Question. Have they any other means of living that you know of?

Answer. No, sir; no other means.

Question. Do you know Governor Orr, of South Carolina?

Answer. I met him once and was introduced to him. I had no conversation with him, however, and have never met him since.

Question. Is he understood to be a Union man in South Carolina, or a secessionist?

Answer. He says he is a Union man, and he speaks with Union officers, I understand, in a Union way, but I do not think he is prepared to say to the people of South Carolina what he says to Union officers. I have, perhaps, no right to make this criticism; I merely express it as my opinion.

Question. He was elected by what are called Union voters, was he not?

Answer. I think the people who elected him were in fact but little more Union in their feelings than those who voted for Wade Hampton. I think there is a very small minority of actual Union men in South Carolina. I have failed to meet in Charleston a single man whom I can call a true Union man, among those who were formerly planters.

Question. There has been a rumor that Governor Orr was not actually elected by a majority of the votes cast in that election; do you know anything about that?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Where is Wade Hampton now?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Do you think of any other statement you wish to make?

Answer. I would like to make a single statement to show the confidence which the negroes have in our government. I have visited Edisto island several times with former planters, and went on one occasion to make an earnest effort to establish business relations between the planters and the freedmen who located under the order of General Sherman, and had been in a very excited state. I did not advise the freedmen to make contracts. I was not ordered, and had no right to do so. They met at a church in large numbers. I explained to them the object of our visit. I did not ask them to do what they might not desire to do, but requested them to express their feelings freely, telling them that planters and freedmen were mutually dependent upon each other, and that the labor question should, if possible, be satisfactorily settled. I was followed by one of the planters, who spoke plausibly and fairly. A number of negroes spoke. They said they had no personal enmity towards their old masters; that they had been abused by them, and in many cases their lives were endangered by cruel punishments; nevertheless, they bore them no hatred. But if you ask us, they said, to contract with these men, we answer, we cannot do it. Do you blame us? Whatever the government says we will do. The government has told us we might have these lands. High officers of government—cabinet officers—have been to us at Port Royal and advised us to purchase lands, if we could do it honestly, and become planters ourselves. We liked their advice, and desire to follow it, and live upon our own homesteads. Still, if the government says go, we will go, but let us understand, when we are ordered to go, that it is the word of the government. We have earnestly longed to hold these lands, but if we cannot we will give them up. If we cannot be permitted to occupy them ourselves we will leave. We simply petition the government to permit us to buy homes for ourselves somewhere. This was the general tenor of their speeches, which for sobriety, dignity, kindness, and business-like expression, were not to be surpassed. After the meeting they desired to see me privately; and in the evening a committee of them called upon me. "Captain," they said, "if you order us to give up these plantations we will do it, if you say that is the word of the government. If you say we must contract or leave, we will cheerfully do the one thing or the other, but cannot contract. If it becomes necessary, sooner than have the government lose confidence in us as a people and a race, we will leave these plantations, that we supposed were our homes, without a murmur, but prefer to have you give us distinctly and clearly the orders of government, even if they compel us to go." I assured them the government would not lose confidence in them; that I had not come to order them away, but only to learn what they were willing to do.

A colored man of Savannah named Sims, brother of the Sims who became distinguished at Boston, told me as I was leaving Savannah that he was glad I was going, because he didn't wish me to remain and see the sufferings of his people.

They do not know what their future will be, but apprehend that sorrow and difficulties are yet in store for them. I confess that while I have the firmest belief in the fidelity of these people to the government—in their determination to stand by the government at all hazards—while I believe they will never come into open hostility with it, I fear they may yet have serious difficulties with their former masters. They include among their number men of talent and ability. I have attended their political meetings, and have never heard them utter there anything whatever prejudicial to the interests of our government, or the common good of the country. They have shown that they can organize, and have formed organizations already for their own protection and advancement. If it should ever become necessary for them to be unanimous in feeling and action, they will be unanimous.

Question. Have they arms?

Answer. No, sir; not as a general rule.

Question. Have you the least reason to apprehend that there are combinations among the blacks with the view of committing acts of violence upon the whites, or upon the government?

Answer. No, sir; I have not. I believe the organizations that exist among them are formed for purposes purely benevolent in their character.

Question. If I understand you, then, you have found no insurrectionary feeling there?

Answer. No, sir; I have found the feeling entirely opposed to that. Insurrection will be their very last resort; the last alternative.

Question. Suppose the protection they now enjoy from the presence of federal troops and from the Freedmen's Bureau should be withdrawn, and they should be exposed to the consequences of State legislation and to the prejudice and injustice which it is natural to suppose would be exercised toward them by the whites; what, in your judgment, would be the result in the end?

Answer. I think, in the end, there would be a conflict.

Question. Could they do otherwise than arm themselves to defend their rights?

Answer. No, sir; they would be bound to do it.

Question. Do not you think that in such an exigency it would be imperative upon these men to arm themselves to defend their rights, and that it would be cowardly in them not to do it?

Answer. Certainly I do. They could not do otherwise than organize to protect themselves. It is a mistake which many have fallen into to suppose that this race, while they are submissive and kindly in the extreme, are deficient in courage. Their native common sense is, I think, equal to that of any race we know of. Their judgment, as a mass, is good; their intelligence, of course, differs in different cases; but they are quite well informed, and particularly so with regard to the proceedings of the government. Leading men among them, who are intelligent, well-educated, orators as well as writers, inform themselves of what is going on, and inform the people.

Question. Did you discover among the blacks a disposition to acquire education?

Answer. It is their universal desire and disposition. Their little children will travel miles to go to school. In estimating the amount of land parcelled out to negroes on the sea islands, and the population there, I may be within the limits. I have not seen all the reports. I may express an opinion with regard to the policy of allowing these people to have the island lands. I will say that I think the plan adopted in the bill which was vetoed was an excellent one, because, although it did not convey the title in fee, as, perhaps, might have been done, it limited the occupation to a term of years, and satisfied the great mass of the freedmen, while the planters, when it was supposed the bill would become a law, showed a disposition to acquiesce, which was quite unexpected.

Question. Is there any form of contract now in vogue in South Carolina between the whites and the freedmen?

Answer. Yes, sir; General Scott has devised a form in South Carolina which is generally adopted. The planters are disposed, in many cases, to insert in their contracts tyrannical provisions, to prevent the negroes from leaving the plantation without a written pass from the proprietor; forbidding them to entertain strangers or to have fire-arms in their possession, even for proper purposes. A contract submitted a few days ago for approval stipulated that the freedman, in addressing the proprietor, should always call him "master."

Question. Has that been sanctioned by General Scott?

Answer. Of course not. He repudiated it. He is remarkably fair and generous in his treatment of the freedmen, and just towards the planters.

Question. There was a meeting on the 21st of December last at Sumter, South Carolina, with a view of getting up a form of contract between the employers and the freedmen. Do you recollect it?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Has that form of contract been adopted by General Scott?

Answer. No, sir, it has not.

Question. Do you remember that form of contract?

Answer. Oh, yes, very well.

Question. Does the paper I hand you contain the copy agreed upon at that meeting?

Answer. Yes; sir, that is a copy of the contract said to have been agreed upon at that meeting. I have understood that General Saxton did not formally approve it then, and that he disapproved it when he came to examine its provisions carefully.

(The form of contract, with the statement of the proceedings of the meeting referred to, are appended to the testimony of this witness.)

Question. You say General Saxton did not approve this form of contract?

Answer. I understand he did not, though it was supposed at first that he did. He casually looked at it at that meeting, and made some remark with reference to it, so I am informed by General Scott. The contract adopted is a very reasonable and liberal one.

Question. Have you a copy of that contract?

Answer. I have not. I will send you a copy of it from Charleston. The whole subject of the freedmen has been very familiar to me during a residence of three years and a half in South Carolina and Georgia. I have entire confidence in the freed people, in their ability and disposition to labor, and to labor faithfully, and to become useful citizens. I have seen them at their schools and on the plantations; have travelled over many of the sea-islands; and have met the people under almost every conceivable variety of circumstances.

Question. And the statement you have now made under oath is the result of your observation?

Answer. Most assuredly.

SUMTER, SOUTH CAROLINA, December 21, 1865.

One of the largest meetings which has been held here for years assembled in the courthouse to-day at eleven o'clock a. m. It was composed chiefly of the planters of Sumter, Kershaw, and Chrendon districts. On motion of Colonel F. H. Whittier, Colonel John N. Frierson was called to the chair. J. J. Fleming was appointed secretary.

The chairman introduced the object of the meeting in a very eloquent address, in which he avowed his conviction that, notwithstanding all discouragements which might at present exist, this great southern country was not destined to become a wilderness; that it must and will be cultivated either by free black or white labor; and that the planters were ready to test the question fairly and fully, and to make contracts for another year, if any guarantee was furnished that such contracts would be enforced. He believed that our political condition was not as hopeless as some might suppose, and trusted that we would yet enjoy union without consolidation, and liberty without anarchy or misrule. He then introduced to the meeting General R. Saxton.

General Saxton, in a brief address, declared that the Freedmen's Bureau, which he represented, was disposed to give every assistance to the planters in working out the problem of free labor, and that he believed that ultimately the agricultural interest would be advanced to a higher and more profitable condition under free than it would have been under a continuance of slave labor.

By invitation, Rev. M. French, who had just arrived from Washington, gave his views on the subject of free labor, detailing the results of his observations in different parts of the southern country, and more particularly the workings of the new system on the sea-islands of South Carolina. He pronounced freedom and free labor a decided success, and predicted the happiest results in this section if the planters would manage the freedmen properly, and set the part of educators as well as supervisors of their laborers.

Judge Moses wished to know if Mr. French believed that the freedmen would carry out their contracts, and upon what grounds he rested such belief?

In reply, Mr. French avowed his faith as the mainspring to his conviction. He believed firmly that when the inducement of compensation, whether in money or proportion of crop, was presented, coupled with the fear of the penalties imposed for remissness or failure, the freedmen would work through the time contracted for.

General Richardson, commanding the eastern district of South Carolina, stated that it had been universally affirmed by the planters that the freedmen have not worked as they should have done, and he believed this was true, and therefore it was but natural that the planters should look for some better guarantee for their performance of duty. He submitted a plan for contracts adopted by the Darlington planters.

General Saxton stated that while the bureau fixed upon no specific plan for contracts, the one just read met his approval, and appeared to be unexceptionable.

Rev. H. D. Green noticed an omission in the form presented. There was nothing said about recklessness, on the part of the freedmen, in destroying gardens, fencing, &c. How was this to be punished?

General SAXTON. Of course, where they destroy property, it comes out of their wages.

Colonel J. D. BLANDING. I wish to know whether involuntary loss of time, as in sickness, shall fall upon the planter or upon the freedman?

General SAXTON. Upon the freedman.

Judge Moses moved that the form of contracts be referred to a committee of — planters from Sumter, Kershaw, and Clarendon, begging to be excused from serving on the committee himself.

This motion prevailed, and the Chair appointed the following gentlemen: Rev. H. D. Green, A. H. Boykin, A. T. Goodwin, Thomas C. Richardson, W. H. B. Richardson, Alfred Scarborough, Marcus Reynolds, John M. DeSaussure, J. J. Ingram, H. H. Wells, J. S. Bradley, William Nettles, W. E. Richardson, James McIntosh, J. J. Chandler, J. D. Blanding, J. W. Stuckey, Dr. J. C. Haynsworth, and F. H. Kennedy.

The committee having retired, the Hon. F. J. Moses, senator from Sumter, and recently elevated to the bench, in response to a call from the meeting, addressed his late constituents, thanking them for the uniform and cordial support they had given him as their senator, and affirming that if at last it should be found that he had served his God as faithfully as he had served them for twenty-five years in the senate or the State, he would look forward to the close of life without fear or concern. His remarks were eloquent and well received, and he pronounced them to be his valedictory as senator.

The vacancy thus created in the senate, it is generally thought, would be admirably filled by the election of Colonel John N. Frierson to the position. If he can be induced to accept, there is no doubt the district would feel proud and fortunate in securing the services of a gentleman who unites, with great soundness of views, varied scholarship, undeviating judgment, and inflexible integrity, a refinement and elegance of manners which would adorn any station in the land.

The committee, having returned, presented the following form for contracts, which was unanimously adopted. They prefaced their report with the following resolution, which was also passed by a unanimous vote:

“Resolved, That in the judgment of this committee, in all cases where it is convenient, and circumstances allow it, it is the best system of hire to pay the freedmen stated wages; and that where this rule is adopted, we recommend the following scale of wages, varying from $40 to $120 per annum.”

Form of Contracts between planters and freedmen, as substantially adopted by the Darlington meeting, revised and adopted by the mass meeting of Sumter, Kershaw and Clarendon planters, December 21, 1865, and approved by Major General Saxton, of the Freedmen's Bureau:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, — District.

Articles of agreement between ——— and ———, freed men and women, whose names are hereunto attached:

First.—The said freedmen agree to hire their time as laborers, on the plantation of ———, from the 1st of January, 1866, to the 1st of January, 1867; to conduct themselves faithfully, honestly, civilly and diligently; to perform all labor on said plantation or such as may be connected therewith, that may be required by the said ———, or his agent, and to keep no poultry, dogs or stock of any kind, except as hereinafter specified; no firearms or deadly weapons, no ardent spirits, nor introduce or invite visitors, nor leave the premises during working hours without the written consent of the proprietor or his agent.

Second.—The said freedmen agree to perform the daily tasks hitherto usually allotted on said plantation, to wit: 125 to 150 rails; cutting grain, three to six acres; ditching and banking, 300 to 600 feet; hoeing cotton, 70 to 300 rows an acre long; corn, 4,000 to 7,000 hills. In all cases where tasks cannot be assigned they agree to labor diligently ten hours a day.

Third.—For every day's labor lost by absence, refusal or neglect to perform the daily task or labor, said servants shall forfeit fifty cents. If absent voluntarily or without leave, two dollars a day; if absent more than one day without leave, to be subject to dismissal from the plantation and forfeiture of share in the crop. All such fines and forfeitures shall inure to the benefit of the employer and employes in proportion to their relative shares.

Fourth.—Said freedmen agree to take good care of all utensils, tools and implements committed to their charge, and to pay for the same if injured or destroyed; also, to be kind and gentle to all work animals under their charge, and to pay for any injury which they may sustain while in their hands through their carelessness or neglect; and forfeitures herein specified will be subject to the decision of the authorities having proper jurisdiction of the same.

Fifth.—They stipulate to keep their houses, lots and persons in neat condition, subject to the inspection of the employer or his agent at any time.

Sixth.—They agree to furnish from their number a nurse for the sick, also stock-minder and foreman, to be selected by the employer. They agree to be directed in their labor by the foreman, to obey his orders, and that he shall report all absences, neglects, refusal to work, or disorderly conduct, to the employer or his agent.

Seventh.—Said employer agrees to treat his employes with justice and kindness; to furnish each family with quarters on his plantation, with a quarter of an acre of land for a garden, and the privilege of getting fire-wood from some portion of the premises, to be indicated by the employer, (and to divide the crop with them in the following proportions, viz: to the employes one-third of the corn, potatoes and peas, gathered and prepared for market, and one-third net proceeds of the ginned cotton, or its market value at the end of the year.) When desired, to furnish the usual bread and meat ration, to be accounted for at the market price, out of their share of the crop. (Where "stated wages" are allowed, the pro rata of the crop will be omitted.)

Eighth.—Said employer agrees to furnish animals, and to feed them; also wagons, carts, plantation implements, such as cannot be made by the laborer on the plantation.

Ninth.—All violations of the terms of this contract, or of the rules and regulations of the employer, may be punished by dismissal from the plantation, with forfeiture of his or her share of the crop or wages, as the case may be. But the employer shall pay said parties at the rate of four dollars a month for full hands, deducting therefrom advances made.

Tenth.—The employer or his agent shall keep a book, in which shall be entered all advances made by him, and fines and forfeitures for lost time, or any cause, which book shall be received as evidence in same manner as merchants' books are now received in courts of justice, and shall have a right to deduct from the share of each laborer all his or her fines and forfeitures, also all advances made by him, subject to the decision of the authorities having jurisdiction of the same.

Eleventh.—The laborer shall not sell any agricultural product to any person whatever, without the written consent of the employer, until after the division of the crops.

Twelfth.—The laborers shall commence work at sunrise, and be allowed from one to three hours each day for their meals, according to the season of the year.

Witness our hands, &c., this ———.

While the planters' meeting was in progress, the freedmen were crowding into town from all quarters, and at 2 p. m. an immense assemblage of them was addressed by General Saxton and Rev. Mr. French, from a platform, near which rose, in all its tall and fair proportions the liberty pole, with the stars and stripes floating from its summit. The day passed off quietly, and notwithstanding the immense throng of all colors and classes, we heard of no cases of disorder or violence, except one instance, in which, just before sunset, a freedman was critically if not fatally stabbed by a gentleman from the country, who immediately made his escape. The cause for the act has not transpired, but the authorities will no doubt investigate and properly dispose of the affair.

F.

WASHINGTON, February 3, 1866.

J. W. Alvord sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. My family resides in Jersey City; I am an officer of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Question. Where are you stationed?

Answer. At the bureau while I am in Washington.

Question. Have you either during the war or since the close of hostilities visited portions of the rebel confederacy?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What portions?

Answer. I was with the Union army in Virginia during the war.

Question. And since the close of the war you have been engaged in the Freedmen's Bureau?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. And since then you have been stationed in Washington ?

Answer. My headquarters are here.

Question. Have you visited portions of Virginia since the close of hostilities ?

Answer. Yes, sir. I have visited Virginia and all the States south below Tennessee and this side of the Mississippi river. I have visited Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. I made three tours during the year ; I have been during that time under the orders of General Howard as inspector of finances and schools for freedmen in all the States lately in insurrection. These tours were made in execution of his special orders ; of course, I have mingled with all classes at the south, more especially with the intelligent portion. In these various journeys on railroads, in hotels and in public meetings, I have seen every class of southern people from the lowest negroes to the State legislatures ; on three or four of which I was in attendance during some portions of the session. These, in brief, are my opportunities.

Question. Now state what, among the rebel people, is the general feeling towards the government of the United States.

Answer. It is hostile, as it seems to me, in the great majority of the southern people ; I mean that part of them who were engaged in the rebellion. There is evidently no regret for the rebellion, but rather a defence of it, and only a submission to the circumstances of the case as a conquered people. They everywhere defend the principles on which the rebellion was commenced.

Question. They still insist that those principles were right ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; they seem to feel that peace was brought about by an arrangement which allowed them the equal condition of belligerents, and in possession of all that they previously had had of government privileges. They everywhere insist upon the immediate restoration of such privileges, and that they shall be readmitted as States into the Union. They complain bitterly of the treatment they are receiving in being kept out.

Question. What great object do they seem to contemplate in their being readmitted into Congress by their senators and representatives ?

Answer. They seem to suppose that by re-admission they can get political power and obtain again the supremacy which they once had, and with the exception of slavery they expect to be still a prosperous and dominant portion of our government. Slavery they have given up in the old form, but they want to subdue and keep in a low place the negroes, by some compulsion which it seems to me they are trying to effect not only privately but by all the legislation that I learned of or witnessed.

Question. Are you aware of combinations existing in those States for the purpose of subjecting the freedmen to compulsory labor, uncompensated, or not sufficiently compensated ?

Answer. I do not know of any distinct combinations ; there appears to be a universal exhibition of that purpose in all places and in all circles where I heard it talked of, privately or publicly. The idea was that the negro was to be kept subservient to the white race and compelled to labor for low wages. Contracts, so far as I have noticed or examined them, unless regulated by the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, have been very much on the side of the white man.

Question. How far would they carry their power if they possessed it, to declare unemployed freedmen vagrants and to treat them as such ?

Answer. I think there was a time when they wished to declare them all vagrants and to apply vagrant laws to them. That asserted vagrancy seemed to be their vindication of their legislative action.

Question. Was that a vindication or rather a policy, on the part of the slaveholders, to re-establish a quasi slavery among the blacks by means of vagrant acts ?

Answer. I think that was so ; it appeared to be a policy.

Question. State whether or not it appeared to be a general policy, or whether it was interrupted, existing in sections of the country and among particular classes.

Answer. I noticed it universally, and it led me sometimes to make the remark that it appeared to me as though such policy had been agreed upon by all the slaveholders in the southern States.

Question. If they had the power, would they or would they not, in your judgment, reduce the black race again to slavery such as has heretofore existed ?

Answer. I think they would, in case they thought they could hold it there.

Question. How do they feel in point of personal regard towards the freedmen generally ?

Answer. Their feelings are, as it seems to me, very much mixed ; they have a kind of affection for him as an old servant ; they have ill will towards him for turning against them and going with the Union army ; and they have direct hostility to him as now being in the condition of a freedman claiming the rights of a freeman.

Question. If it was for them to say, would they permit the blacks to become owners of landed property ?

Answer. It seemed everywhere determined upon that he should not be an owner of land. I found this quite universal in all the States, in every tour I made, and I listened to debates in their legislatures on that subject.

Question. How do they feel in regard to the marital rights of the black people—the rights of husband and wife and the rights of family?

Answer. Well, sir; I think they care very little about that matter. Their old habits of feeling still remain; they consider the relations of husband and wife not especially sacred among the blacks.

Question. In case of a war between the United States and any foreign power, such as France or England, what would be the disposition of the rebel people towards the government of the United States?

Answer. I think it would be in their hearts to join with the foreign power. I doubt whether they would dare to do it. They felt the power of our government in this war, and are disposed at present to submit to it.

Answer. Suppose it should become apparent in such an event that the government of the United States was not strong enough to retain them in their allegiance, and suppose they should get the idea that the government of the United States was so weak as to justify them in making an attempt to throw off the authority of the government, either by joining the common enemy or by declaring their own independence, what would probably be their course?

Answer. I think in the case of supposed weakness of our government they would declare their independence. I heard very intelligent gentlemen say that while they submitted to their present condition as a necessity, they still felt that the principles on which they rebelled were right, and they only wait in the coming time for another opportunity.

Question. Are you a man accustomed to careful observation as you are passing from one place to another in the country and mingling with the people?

Answer. Yes, sir; I generally keep my eyes and ears open, and I usually get into conversation with men.

Question. That is your habit of mind and intercourse?

Answer. Yes, sir. In my late tour I was with General Howard until he left Jackson for Washington. I listened to many conversations between him and the multitudes whom he met. I was with him at hotels. When he left I made a little experiment of travelling without being known, and of listening to what of natural conversation would occur. The two methods have their advantages in learning the state of feeling. I think I saw more deeply into the hearts of the people often by listening and mingling in conversation where I was not known.

Question. In case they had the power, do you imagine they would permit the freedman to remain a resident in their communities, or would they try to expel him?

Answer. They seem inclined to be rid of him. They generally wish that white laborers could be procured, and they are, here and there, making experiments with that view.

Question. Are they willing to have people from the north or from the loyal States come and settle among them and buy land and become permanent inhabitants with them?

Answer. A great many of them want to sell their land, but I do not think that they would like to have northern people come there as residents. I think they dislike us and prefer that we would stay away.

Question. Do you regard it as safe, as a general rule, for northern men to go down there and attempt to settle and become residents?

Answer. It would not be for those who favored the government and the interests of the freedmen if the military were withdrawn; it would be very unsafe.

Question. Would such settlers probably be subjected to violence and insult?

Answer. To all sorts of insult, and probably to violence in very many cases.

Question. Would they not be able to obtain justice in the southern courts if they were thus treated?

Answer. They would probably obtain a hearing, but I think they would hardly secure justice.

Question. Why not?

Answer. From the strength of southern prejudice against northern people.

Question. You think that prejudice would pervade even the juries who would be called to try the case?

Answer. I think it would.

Question. Do you think it would generally affect the decisions of the judges upon the bench?

Answer. I should fear it might. I learned of cases where the court was very partial to the old class of southerners who came into litigation with northern-born men or negroes. And this was true where negro testimony was admitted; it was taken simply as the statement of the negro.

Question. How do they regard the truthfulness of the negro generally?

Answer. They say he is very untruthful.

Question. Have you found the negro untruthful in your intercourse with him?

Answer. I have not. I think he is as truthful as any other class of men of the same intelligence. I know he has been remarkably truthful to our northern people and to the army in all matters of information.

Question. What feeling has been created on the part of the southern whites toward the blacks in consequence of the part which the blacks have taken in the war?

Answer. They do not like them for having sided with the north.

Question. Has that become a ground of hatred, dislike, or increased distrust?

Answer. I do not think that is the sole ground. I think that that enters into their dislike as one of its elements. They look upon the negro as having been seduced by the northern people and as having been comparatively innocent in the course he took.

Question. What do they say generally about the emancipation of their slaves, either by President Lincoln's proclamation, by the amendment to the Constitution, or any other means?

Answer. They never have liked it. They hoped that great trouble would arise from it. They delight in all the obstacles we find to the improvement of the freedman. So it seems to me. I say this of the majority. There are very many exceptions. There are a class of men at the south, in very small numbers, who have, at heart, probably always been with us, and who are now favorable to the improvement of the negro.

Question. In reference to these obstacles to the improvement of the negro, do you think from your observation that the southern people generally are endeavoring to increase those obstacles rather than to diminish them?

Answer. I think that is a very general disposition. They oppose negro schools generally. There is a great hate apparently towards northern teachers. Whatever we do for colored schools has to be done without any consultation with the southerners.

Question. What is the great ground of objection on their part toward the education of the blacks; why do they wish to see them remain in ignorance?

Answer. From their old habits they seem to feel that the negro must not become an equal. They understand that education and property and political privileges will make the negro so, and hence they oppose everything of the kind.

Question. You think this feeling arises rather from their old prejudices to the race?

Answer. Very much so. I heard gentlemen say in the legislature at Montgomery that they were determined that the blacks should not rise to be equals with white men, and that all their legislation would be based on that determination; that they must not have titles to land; that if they obtained possession of property, the next thing would be to claim the right of suffrage and all other political privileges. They perceive that these things come along logically from each other.

Question. Did that declaration on the part of members seem to find favor with the other members of the legislature or with the audience?

Answer. A member expressed this opinion to me privately in the lobby, but it was the same in substance as I had listened to in the debate in the house, the debate being on the constitutional amendment.

Question. Did you ever find a disloyal negro in the course of your travels?

Answer. I saw one during the war, who came into our army lines and said he was with the rebels; that is the only instance that I remember. It may be said that they are universally loyal.

Question. State what is the degree of attachment which they exhibit towards the government of the United States?

Answer. Well, sir; it is unbounded. It was in Mr. Lincoln; it is now in the government, and in what they expect the government will do for them.

Question. You mean to say that universally they are the strong friends of the government?

Answer. I do. When, on the sea islands, a proposition was made to restore the lands to their original owners, there was a most distressing breaking in upon that confidence in the government which they had been cherishing. It would be impossible for any one to describe the feeling they manifested on that occasion.

Question. Have you been aware of the existence of combinations among the negroes to rise in insurrection against the white men—the proprietors of lands?

Answer. I do not think that there has ever been any such combinations. They have often told me, when I questioned them, that there was nothing of the kind. I came through a number of the States just before the holidays, and of course my curiosity, at least, was excited to know how they felt.

Question. And you conversed with them on that subject?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. You conversed with the intelligent portion of the negroes?

Answer. Yes, sir; with the most intelligent.

Question. Had they confidence in you as a friend?

Answer. I think they had. My work of getting up schools among them and looking after their financial concerns brought the most intelligent of them around me in every place, sometimes in large crowds. I was in Richmond on Christmas eve when there was a great deal of excitement among the white people, but I saw not the least among the blacks.

Question. What was the reason of the excitement?

Answer. The white people were in expectation of disturbances. The blacks were in their churches engaged in their usual religious services.

Question. Suppose all protection on part of the United States towards the freedmen should be withdrawn, including the Freedmen's Bureau and the presence of the military forces, thus leaving the freedmen to be dealt with by the authorities of the States solely, what would be the result?

Answer. They would suffer in all their interests as laborers; and as to attempting any education or improvement, the whole would be arrested and, I think, turned backward.

Question. Would the blacks endure it without resistance?

Answer. I should fear that there might be resistance. The soldiers of the disbanded colored regiments talk as though there would be, and yet I think, from the general quiet nature of the colored people, that they would bear long and patiently before such a thing took place. It would be only an extremity that would force them to such an insurrection.

Question. In such a case would the whites of the States, through their governments, or by popular movements, be likely to attempt the expulsion of the blacks from their limits?

Answer. I think they would attempt to destroy them, or to expel them, if they could not destroy them.

Question. In such an event would the colored men fight?

Answer. I think they would.

Question. Regarding the rebel States as they are now conditioned, and as they probably would be conditioned in the case of the removal of the Freedmen's Bureau and the withdrawal of the military forces of the United States, could you look upon these political communities as supports of the government of the United States, or as elements of weakness?

Answer. As elements of weakness, most decidedly, unless there should come a very great change over them.

Question. Looking upon them in their present condition?

Answer. Decidedly, elements of weakness. I everywhere listened to conversations which were seditious in their character, planning for the future, not for the government but for themselves, cursing the northern people and cursing the dominant party of the country.

Question. Can a Union man be elected from a congressional district in the south to Congress, generally? Is there any chance for a Union man to be elected to Congress?

Answer. I should think not. They seem determined to vote for those who have been the strongest rebels, although they can hardly hope that such men will be admitted to Congress. It is from a desire to show their pluck, and spirit, and defiance; and they think that, ultimately, Congress and the country will cover before such determination. I can account for it in no other way.

Question. Have the rebels any deposits of arms in considerable quantities, to your knowledge or information?

Answer. I do not know that they have. I hear frequently of arms being in the possession of men in all the States. I know they frequently use arms in cases of violence.

Question. Have the negroes arms?

Answer. Not generally, and yet I think some of them have arms?

Question. Do they keep them publicly in their houses so that they can be seen, or are they concealed?

Answer. It may be that some of them are concealed, but generally they are proud of owning a musket or fowling-piece. They use them often for the destruction of vermin and game.

Question. Have you ever witnessed the operations of negro troops upon the field of battle?

Answer. I have seen them as they have come in and gone out to battle, and very often in their camps and under drill.

Question. How do they behave as soldiers?

Answer. Remarkably well; they are generally as well disciplined troops as I have seen.

Question. Are they submissive to discipline?

Answer. Remarkably so.

Question. Have they sufficient intelligence to understand the drill and discipline of a soldier?

Answer. I have never seen any want in that respect. They are often more exact in the execution of orders, as I have noticed, on picket and on guard duty, than white soldiers are.

Question. How do they behave when under actual fire? have they courage and self-possession?

Answer. The officers who led them into battle have uniformly told me that they had courage to an unexpected degree. General O. B. Wilcox, who was in command of the colored troops at Petersburg, told me that he never saw soldiers stand and fight, man to man, with the bayonet, as they did before Petersburg. He said this with very great emphasis. I was with him soon after the fight.

Question. If you wish to make any other statement to the committee, to which I have not called your attention, you are at liberty to do so.

Answer. If the matter of schools and finances is legitimately before this committee, I would like to speak of them.

Mr. HOWARD. The matter of schools is.

WITNESS. I will say, as to schools, that the experiment in relation to the capacity of the negro for education is complete.

Question. State particularly, and clearly, and thoroughly, all you have to say on the capacity of the negro to acquire education.

Answer. We have now nearly 100,000 under tuition. I have visited their schools in all the States, and, while they have peculiarities, still I do not see but that they learn as rapidly as white children would under the same circumstances. In many schools there is a remarkable degree of progress under the powerful stimulus which they feel in their new freedom, and in the expectation of elevating themselves by knowledge. I think that the colored children are more earnest and ambitious than most scholars.

Question. About how many schools have you visited?

Answer. Well, sir, hundreds at least. My duty was to go to the schools everywhere, and I saw not only those taught by white teachers, but I found all over the south a class of schools got up and taught by colored people, rude and imperfect, but still groups of persons, old and young, trying to learn. They did not seem to have patience to wait for the coming of the white teacher. I suppose there are at least 500 such groups throughout the south, many of them never having been visited by any white man before.

Question. What branch of education do they appear most readily to comprehend?

Answer. They advance rapidly in all the elementary branches, and I do not see but that they make good progress when they reach the higher branches, such as arithmetic, geography, and writing. In writing they rather excel. I had some very fine examinations in arithmetic and at the black-board. In Baltimore, Charleston, and New Orleans I have examined the higher classes in such branches as far as I should ever expect to examine white children, receiving correct answers. In New Orleans I saw a school of three hundred taught by colored persons, where the reading, writing, and recitations were quite perfect; where the exhibitions at the black-board were remarkable, and where everything was as fluent in French as in English—the scholars reciting in both languages.

Question. Tell me whether there is as much repugnance among the whites in New Orleans and in Louisiana generally to the education of the blacks as you find in the Carolinas?

Answer. I think there is less in Louisiana. The creoles have always been permitted to educate themselves, under some disadvantages. The whites, therefore, have seen an educated class of colored men, and there is less prejudice against them, although it is very strong all through the interior of the State. I saw a member of the legislature stop before one of our schools. He turned to me, as I was by his side, and exclaimed, "Well, I have seen many an absurdity in my lifetime, but this is the climax of all absurdities!" The alphabet and spelling-book, in the hands of the colored children, were a great absurdity to him.

Question. As to the religious ideas of the blacks, and as to their religious feeling, I wish you to make a remark on these two subjects—are they superstitious; more superstitious than white people who are equally ignorant?

Answer. The blacks have a strong tendency to religious faith in a Supreme Being, and they love religious worship. I think this tendency towards faith often manifests itself, on account of their ignorance, in what we would call superstition. When cultured, however, this would become intelligent reliance upon the divine testimony; it would be what we call faith. When they are instructed they will be a peculiarly religious people, with a great amount of conscience; with a strong purpose to do what they think is their duty, as taught in the Scriptures.

Question. Do you think they are generally as honest and truthful as whites in the same grade in society?

Answer. There have been influences to make them dishonest and untruthful. If they could be recovered from the influences of slavery, I think they would be as truthful and honest as any class of persons living. My impression is that they have a large amount of conscience, which would make them fear to offend.

Question. Have they generally among them the idea of property developed to such a degree as to enable them to determine the difference between meum and teum?

Answer. Yes, sir, they know that distinction very well; they understand what property is and its rights. They have a strong desire to accumulate property. They are, in the main, industrious whenever they can get pay, and have it promptly.

Question. Are they not as much inclined to labor, provided they can get paid for their labor, as are the low whites of the south?

Answer. Very much more so, sir. I think they will work cheerfully as soon as they can be treated properly and paid promptly. They do not like so well to work for their old masters. A temporary contract, even, seems to be as the shadow of the old slavery, placing them for the time being under the power of these men; which power they have so long dreaded and which they wish no longer to experience. They rove about a little on this account, seeking to change their relations. I think that, very soon, they will settle down to industry.

Question. Do you find among them a disposition to vagabondage; and if so, to what extent?

Answer. There is that which is called by such a term, but it is produced by various causes. Coming out from slavery, where they have seen a very limited state of things around them, they want to see new things. In slavery they have been separated from their relatives, and now they want to find them. The war carried them hither and thither, and many are making their way back. Then they crowd towards the large cities and towns for work, desiring to escape from the domination of their old masters. That is one reason of it. Another reason is, that they wish to get where their children can go to our schools. All this has made a great deal of moving about on their part; but I think that will cease as soon as arrangements are made for their universal education and improvement, and for their proper and kind treatment.

Question. Is it not likely that, in case they are permitted to become owners of lands, they will settle down and be as quiet in the possession and cultivation of their lands as white people generally are?

Answer. They will be a remarkably permanent people. They love to stay in one place, where they have always lived, where they were born, and where their children are buried. Their local associations are very strong. In regard to their labor and earnings, they have been, in the old condition, led to be improvident. They have scarcely known what money was. I speak of the great majority of them. I find, however, that they are very easily taught to save what they do not need, and they are now expecting, multitudes of them, to save money and make purchases of homesteads and lands. They relinquish pretty generally the idea that they will get much from the government; they feel they must go to work and earn and save and buy for themselves. I have been placing a savings bank in most of the large towns for their benefit. They receive that institution with great enthusiasm, and say that they will make their deposits of everything they can possibly save in order to provide for the future. They do not want to be a burden to anybody, especially to the government. We have now fifteen of these savings banks—small and in their first beginnings, but the aggregate of deposits is already some $250,000. We have paid back over $50,000 where they needed it for important purchases. We give it back immediately when they want it for such purposes. I am constantly receiving applications for such savings banks throughout the south.

Question. Have they any disposition to leave the country and go off and settle somewhere else?

Answer. I do not think they have.

Question. How strong is the negro's love of home?

Answer. I think it very strong indeed. They all seem to prefer to stay pretty near where they have always been living. That is one difficulty we have in getting them to go to distant parts where labor is called for. It is not an aversion to labor, but rather an aversion to leaving their friends and old residences.

Question. Do you think of anything else you wish to say on the subject of the colored race?

Answer. I have very great confidence, sir, that they are to be elevated, enlightened, and christianized, and to be made a very important element in the more perfect civilization of the coming time.

Question. Have you the slightest doubt about it?

Answer. Not the slightest, myself. I think they have constitutional elements of character which, when brought under high culture, will make them, in many respects, excel as a people. They are emotional, imaginative, imitative. The children in their schools write quickly and draw well. For aught I can see, with proper opportunities, they will make painters and artists.

Question. How is it in regard to their talent for music?

Answer. They have a remarkable talent for music.

Question. Do they acquire music easily?

Answer. Easily. It seems almost native to them. Universal song is heard among the colored race.

Question. Can they sing at their schools?

Answer. Universally so. The great exhibition at all their schools is to hear them sing.

Question. Are they allowed to sing the Old John Brown song?

Answer. Frequently, sir. We hear that very frequently, and the children very evidently understand what they are singing about.

Question. Have these people generally understood tolerably well what the occasion and object of the rebellion were?

Answer. Yes, sir. From the first they seemed to have known what was going on. I have been astonished to find how they knew its history, how they watched its progress, what their expectations were from the northern army, how they waited for its coming, often with earnest prayer to God, and with expectations of what that army was to do for them—viz., to effect their emancipation. They have understood very much more, and even now understand more, of the political condition of things in this whole government than people usually suppose.

Question. Do they not generally understand those subjects as well as the low whites of the south?

Answer. I think they do.

Question. What in your opinion has been the effect of the liberal policy of the President of the United States in granting pardons and amnesties to the rebels at the south? Has that policy increased their attachment to the government of the United States, or has it had the effect of diminishing it?

Answer. It has undoubtedly increased their attachment to the President personally; but I think they have less respect for the government itself. I saw that they came back, with their pardons, to be more insolent than ever. I think I have seen very distinctly that as they have received favors from the government they have become more and more arrogant in their demands, and less and less like uniting happily with us. I think that at first, when their armies surrendered, they would have accepted terms very gratefully which now they are ready to spurn. The whole process of favors shown them seems to have worked badly so far as bringing them towards us.

Question. You think, then, that instead of esteeming those favors as benefactions, they have only had the effect of inflaming their ill-will towards the United States and of augmenting their defiance?

Answer. Yes, sir. They have taken them as rights, and have been encouraged to demand more of the same sort.

Question. How do they regard the copperhead party of the north?

Answer. With exceeding favor. I heard conversations everywhere to the effect that they must unite with that party and acquire strength to overcome the republican party. They seem to be talking about that, and planning about it.

Question. Do they appear to be willing to remain in the Union in the event of the ascendancy of the copperhead party with their assistance? Would that satisfy them?

Answer. I think they expect to remain in the Union at present. They find it very difficult to get out. They seem to have the purpose now of securing their objects in the Union. That is their present plan. What they will do, if unsuccessful within the next few years, is doubtful. I should myself fear another rebellion if they were admitted to all the privileges and powers they once possessed until they manifest a different disposition than they do at present.

Question. What other security does there exist at the south for the permanency of the Union and the government of the United States so great and so strong as the granting of civil and political rights to the black people? What other security so great and so strong as that?

Answer. To my mind that is our only hope. I think that by so doing the States will be brought back gradually to the possession of their old position, and the country will go on safely. This is certainly my hope.

Question. But to withhold those rights from the blacks would be, in your judgment, to weaken the bonds of the Union in that part of the country?

Answer. I think so, decidedly. I should like to have appended to this examination my report on schools made to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, as it contains facts and statistics of interest.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, sir.

Witness handed to the committee a copy of the report referred to, which is appended to his examination, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, D. C., January 1, 1866.

GENERAL: In obedience to your Special Order No. 84, appointing me inspector of schools and of finances for freedmen, I have the honor to report—

That I left Washington on the 6th day of October last, and travelled through all the States south, below Tennessee and this side of the Mississippi river.

The cities and large towns visited were Baltimore, Maryland; Hampton, Norfolk, Petersburg, and Richmond, Virginia; Newbern, Goldsborough, and Wilmington, North Carolina; Florence, Charleston, and Beaufort, South Carolina; Savannah, Augusta, and Atlanta, Georgia; Fernandina, Jacksonville, and Tallahassee, Florida; Mobile and Montgomery, Alabama; Jackson, Vicksburg, and Natchez, Mississippi; and New Orleans, Louisiana—most of these places both on my outward and returning journey. My whole tour extended over four thousand miles of travel. Going by land I was enabled to see, along the line, and by excursions into the interior and to the islands, much of the freedmen's condition upon the plantations. I also went among the colored troops, as I could find them in their various regimental encampments, or as detailed in companies on special duty.

SCHOOLS.

The desire of the freedmen for knowledge has not been over-stated. This comes from several causes:

1. The natural thirst for knowledge common to all men.
2. They have seen power and influence among white people always coupled with learning. It is the sign of that elevation to which they now aspire.
3. Its mysteries, hitherto hidden from them in written literature, excites to the special study of books.
4. Their freedom has given wonderful stimulus to all effort, indicating a vitality which augurs well for their future condition and character.
5. But especially the practical business of life now upon their hands shows at once their need of an education. This they all feel and acknowledge; hence their unusual welcome and attendance upon schools is confined to no one class or age. Those advanced in life throw up their hands at first in despair, but a little encouragement places even these as pupils at the alphabet. Such as are in middle life—the laboring class—gladly avail themselves of the evening and Sabbath schools. They may be often seen during the intervals of toil, when off duty as servants, on steamboats, along the railroads, and when unemployed in the streets of the city or on the plantations, with some fragment of a spelling-book in their hands earnestly at study. Regiments of colored soldiers have nearly all made improvement in learning. In some of them, where but few knew their letters at first, nearly every man can now read, and many of them write. In other regiments one-half or two-thirds can do this.

The officers of such regiments deserve great credit for their efforts in this respect. The one hundred and twenty-eighth United States colored troops, at Beaufort, I found with regularly detailed teachers from the line officers, a neat camp school-house erected by the regiment, and the colonel, with great interest, superintending the whole arrangement. Chaplains have also been the school-masters of their respective regiments with much success, and greatly increasing their usefulness. Even in hospitals I discovered very commendable efforts at such elementary instruction. In the above camp and hospital work the teachers of the northern associations were found helping. But the great movement is among the children of the usual school age, and who are now otherwise wholly unemployed. Their parents, if at all intelligent, everywhere encourage them to study. Your officers in all ways add their influence, and it is a fact, not always true of children, that among those recently from bondage, the school-house, however rough and uncomfortable, is, of all other places, the most attractive, the average attendance being nearly equal to that usually found at the north. For instance, in the District of Columbia the daily attendance at the white schools is but forty-one per cent., while at the colored schools of the District it is seventy-five per cent. In the State of New York the daily attendance at the public schools is forty-three per cent. At the colored schools in the city of Memphis it is seventy-two per cent. In the whole State of Alabama it is seventy-nine per cent. and in Virginia eighty-two per cent. The most thorough attendance at public schools at the north is probably in the city of Boston, where it is ninety-three per cent. In the comparison, therefore, schools of colored children do not suffer (especially when we consider lax government at home, and opportunities for truancy) with the most vigorous system found among our own children. Love of their books is universally apparent. Dull and stupid ones there are, but a very common punishment for misdemeanor is the threat of being kept at home for a day. The threat in most cases is sufficient.

TOTAL UNDER INSTRUCTION.

The whole number of pupils in the colored schools of the eleven States lately in insurrection, and including Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, up to the last date of reports, namely, December 1, is ninety thousand five hundred and eighty-nine. Teachers, one thousand three hundred and fourteen. Schools, seven hundred and forty. These numbers have increased, rather than diminished, since that date.

The above schools are sustained, under your superintendence, by the various benevolent associations of the north, with the exception of a few in charge of tax commissioners, and those in Louisiana, until recently supported by a military tax on the people of the State. But these associations are indebted to the government for transportation of teachers and of school furniture, for military protection, and in many cases for the occupation of buildings in possession of the bureau. The loyal people of the country will, it is believed, do much more of this philanthropic work if they can be furnished with the needed accommodations and protection. Most of the school-houses, churches, and other property hitherto occupied by them have now been returned to their former owners, and this immense system of education must fail or be greatly crippled unless permanent real estate for their use can in some way be secured.

The above associations would in many cases erect buildings with their own funds if they could obtain land on which to do it.

VIRGINIA.

The best schools in this State are at Hampton and Norfolk and the adjacent plantations where the field could be occupied soon after the war commenced. Attainment in all the branches of a common education has been most commendable, and no abatement of zeal or slackening of progress is apparent among scholars most advanced. The higher classes are destined to go still higher if opportunity is afforded them.

In other parts of Virginia these educating efforts have commenced more recently, but with equal promise. By the efforts of your excellent assistant commissioner at Richmond, schools in their first stages are now instituted in all parts of the State. The whole number of colored children under instruction at the present time is twelve thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight (12,898) pupils, in ninety (90) schools, with one hundred and ninety-five (195) teachers, and the reports of the State superintendent are full and satisfactory.

Aside from these colored schools, I found at Richmond a very good school for indigent white children, under the care of the American Union commission, numbering three hundred and seventy-five (375) pupils, with five teachers, and fifty (50) adults in an evening school. In addition to this, the old provost marshal building, General Winder's former headquarters, is now being fitted up for seven schools for poor white children, an industrial school, and a public reading-room. The lower and the middling classes of the white population of the city favor this movement.

In Petersburg and Fredericksburg, each, the commission has a similar school, the former numbering eighty (80) and the latter one hundred and fifty (150) pupils.

NORTH CAROLINA.

In this State there are schools well advanced at Newbern and vicinity, having had for the same reason as above time for thorough organization and progress. A vigorous system has been more recently arranged throughout the whole State into which children and even adults are crowding, making a constant demand for the opening of new schools; a general desire for education is everywhere manifested. In some instances, as in Halifax county, very good schools were found taught and paid for by the colored people themselves. Said a gentleman to me, "I constantly see in the streets and on the door-steps opposite my dwelling groups of little negroes studying their spelling-books." The aggregate for the whole State is, schools eighty-six, (86,) teachers one hundred and nineteen, (119,) pupils eight thousand five hundred and six, (8,506.) The increase of scholars during the four weeks previous to this summary was one thousand four hundred and fifty-three. We note the gratifying fact that while there is this general increase, the attendance in the large towns is decreasing—showing that the tide of colored population is now setting strongly toward the rural districts where labor is called for, and where they will have permanent settlement in life. An industrial school on Roanoke island is in successful operation. In Raleigh and Wilmington there are schools for poor white children, numbering in both places two hundred and fifty attendants.

SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA.

In the city of Charleston the free colored people during the existence of slavery were, under various restrictions, permitted to have schools. The consequence was that some of that class were quite well educated. When the late emancipation came these schools were at once enlarged, and by the aid of northern benevolence became very soon unusually interesting; opposition of the citizens was rather to the occupying of their public school-houses by the negroes, than to their education itself.

The whites had seen in former years that free negroes were elevated in character by having learning, and it may be well to state that of the seventy-six (76) teachers in South Carolina at the present time, twenty-five (25) are natives, twenty-four (24) being colored persons. It will undoubtedly be true that as prejudice wears away white persons of the south will be willing to engage in this well paid and useful service. And as intelligence increases colored teachers will also become more numerous. The happy effect of mingling in one common and honorable employment persons from opposite sections of the country, and also of different colors, is apparent. The accomplished head master of the largest school in Charleston, numbering eight hundred and fifty (850) in daily attendance, is a colored man. In all parts of the State schools are multiplying; the whole number being forty-eight, (48,) not as large as might be expected, but some of them are immense in attendance. Two in Charleston register over eight hundred (800) pupils each, and fifteen (15) others in the State from one hundred and ten (110) to three hundred and seventy-two (372) each. I visited the principal of these schools, and can say that many hundreds of pupils bore excellent examination in reading, writing, geography, and English grammar. Some of the schools in the interior are in their first rude stage, and many are deficient in making their regular reports. The whole number of teachers is seventy-six, (76,) and of pupils ten thousand, (10,000.)

Georgia having been under the same assistant commissioner, does not differ much, in the work done and in progress, from South Carolina. The best schools are in Augusta, Macon and Savannah. It would be difficult to discriminate, though in the latter place the effort began earlier. In a very few days after the advent of General Sherman, there were five hundred (500) children under organized instruction in that city. This effort in teaching and expense was undertaken wholly by the colored people themselves. They receive from white friends only advice and encouragement.

These schools still continue, and with improvement quite creditable to the agency by which they are carried on. There are in the State sixty-nine (69) schools, and three thousand six hundred and three (3,603) pupils, with sixty-nine (69) teachers, forty-three (43) of whom are colored persons. The associations of the north are doing well here, as in the other States; but their efforts are crippled for want of buildings. In every place a crowd of pupils can find no adequate accommodation. It is also true that schools are prevented from going into the interior through fear of violence to unprotected teachers; a military police is everywhere needed. At Athens, in this State, the Union commission has a school of refugee white children with ninety-five (95) pupils. At Chatanooga there is an advanced school of this kind recently started.

FLORIDA.

This State is not as far advanced in education as some others, most of it being more sparsely populated and the organization more recent. Notwithstanding, there are good schools in ten of the larger towns, with the same general results as above. In Tallahassee I found five schools gathered and taught by the colored preachers of the place; also a school of interesting girls instructed by a mulatto woman of education, and who said "I intend to make ladies of these girls." They will undoubtedly become teachers. At Fernandina an orphan school of forty (40) little parentless children occupies the mansion formerly owned by General Finlagan; it is a lovely specimen of genuine philanthropy, and the lady principal deserves great credit for her self-denying labors. The total in Florida is thirty schools, nineteen (19) teachers, and nineteen hundred (1,900) pupils.

ALABAMA.

As far as I could learn, there have been but two schools in this State under the care of the assistant commissioner. But these are large, having eight hundred and seventeen (817) pupils enrolled, with fifteen (15) teachers. That at Mobile bears a most rigid examination in all respects; it is well graded, its teachers thorough, and its discipline excellent. The progress made by the majority of the scholars is truly surprising. The school opened in May, 1865, and now there are classes in all the different readers from the pictorial primer to the rhetorical fifth reader; one class is now in fractions of Robinson's arithmetic; one class in intellectual arithmetic reciting in reduction; other classes are well advanced in English grammar and geography; the teachers publish a monthly paper called "The Acorn." This school receives help from the north, but each pupil, if able, is required to pay a small tuition fee of from twenty-five cents to $1 25 per month, no child being excluded on account of poverty. The whole amount received from this tuition has been $1,875 18. The other school is at Montgomery, and is in a very good condition, with three hundred and twenty-five pupils, who pay in the aggregate $118 per month tuition. Arrangements are in progress by your assistant commissioner at Montgomery to have a general system of schools throughout the State. Governor Parsons favors the work, and some white native teachers are willing to engage in it. But in the interior, as is true of all these States, much opposition is manifested, and military protection will for the present be needed, especially if the instructors are to be females. There are also eleven schools in the northern part of the State in the division known as the "Department of the Tennessee," which have hitherto been superintended by the commissioner of Kentucky and Tennessee. These are about to be transferred to the care of the commissioner of Alabama. They are at Huntsville, Athens and Stevenson, and are good schools.

MISSISSIPPI.

There is a mixture of good and evil to report from this State. Your officers are indefatigable in their efforts. There are many good schools among the thirty which have been in operation. Some of these have made admirable progress, and a number, not included in the above, have started, under various auspices, in different parts of the State. There is, everywhere, the usual eagerness to learn; but in some sections "inveterate opposition" among the whites is manifested towards these schools. Two teachers, at the time I was there, were sent to one of the large towns, twenty-five miles into the country, where there was no military, and the next morning they were ordered off, and threatened if they did not go. This opposition is often openly avowed; but more generally is tacit and concealed, making itself felt everywhere in a sort of combination not to allow the freedmen any place in which a school may be taught. A superintendent in an interior town says: "The opposition to negro education is very great in my town and neighborhood." Colored men, in some instances, have paid their own money to prepare and furnish a room for a school, and then have been forbidden to use it; the white people taking it from them for their own children. These same things are true of other States, though in Mississippi such opposition has seemed to be more common than elsewhere; and yet there are redeeming features. Instances of planters have come to our knowledge who are desirous of employing teachers for the freed people. One of your officers states that "many planters are beginning to perceive that schools for the children would be an inducement to laborers to engage with them." General opposition is undoubtedly decreasing. We notice expressions of hope from those who are laboring in the State, and it is clear that a steady system of effort cannot be resisted. As I told one of the planters, "they would find it harder fighting the alphabet and spelling-book than they did Grant and Sherman." He made no reply. There are now sixty-eight (68) teachers in that State, thirty-four (34) schools, and four thousand three hundred and ten (4,310) enrolled pupils. More than half of these are considerably advanced in reading, writing, and arithmetic.

LOUISIANA.

In this State a peculiar and very efficient system was inaugurated by Major General Banks in his General Order No. 38, March 22, 1864. That order created a "board of education for freedmen for the department of the Gulf, with power to establish common schools, employ teachers, erect school-houses, regulate the course of studies, and have generally the same authority that assessors, supervisors, and trustees have in the northern States in the matter of establishing and conducting common schools."

The purpose of the order is stated to be "for the rudimental instruction of the freedmen of the department, placing within their reach those elements of knowledge which give greater intelligence and value to labor."

Previously, the teaching of a negro had been a heinous offence. It is true that the children of free colored people, who were in good circumstances, (known as "creoles," generally of French or Spanish extraction,) when not educated abroad, or from fairness of complexion, by occasional admission to the white schools, were quietly instructed at home or in a very few private schools of their class; but for the poor, even of the free colored people, there was no school.

Almost immediately upon the above order a great system went into operation, and during the last two years there have been about 150 schools for colored children established in this State, giving employment to 265 teachers, and affording instruction to 14,000 children and 5,000 adults, of which latter class more than 1,000 were soldiers. There have been, in New Orleans alone, 19 large schools, employing 104 teachers, with an average attendance of 5,724 pupils. More than 50,000 colored people, as reported by the local superintendent, have been taught to read in that city and immediate vicinity, and now they seem to feel more deeply interested than ever in acquiring knowledge. These are great results. I visited these schools, looked over their records, heard their recitations, saw their excellent discipline, became acquainted with the majority of their intelligent teachers, and feel safe in saying that while no State has had so large an organization, no one has excelled Louisiana in the detailed perfection of their school system. The charges which have been made, that too high salaries were given to teachers, I investigated thoroughly, and found them entirely groundless. The expense of living in Louisiana is enormous.

It may be well to state that quite a number of southern white teachers have been employed. They understand the negro, and their southern origin and education enable them to combat prejudice against his education.

These teachers may not be equal in some respects to those from the north, but their willingness to bear jeers and contempt of friends and kindred, and the practical exclusion from circles which hitherto have received them gladly, entitles them to great consideration. The superintendent has aimed to select the most capable and worthy of these, but has not been unmindful of those whose loyal antecedents and consequent suffering from the rebellion entitle them to sympathy and aid.

Whenever colored teachers, with the requisite ability, have presented themselves, he has made no distinction whatever.

Much opposition has been encountered from those who do not believe in the elevation of the negro. The more, perhaps, as by the "labor order" of General Banks, to obtain his services, they were obliged to help pay for this education. A multitude of facts might be given.

It is the testimony of the superintendent that "if the military power should be withdrawn, and the State once more resume all her functions, our schools would cease to exist, and the whole moral and political influence of the people of Louisiana be brought to bear against them." The constitution of 1864 makes it incumbent on the legislature to provide for the education of colored children; but that constitution is not regarded as the law of the land, and the dominant party demands that it be set aside, as not expressing the will of the people.

A member of the legislature, which was in session while I was at New Orleans, was passing one of the schools with me, having at the time its recess, the grounds about the building being filled with children. He stopped and looked intently, then inquired, "Is this a school?" "Yes," I replied. "What! of niggers!" "These are colored children evidently," I answered. "Well, well," said he, and raising his hands, "I have seen many an absurdity in my lifetime, but this is the climax of absurdities!" I was sure he did not speak for effect, but as he felt. He darted from me like an arrow, and turned the next corner to take his seat with legislators similarly prejudiced.

It was with regret that I learned, while in the State, that the collection of the general tax for colored schools was suspended by military order. The consternation of the colored population was intense. They could not consent to have their children sent away from study, and at once expressed willingness to be assessed for the whole expense. Their part of the ordinary public school tax they were already paying, though not sharing its benefits; but they petitioned General Canby to levy an added tax upon them for their own schools. The New Orleans Tribune (colored daily paper) opposed this on the ground that it was without representation, and so did many of the rich "creoles;" but the middle and lower classes of the freedmen could not be restrained. Petitions began to pour in. I saw one, from the plantations across the river, at least thirty feet in length, representing ten thousand negroes. It was affecting to examine it, and note the names and marks (X) of such a long list of parents, ignorant themselves, but begging that their children might be educated; promising that, from beneath their present burdens and out of their extreme poverty, they would pay for it. I am happy to add that, upon the back of that petition was indorsed the name of your excellent commissioner, General Baird, asking, on behalf of these poor, that their request might be granted. I learn that this matter has not yet been accomplished, and that the schools have been temporarily suspended; the commissioner assuring the freedmen that "by the first of March the system of contracts prescribed for agricultural laborers will begin to yield a revenue," and it is expected that the schools in the country districts may then be re-established. He adds that, "in the cities and towns the mode of maintaining schools has not been so fully decided upon; but the vacation, which has become absolutely necessary from the want of funds, will be of the shortest possible duration." If means, from any quarter, come into the hands of the bureau, I would call attention to the reopening of these interesting schools at the earliest moment. A number of industrial schools have been in progress in New Orleans and with good results.

As I did not visit the States of Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, I will only give the general facts in regard to them, obtained from the several superintendents.

In Texas there are ten day and six night schools for freedmen, under ten teachers, with 1,040 pupils, many of them adults. They are all self-sustaining. Arrangements have been made whereby thirty teachers will soon be obtained, and that number of schools will be organized as soon as books can be procured.

In Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas, under the care of General Sprague, there are 39 schools, 51 teachers, and 3,444 pupils. One school has been recently closed for want of a building.

KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.

The last report from these States gives 75 schools, 264 teachers, and 14,768 pupils. The commissioner says, "In addition to these free schools, the colored people have sustained many independent schools in Louisville, Nashville, Memphis, and Knoxville, largely increasing the above numbers." Several schools have been abandoned, however, lately, for want of suitable buildings, and others from the breaking up of government camps. The cold weather of winter also prevents many from attending. Much opposition has been made to educating the freedmen in some parts of those States, while in a few places (as at Athens, Alabama,) the citizens are said to be "favorable to the schools." There is a constantly increasing demand among the freed people for education. The superintendent testifies that "while the expenditure for educational purposes in this department for the past six months has not been less than $50,000, scarcely a beginning has been made in the great work."

At Nashville a square of land has been purchased by northern associations for sixteen thousand dollars, on which a high school building has been erected for teaching the children of freedmen in all the higher branches. It is expected that this institution will equal in its advantages the best schools in of the same class New England. The building was dedicated on the 9th of January last, and has now 1,100 pupils. A normal department is attached, which will prepare teachers for elementary schools through the whole State.

There is an asylum of colored children at Nashville, with sixty inmates.

A number of teachers for refugee white children have been sent to Tennessee and other places of the west and southwest. This has been done on application from the citizens of those sections. The effect of such schools is not only to benefit the children, but to produce fraternity of feeling with us among the people generally, especially the common classes. The wealthy and aristocratic look upon this effort with less favor.

In Maryland I made a brief inspection, though this State is not fully under your jurisdiction. The "Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of the Colored People" has sixteen flourishing schools in Baltimore, numbering, day and night, 1,957 pupils. They occupy seven buildings, and employ sixteen teachers, three of whom are colored. These schools are now crowded to their utmost capacity, and would be much larger if room could be obtained. In the several counties of the State this association has 18 schools, with 19 teachers and 1,110 pupils, 14 of whom are colored. The colored people have aided these county schools the last year by paying $2,000 of the expenses themselves. All these schools bear an excellent examination. The society of Friends has an evening school in Baltimore of 40 draymen and porters, taught by young men of the society, and who are making good progress. These Friends also aid the above association.

The American Missionary Association have five schools in Maryland, two in Baltimore and three in the country, under the care of seven teachers. With their evening schools and classes of older people they have from 600 to 700 under their instruction. All their schools are doing well.

Besides these there are seven schools in Baltimore, solely under the management of the colored people, taught and paid for by their own money. These contain, in all, 319 pupils, a considerable number of whom are adults. This is an interesting effort, and shows what the colored population will do themselves, even alongside of schools both well taught and gratuitous. In the Douglas (colored) institute, which is on a permanent foundation, the children are generally from the working classes, and their parents pay for tuition from $1 to $1.50 per month.

I found two schools in Baltimore, which have been going on more than ten years, supported from a legacy given by Nelson Willis, a colored man, having seventy-five scholars in daily attendance.

The educational work in Maryland has had much opposition, such as "stoning children and teacher at Easton," "rough handling and blackening the teacher at Cambridge," "indignation meeting in Dorchester county, with resolutions passed to drive out the teacher," and the "burning of church and school-house at Willington, Kent county." "A guard had to be placed over the school-house at Annapolis," &c.

Colored churches have also been burned in Cecil, Queen Ann, and Somerset counties, to prevent schools being opened in them, all showing that negro hate is by no means confined to the low south.

I have thus been somewhat particular in regard to Maryland, because you are without regular official reports from that State.

In the District of Columbia there are reported 45 schools, 100 teachers, and 5,191 pupils. Some thousands of these are good readers, and also are in English grammar, geography, arithmetic, and higher branches. One thousand eight hundred and fifty-four are learning to write, and only 1,097 are still in the alphabet. There are nine other schools not reported, having 500 or 600 pupils. Twenty-one night schools are in operation, with 1,200 pupils, and, besides Sabbath schools attached to all the colored churches, there are 25 such schools connected with this bureau in a flourishing condition, having 2,320 pupils. A number of industrial schools have been started, one of which made during the last month 162 garments; another has made 100 articles of clothing. The last is a school of adult women. This whole work is a vast improvement upon the state of things here, as some of us well remember only a few months since. The superintendent, Mr. Kimbell, says, "all the teachers seem to be earnest and hopeful." One writes, "I find the children are very much like white ones, some stupid, others bright. They are rather more eager for learning, because it has been forbidden fruit to them."

The order and general character of many of these schools in Washington has much improved of late. One of them, situated in the heart of the city, and therefore open to much observation, was, a few months ago, declared a "nuisance" by the neighbors; now no complaint is made and even much praise is elicited by the good conduct of the children.

Eight or ten self-supporting schools, taught by colored teachers, numbering at least 500 scholars, are also in operation here in the district. Some of these appear remarkably well. There is an association of all the teachers of the schools with 100 members; in their monthly meetings reports are made and questions of mutual interest are discussed, and in this way the general character of the schools is constantly improved.

Thus I have given a sketch (meager, indeed, as all the facts and incidents would make a volume) of the system of education for the refugees and freedmen which has been under the general supervision of this bureau.

I may be permitted to say that from my personal observations much more is being done than finds its way into the above statistics. There are many schools not reported; evening schools for adults, of great utility, are becoming very numerous. Often they are conducted by volunteer friends of the colored man, and with a modesty which forbids making public mention of their work. Sabbath schools among freedmen have been opened throughout the wholesouth, all of them giving elementary instruction and reaching thousands who cannot attend the week-day teaching. These are not usually included in the regular returns. They are often spoken of with special interest by superintendents; indeed, one of the most thrilling spectacles which he who visits the southern country now witnesses in cities and often upon plantations, is the large schools gathered upon the Sabbath day, sometimes of many hundreds, dressed in clean Sunday garments, with eyes sparkling, intent on elementary and Christian instruction. The management of some of these is admirable—after the fashion of the best Sunday schools of white children with faithful teachers—the majority of whom, it will be often noticed, are colored. I do not, therefore, doubt that the footing, as given from the several States in the first part of this report, of 90,589 pupils, would be, if all was told, swollen to at least 100,000, who are now under effective instruction.

Another great feature of this educational movement remains to be noticed, and which will add a very important item to even this number. Throughout the entire south an effort is being made by the colored people to educate themselves. In the absence of other teaching they are determined to be self-taught, and everywhere some elementary text-book, or fragment of one, may be seen in the hands of negroes. They quickly communicate to each other what they already know, so that with very little learning many take to teaching. A willingness, even an ambition, to bear expenses, is also noticed. They often say, "We want to show how much we can do ourselves if you will only give us a chance."

This may seem to be an overstatement to those who doubt the character of the negro, not that they are ungrateful or unwilling to be helped, but so universal is the feeling I am describing, that it seems as if some unseen influence was inspiring them to that intelligence which they now so immediately need. Individuals are not only seen at study, and under the most untoward circumstances, but in very many places I have found what I will call "native schools," often rude and very imperfect; but there they are, a group, perhaps of all ages, trying to learn; some young man, some woman, or old preacher, in collar or shed, or corner of a negro meeting-house, with the alphabet in hand or a torn spelling-book, is their teacher. All are full of enthusiasm with the new knowledge the book is imparting to them.

Again, I saw schools, shall I call them, of somewhat higher order. A deserted house has been obtained; there is some organization and awkward classifying larger members, better books, with tolerable exhibition of easy reading. A sample of such I met at Goldsborough, North Carolina; two young colored men, who but a little time before commenced to learn themselves, had gathered one hundred and fifty pupils, all quite orderly and hard at study. A small tuition fee was charged and they needed books. These teachers told me that no white man, before me, had ever come near them. At Halifax was a similar school, the first of any kind which had been opened in that county since the war.

A still higher order of this native teaching is seen in the colored schools at Charleston, Savannah and New Orleans; with many disadvantages they bear a very good examination.

One I visited in the latter city, of 300 pupils, and wholly taught by educated colored men, would bear comparison with any ordinary school at the north. Not only good reading and spelling was heard, but lessons at the black-board in arithmetic, recitations in geography and English grammar; very creditable specimens of writing were shown, and all the older classes could read or recite as fluently in French as in English. This was a free school, wholly supported by the colored people of the city, and the children were from the common classes of families. They have six select schools where a better class attend. Such are not by any means common; but all the above cases illustrate the remark that this educational movement among the freedmen has in it a self-sustaining element. I took special pains to ascertain the fact on this particular point, and have to report that there are schools of this kind in some stage of advancement, taught and supported wholly by the people themselves, in all the large places I visited, often numbers of them, and they are also making their appearance through the interior of the entire country. The superintendent of South Carolina assured me that there was not a place of any size in the whole of that State but where there was an attempt at such a school. I have much testimony from those well informed, both oral and written, that the same is true of other States. There can scarcely be a doubt, and I venture the estimate that at least 500 schools of this description are already in operation throughout the south. If, therefore, all these be added, and including soldiers and individuals at study, we shall have at least one hundred and twenty-five thousand as the educational census of this lately emancipated people. This is a wonderful state of things. We have just emerged from a terrible war; peace is not yet declared; there is scarcely the beginning of reorganized society at the south, and yet here is a people, long imbruted by slavery and the most despised of any on earth, whose chains are no sooner broken than they spring to their feet and start up an exceeding great army, clothing themselves with intelligence. What other people on earth have even shown, while in their ignorance, such a passion for education?

It is also seen that the children of the poor whites of the south are very ready to receive instruction, and that already considerable has been done for them.

The conclusions forced upon us from the above facts are—

1. The experiment of educating the freedmen proves to be successful, and that the ignorant whites may be greatly benefited. It only remains to carry on with confidence the work so well begun.

That colored children can, at once, compete with white children, who from the first have had high advantages, need not be said. It is enough that with early bad habits, bad example, and wholly unpracticed in study, they seize upon books gladly and learn rapidly. As well endowed naturally or not, we certainly see in the majority the same brightness, the same quick ambition, as with children of the more favored color, and stimulated as they are by the novelty of study, there is at present an actual progress scarcely to be paralleled anywhere. In advanced studies or at a more mature age, pupils give no signs of having reached the limit to their capacity. I have discovered hesitation in their plans for using education. Their ardor is dampened by the well-known aversion to their hereafter occupying high position; but always when assured that as character and intelligence increase, ways and means of usefulness will be opened, they are ready to push on to new and harder tasks.

When I have told the higher classes in the schools that they will be wanted as teachers, at least of their own color, a new stimulus is seen at once to come over them, and their instructors have always assured me that such promises had inspired intense ambition.

It is probable that the tastes and temperament of the race, which are peculiar, certainly, will lead in special directions. They may not excel in the inventive power, or abstract science; perhaps not in mathematics, though we have seen commendable ciphering in colored schools; but they certainly are emotional, imitative and affectionate; are graphic and figurative in language; have conceptions of beauty and of song, and already become skilled mechanics and even artists. If so, then, why are not this people destined to honor labor, gladden social life, and when sufficiently cultivated, to enlarge art, invest ideas in harmony and beauty, give hearty good cheer to religious faith, and thus add important elements to the more perfect civilization of the coming time?

As to improvement at an advanced age, we find individuals vigorously attempting it, and many are succeeding. Colored troops have shown aptness to discipline, courage never more to be questioned, and under exceeding disadvantage a large proportion of them have become comparatively educated. A paymaster in Louisiana made the public statement that "a far greater proportion of the colored troops, which he paid off at the close of the war, signed their names than of the white troops raised in the south."

The interest which the soldiers of the colored regiments have taken in learning to read is well illustrated by the following statement made by an army surgeon in New Orleans:

About a year ago he was stationed at Fort Livingston with colored troops, and soon after his arrival, finding that his time was very little employed proportionally, he began to look around to see what he could do. Finally, the thought occurred that he might be useful in teaching the soldiers to read. He proposed the subject to the officers and they laughed and sneered at it. Concluding that their advice was not needed, he called the soldiers and talked with them, one after another, and finding that they largely accepted the proposition, he made the following arrangement: He agreed to pick out a class of ten of the brightest and smartest soldiers in the fort and spend two hours a day in teaching them how to read, provided each of this ten would take a class of four and spend the same amount of time with them. Books were soon procured and a little school started on this method. The soldiers kept their agreement. While being taught by him they taught one another, and in a few days many of them could begin to read. When the experiment proved an undoubted success the soldiers procured a competent teacher from the board of education and had a regular school established under its auspices. A short time since the commanding officer of the fort told the doctor that the soldiers, who were his A B C pupils one year ago, now took over forty copies of Harper's and Frank Leslie's weeklies, besides other papers.

2. The good influence of the schools upon all the habits of the freedmen is apparent. As the children repeat their lessons at home parents become thoughtful, acquire many new ideas, and are led to prize their families who are thus increasing in knowledge. They make new exertions for self-support, especially for these schools, insuring both industry and economy. At Little Rock, Arkansas, after paying tuition some months, the colored people formed a school society for the city and made their schools free for the rest of the year, (the first free school in Arkansas,) paying in full the compensation of all the teachers. Besides elementary instruction, our schools teach morality and christianity, and thus, through the children, are waking up a general conscience and guiding the entire population in the ways of virtue. That class of older colored persons, having now a little learning, are stimulated to increase it by study. A group of elderly preachers in Savannah said to me with much emphasis, "We must now go to studying ourselves or these young people will all be ahead of us." They begged me earnestly to adopt a plan by which they might be brought into a class for mutual improvement.

3. The white population of the south feel the power of these schools. The major part are indignant indeed that negroes should have learning. All sorts of evil is predicted as the consequence; but a portion of this enmity is provoked by the rivalry which their own children must now struggle with. The poor whites are excited by hearing negroes read while they are ignorant, and it is my belief that they will now receive schools, if furnished them, as never before. The educated classes are not slow to perceive that their schools must be reopened or fall behind humiliated, and that new schools must now be organized on a more popular plan than heretofore. Poverty, and perhaps pride, with the want of teachers, as the public feeling now is, are the present difficulties in carrying out these convictions. Some of the religious denominations in the south, seeing there will be schools for the freedmen, are saying, "We may as well undertake the work ourselves," and have already passed resolutions adopting the education of the negroes as one of their missionary operations.

4. A class of schools is called for in which colored teachers can be taught. If dignified by the name of normal schools, they should be for training in the simplest elements of the art. The system of education for the freedmen, as a whole, must be at first very rudimental, in which the text will be found mainly in the spelling-book, and which can become, as soon as possible, universal. This people are not like pagans in ancient countries, who a thousand years hence will be mainly as they are to-day. Slaves, even in a country like this, could not be kept from many noble impulses. The war has been to them a wonderful school of knowledge and thought and of purposes, and now suddenly emancipated, these 4,000,000 are "as a nation born in a day." This great multitude rise up simultaneously and ask for an education. With it, they will at once start upward in all character; without it, they will as quickly sink into the depravities of ignorance and vice. Free to be what they please, and in the presence of only bad example, they will be carried away with every species of evil; and then, what is the actual and astounding fact? One that startles philanthropy itself. A million at least of these four millions, and mainly the rising generation, are to-day ready to engage in the study of books; they cannot well be put off. Considerations, political, social, financial, and moral, all ask that their demand be promptly met. If this million be divided into schools of fifty each we need for its supply twenty thousand teachers. Where are they to come from? The north can supply a few thousands. Perhaps the more noble here and there in the south will help us; but still at least fifteen thousand remain to be supplied from some other quarter. The great impulse to teach, among these freed people themselves, with readiness to pay expenses, gives to us the solution of this problem. If they can be, by some short method at first, helped on in study and perfected in what they already know; taught how to teach the same, how also to organize, classify, and govern a school, many thus prepared could be sent out in a very few months to commence the work. Successive classes prepared more thoroughly would follow, and, with the certificate of their instructors, no difficulty would be found in obtaining employment. I have never known among the freedmen the offer of a teacher which was not accepted.

The benefits of this plan would be—

1. Such native teachers would go everywhere with very little opposition. The interior of States could be penetrated where now no white teacher can go.
2. The freedmen would mainly support these schools themselves. If school-houses were furnished they would need no other charity.
3. The elevating effort of this plan would be universal. The better class of youth among the freedmen would at once see an honorable employment open to them. The present schools would be stimulated with the same idea, and those of a higher grade could imitate this plan and have a normal class into which their better pupils could go.

4. It could be shown in this way what the freedmen are, as by their own efforts. This opportunity they deserve. A development system, bringing out what they can do themselves, is far better than a perpetual pauperizing, which only shows what others can do for them. If they are to be men let them be self-educated. Calumny from their worst enemies will grow silent when this is successfully commenced.

If such a system could be instituted at all the central points of the south, we could, ere long, approximate the great teaching demand now felt. This does not imply that the better schools of northern associations could not all go on and be greatly increased. The large cities and towns where they now are need them. They could rise still higher in grade, preparing pupils for all the spheres of life, and help immensely in the plan I am now advocating.

On this plan I feel sure that in a few years the whole education of the freedmen could be made self-supporting, and by that time the white population would perhaps be willing to incorporate them into some great common school system for the State. What should prevent this when these freedmen become intelligent and it was seen that they were no longer to be a public burden?

Labor also would feel the impulse. Its effects would be felt by the employer. Negroes now crowd into large towns, where their children can have learning. If they are to be retained as laborers, or brought back, similar opportunities must be furnished on the plantations. Hence already many instances could be given where a school in the interior has been started only from this motive. This is now being stipulated in the contracts. Liberal-minded and northern men who are preparing for crops are earnestly asking that schools be established, knowing that they concentrate and keep the people content, and greatly stimulate industry, and especially that labor is valuable just as it becomes intelligent. The head of one of the largest of the timber and turpentine enterprises in South Carolina (a German) told me that he formerly had hired only men; but he had now learned that he must have their families, too, and that this could only be done by allowing them patches of land, treating them properly, paying them well, and giving them schools. The commissioners and superintendents of schools in several of the States have been consulted on this subject, and they will give it their unqualified approval. Attempts are already making at several points to inaugurate something of the kind, either by these officers of the bureau or by northern benevolence; but a systematic plan is called for, and would very easily be carried into effect.

In Tennessee nearly one hundred colored teachers are at different places in a course of training. The superintendent says: "This should be the great object aimed at in the education of this people. Ten good training schools for colored teachers," he adds, "should be established in every one of the southern States, and in a few years the great demand for teachers could be met." His circular letter to the teachers of the State I beg leave here to insert:

"1. Select all the most advanced and intelligent of your pupils, say — in number.

"2. From this class you will select all those of sufficient age, advancement, good moral character, and requisite natural qualifications for teachers.

"3. These you will organize into a separate class, for the purpose of special drill in their studies, with a view of fitting them speedily as possible for teaching.

"4. You will report to this office the names, age, advancement of each member, time of organization, character, and amount of instruction given this class, as soon as the organization is completed.

"The foregoing plan is sent you with a request that you will, at as early a day as practicable, organize such a class in your schools, with a view to supplying the great demand for trained colored teachers as soon as possible."

5. The people of the country are strongly seconding the educating efforts of this bureau. Northern associations were in the field almost as soon as our conquering armies gave them a foothold. They have increased in numbers and in arduous, well-directed efforts. Their several corps of teachers deserve all praise for self-sacrifice and fidelity. Your appointment of State superintendents of schools has given organic unity to these efforts, and greatly enhanced their efficiency; popular donations are rapidly increasing, and you may rely upon the continuance of sympathy and the increase of this important aid. The text-books used by the associations should be more uniform, and more promptness is desirable in the making of monthly reports. Time will perfect these details.

6. In conclusion, permit me distinctly to call attention to the fact that this whole educational movement among the freedmen must for the present be protected by the general government. I need not repeat what appears all through this report. Military force alone can save many of our schools from being broken up, or enable us to organize new schools. Such is the turbulent spirit of the south, that where as yet there have been no atrocities attempted against the schools, protecting power is called for to give that sense of quiet and consciousness of security which the calm duties of both teacher and pupil require.

FINANCES OF FREEDMEN.

Poor and dependent as most of the freedmen are, I found that a considerable number had money. Among the former free people many had reached a condition above want, and in the large towns and cities there are individuals who might be called rich. These men, in some cases, purchased themselves from slavery, and are mechanics, keepers of groceries and wood-yards, butchers, market men and women, owning their own dwellings in the town or its suburbs, and some with small plantations. In Louisiana there are colored creoles who are merchants, bankers, and large planters, each handling hundreds of thousands of dollars. On the bayous back of Baton Rouge there are a number of the colored planters each said to be worth near half a million. These men are enterprising, are destined to increase in numbers and in wealth, and they seem to act unitedly and strongly for the education and advancement of the whole colored race.

Even the lower class of free blacks and the slaves had laid aside small sums of money, usually in coin, and this is now found in some secret box or old stocking, blackened with rust, no longer kept hid from fear, but cheerfully used for what they need in freedom. A considerable number had been persuaded to place these funds in the former savings banks of the south. Many thousands of dollars of such money went to Richmond to sustain the confederacy, to be lost forever to this abused people. One colored church in Savannah had two thousand dollars thus deposited.

But there are multitudes who as yet know nothing of thrift. Slavery prevented all forecasting of thought, and in general every possibility of improvement. Now, however, a change has come. There are, indeed, those who are too debauched and brutalized, perhaps, ever to be recovered. Their minds are childish and dark. But pay for labor puts even these to thinking of the value of things. The wants and opportunities of freedom show the worth of money and what can be done with it. Time, however, will be needed for the whole effect. Much patient instruction is called for. But in every direction industry is seen to start under the impulse of prompt reward, and if kind treatment accompanies it, there will soon be on this whole subject little to complain of.

Already homesteads are being purchased, and many more would be, if there was opportunity. The freedmen have a passion for land. Where titles can be obtained they are always purchasers. The tax commissioners of South Carolina told me they had given over six hundred "certificates of title" to real estate to colored men.

I know one man on St. Helena island, a slave formerly on an adjoining plantation, who now owns a farm of three hundred and fifteen acres, works twenty laborers, has twelve cows, a yoke of oxen, four horses, twenty swine, and he showed me, with very pardonable pride, his fifty-eight acres of the best sea-island cotton I saw anywhere, fifty-two acres of corn, besides a number of acres of provision crops. He had been helped some by the Union officer to whom he had for a year or more in the war been a servant; but he expected soon to be wholly out of debt. This man could neither read nor write, and his children aided him in his accounts. There are a number of men on Edisto and the other sea-islands who are only waiting the action of government in permitting them to have lands to engage in similar operations.

Such examples as the above encourage the negroes around, however poor, to form provident habits, and to imitate the same thrift. It is the universal impression that freedom is to be coupled with prosperity, and it is not difficult to induce them to save their surplus earnings for accumulation and future use.

I found that the large crowds of negroes whom I often addressed sprang forward to ideas of industry and economy, that they might save for old age, for sickness, for purchasing homesteads, or other prosperity in the future.

Their notion of having land given to them by government is passing away, and we hear them saying, "We will work and save and buy for ourselves." When they know this is what their prosperous friends (the Yankees) have always done they seem eager to follow the example.

Much fraud has been practiced in bargains and contracts hitherto made with their old masters. Some of the contracts, as drawn by the planters themselves, were purposely constructed to be misunderstood. I saw one in which it was stipulated one-third of seventwelfths of all corn, potatoes, fodder, &c., shall go to the laborers, &c.; another that "the party violating the contract shall forfeit his right to all services and wages." It will be seen at once how blind in the first case and unjust in the second these terms were to the poor negro.

In many places, last autumn, laborers were turned off without pay, or any portion of the crops; and in other cases four or five dollars only a month were given, or even only food and clothing. The plan of these oppressors was evidently to keep the negroes in a perpetual condition of poverty and dependence. There were exceptions, of course, and I am happy to report great improvement of late in the wages given. The present year opens with the prospect that labor will be everywhere in demand and at fair prices. This is owing, in part, to the high value of the great staples of the south, and the desire of a large crop, but much more to the efforts of your bureau officers, who have everywhere insisted on just compensation.

The lien on crops for wages, or work on shares, to be had, of course, only at the end of the year, may be necessitated by the present poverty of the planters; but, in our opinion, it would be much better for the freedman if he could be paid often and in money. His immediate wants could then be met; he would work far more contentedly; and he would the sooner learn how to manage properly his own finances.

Colored troops have been defrauded of very large sums of money. I have spent much time and labor in ascertaining this. Almost universally the regiments complain—often unreasonably, without doubt, and from ignorance; though it would seem that they have reason, in some respects, to complain that, by the government itself, they have not been treated precisely as if they had been white men. These frauds are charged by the soldiers mainly to the bounty agents of the several States, or to enlisting and disbursing officers, and sometimes to their own regimental officers.

Moneys were undoubtedly sent by States to procure enlisted men, which only in part reached these men. They were made merchandise of, while the agent enriched himself by the balance retained. This class of frauds can probably never be effectively detected. The colored soldier was, in many cases, ignorant of money, and the bounty agent will make no confession.

Enlisting and disbursing officers had many opportunities of pocketing funds, by keeping them back from the soldier unduly, or taking them from him as in trust; the enlisted man being, as was alleged, in no condition to keep the same. Such funds, of course, were put upon a very precarious tenure, the trustee himself being only a military officer. There are facts which lead to the suspicion that some of these officers are deeply and largely implicated in this species of fraud.

Officers of regiments have borrowed money largely of their men. This is a very common practice, and pay-day for them, in multitudes of cases, has never come. The officer may be profligate or dishonest, or if otherwise, he is off on furlough; it may be mustered out of service; and it is easy to forget borrowed money, especially when due the negro. I know of many cases of such indebtedness.

I need not say how suttlers often defraud; nor tell of gamblers, rum-sellers, and bad women, who hang about camps and pay tables, luring the unwary, and robbing these ignorant and yet brave colored men. This is a humiliating statement, and there should be some remedy. Of course, if the troops are mustered out such evils must cease, and others are being corrected. Those officers who are honest and able are recently paying back borrowed funds; others are promising to do so; but there are large sums which cannot yet be touched by the proper owners. I gathered, by your direction, papers and testimony in a number of notorious instances, and have given copies of the same to the financial officer of the bureau, action having been taken thereon which it is hoped will result in the detection of the guilty. Such action, however, as now pending, prevents my giving names or going into any specific detail.

It is respectfully suggested that a standing commission, empowered to call for persons and papers, and with transportation to all parts of the country, should be appointed by the War Department, to pursue every case of this kind of fraud to a final issue.

The Savings and Trust Company for Freedmen, chartered by Congress last winter and placed under your advisement, has gone into successful operation in nearly all the States south, and promises to do much to instruct and elevate the financial notions of the freedmen. The trustees and friends of the institution believe that the industry of these 4,000,000 furnishes a solid basis for its operations. Pauperism can be brought to a close; the freedmen made self-supporting and prosperous, paying for their educational and Christian institutions, and helping to bear the burdens of government, by inducing habits of saving in what they earn. That which savings-banks have done for the working men of the north it is presumed they are capable of doing for these laborers.

I was charged by you, in my late tour, with this subject, and can say that everywhere, privately and publicly, the freedmen welcomed the institution. They understand our explanation of its meaning, and the more intelligent see and appreciate fully its benefits. Calls were made upon me at all the large towns for branches of the bank. In fifteen of the more central places, viz., Washington, Richmond, Norfolk, Newbern, Wilmington, Charleston, Beaufort, Savannah, Mobile, New Orleans, Vicksburg, Huntsville, Nashville, Memphis, and Louisville, such branches were established. Most of these begin to make returns.

I here insert the report of the actuary at the principal office in New York of the business condition of the institution on the 31st day of January, and the amount done during that month:

Amount due depositors December 31, 1865.....	$201, 126 55
Amount of deposits received at branches during January—
Vicksburg.....	$5, 087 00
Wilmington.....	902 44
Norfolk.....	491 20
Newbern.....	5 00
Louisville.....	4, 895 15
Huntsville.....	390 22
Memphis.....	620 00

Nashville.....	$4,259 96
Washington.....	4,369 05
Savannah.....	1,579 55
Mobile.....	4,809 00
Charleston.....	424 15
Richmond.....	170 15
Beaufort.....	498 20
		$23,531 07
Less drafts paid depositors during the month.....		229,657 62
		54,704 90
Balance due depositors.....		174,952 72
Balance on hand at branches.....	17,132 43
Balance on hand at New York.....	6,577 83
United States securities.....	181,600 00
		205,310 26
Surplus (on the books).....		30,357 54

But $15,000 to $20,000 of this surplus is only in statements, or drafts which have not been received at the principal office in New York, and contingent expenses not paid. Hence the true surplus, as near as we can estimate it at the present stage of affairs, (our securities being valued at par,) is about $10,000.

A dividend of 5 per cent. per annum has been declared on all sums which have been on deposit six months previous to January 1, 1866.

The trustees are encouraged from this auspicious beginning of their work to go forward with high hopes of large benefit to these millions of freedmen "and their descendants;" and if the amendment to their charter, now before Congress, shall pass, connecting the bank more intimately with your bureau, they will entertain no doubt of its perfect success.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. W. ALVORD,
Inspector of Schools and Finances.

Major General O. O. HOWARD,
Commissioner Bureau Refugees, &c.

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1866.

Bedford Brown sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD :

Question. Where do you reside ?

Answer. In Caswell county, North Carolina.

Question. Are you a native of North Carolina ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. What is your age ?

Answer. I am in my seventy-first year.

Question. What public positions have you held since you have been a citizen of North Carolina ?

Answer. I was a member of the legislature of our State, speaker of the senate at one time, then a member of the Senate of the United States for eleven or twelve years.

Question. Since you retired from the Senate have you held public office in North Carolina ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; in the legislature of the State.

Question. Have you held any judicial position ?

Answer. None, sir.

Question. Have you resided in North Carolina during the late rebellion ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How extensive is your acquaintance with the state of public feeling among the people of North Carolina in reference to the war, its causes, and its results ?

Answer. It is pretty general. I was a member of the State senate when the subject was first brought under consideration in 1860.

Question. Have you taken any personal part in the war against the United States ?

Answer. None, voluntarily. I was a member of the State senate for some years. After the war commenced I declined being a candidate ; I desired to take no part in it ; but my constituents insisted on my going back, although I positively declined. I was a member of the convention of 1861 which passed the ordinance of secession, but was sent there contrary to my will. I was a candidate in my county in the election ordered after South Carolina had seceded. I took most decided ground against secession and carried my county. I carried my county by a vote of three to one and was elected a member of the convention, but the people of the State decided, by a majority, that there should be no convention. When the second convention was ordered I declined being a candidate; I wished to have no part in it; but my constituents again sent me against my will.

Question. You have then been all along a non-secessionist in principle?

Answer. Always. There has not been an hour in my life that I did not regard it as the greatest political calamity that could befall the people of any country.

Question. How do the masses of the people of North Carolina now feel in regard to the government of the United States—friendly, unfriendly, or indifferent?

Answer. There was a most overwhelming majority of the people of North Carolina loyal to the United States government before secession took place. I would say that from two-thirds to three-fourths of the people of North Carolina were utterly opposed to secession.

Question. Can you give the result of the first vote upon that subject?

Answer. I think there were sixty-odd thousand cast for Union delegates in the respective counties for the first convention, and perhaps thirty thousand for secession delegates.

Question. Can you give the vote on the second occasion?

Answer. I know of no direct popular vote on the subject after the first; but the election of Governor Vance indicated that there was still a Union majority in the State even after the war commenced. He was run as a Union candidate, and was elected by a decided majority over his secession opponent.

Question. In what year was that?

Answer. I think in 1862 or 1863; probably in 1862. I think he was elected by between thirty and forty thousand majority. It is due to truth to say that Governor Vance afterwards became a war man, but he was voted for at the first election as one who was in favor of pacification and Union.

Question. Was he, when first voted for, understood to be a Union man; that is, a man supporting the government of the United States and opposed to secession and rebellion?

Answer. He was originally very much opposed to secession, though he went into the army as most men did, under the peculiar circumstances. When he was first voted for as governor it was supposed his proclivities were still for the Union, running as he did against and beating a secession opponent by thirty-odd thousand majority.

Question. Can you state any reasons why Governor Vance afterwards became a supporter of the rebellion against the United States?

Answer. If I did it would be mere conjecture, and perhaps it would not be proper to indulge in that. I have every confidence that Governor Vance accepts in good faith the situation and will prove a loyal citizen to the government of the United States.

Question. I ask you again to state how the mass of the people of North Carolina feel towards the government of the United States?

Answer. The masses of the people, I believe, at the time of General Lee's surrender, were more gratified than otherwise because they saw that the result was inevitable, and a great many of them were for peace and attached sincerely to the federal Union, and believed there was no safety out of the Union. They were gratified that the thing had been settled. They wanted it settled in some way, for they had been exceedingly harassed during the war, which was commenced against their consent in the first instance. Of late, however, it is due to truth to state that, from various circumstances, they have come almost to despair. Perhaps it is in part from the loss of their slave property, though I think they were prepared to acquiesce in that. I think it is chiefly from their long delay in being admitted to an equal participation in the Union. It has produced a feeling of discontent even among Union men. My belief is that if they could be perfectly sure that with these constitutional amendments which have been adopted, accepting the condition of things as they are now, within a reasonable time they would be admitted to political equality and to equal privileges with the other States, there would be a general feeling favorable to the federal Union. The great mass of them are exceedingly anxious to have their relations between the State and the federal government restored.

Question. Is there not a large proportion of these people who dislike and condemn the government of the United States?

Answer. There are a certain number of reckless unscrupulous men there, as everywhere in the country, who, I believe, would be willing for anything almost. For instance, some few persons would perhaps be gratified by a foreign war, but the great mass of the people of North Carolina, even including the secessionists, although they have been utterly opposed to me, and I opposed to them, yet I think a majority of the secessionists are exceedingly anxious for peace and quiet, perfectly willing to live under the laws of the United States, provided they can have political equality with the other States accorded to them. I think an overwhelming majority of the mass of the people of the State of North Carolina are perfectly willing to acquiesce in the laws of the United States on these conditions. I will go further and say, that I think the longer it is procrastinated the worse that feeling of discontent will become. I may remark that I have heard many persons say that if there was any attempt at an outbreak against the government of the United States, they would not do as they did at first—allow them to get complete military control—but would seize the opportunity to vindicate themselves against these men immediately.

Question. In case of a foreign war with any powerful European nation, such as Great Britain or France, and in case the war should take on such an attitude as apparently to present a fair chance for success in another attempt at secession and the establishment of southern independence, would there not be in North Carolina a pretty large number of men who would engage in such a movement if they had the opportunity?

Answer. There might be some portion of the people; but if a reasonable expectation was indulged that they could be admitted to equal political rights, I believe there would be an overwhelming majority to suppress such an attempt. There is no question about it. I will further express the opinion that the better way to remove this discontent among the people, would be to declare these States members of the federal Union—for Congress, of course, to judge of the members presenting themselves separately. If a disloyal man should present himself, claiming a seat as a member, he should be excluded, but I would admit such as came here properly qualified.

Question. Would you recommend the admission, for instance, of a representative, the great majority of whose constituents were actually disloyalists against the government?

Answer. I would if Congress should be convinced that he was loyal. I would have it depend very much upon the member himself.

Question. Should it not depend rather upon the character of the constituency he represents?

Answer. It would be very difficult to ascertain the loyalty or disloyalty of a body of men in that way.

Question. Suppose that fact was ascertained upon proof, would you recommend the admission of a member from a disloyal district?

Answer. If the district was manifestly disloyal beyond all question, it would be a justification perhaps for the exclusion of its members.

Question. Is there any considerable portion of the intelligent citizens of North Carolina who entertain the idea that there is a purpose to exclude the State permanently from the Union?

Answer. The people there have become somewhat in a state of despair. To speak with candor, a vast number of them despair of ever enjoying the equality in the federal government they once did. I do not speak in reference to slavery, because every sensible man regards that as irrevocably gone, and a vast number of those who have been slaveholders express the wish that it may never be restored again.

Question. Would the great mass of people in North Carolina generally consent to the payment of the federal debt if they could prevent it by their votes or by their representatives?

Answer. I am inclined to think they would; they know it is a matter of obligation upon the part of the United States; that the United States is pledged to it, and as loyal men they would consent to it, though tax-payers all over the Union do not regard it as a pleasant subject, and particularly those impoverished like the people of the south. In reference to the confederate debt, I do not hesitate to express the opinion that a very decided and overwhelming majority of the people of North Carolina would be utterly opposed to its payment.

Question. You speak of the confederate war debt?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Is there not a large debt contracted for the prosecution of the war, by the State of North Carolina, for which the State still holds itself pledged?

Answer. No, sir; it has been repudiated by the State convention; I was a member of that convention myself, and voted with the great body of the convention, without hesitation, to repudiate it.

Question. In case a convention should be called which should repeal that clause repudiating the rebel debt in North Carolina, would not the people generally consent to the payment of that debt?

Answer. I think not.

Question. Not the State debt?

Answer. No, sir; my impression is that a majority of the people are against it, from the fact that the great mass of them considered themselves coerced into making common cause with the confederate government; the war was forced upon the people of North Carolina against their wish, and they do not hold themselves morally responsible for the debt incurred. I think if the open question of repudiating that debt had been submitted to the people they would have decided in favor of repudiation.

Question. Is not a large amount of the debt incurred by North Carolina for the prosecution of the war held by the citizens of that State?

Answer. There is. The distribution of the debt among so large a class of the people, no doubt, made many advocates for prosecuting the war.

Question. Has confederate scrip, so called, any value in the market of North Carolina?

Answer. None at all. It is not regarded as worth a cent.

Question. Is it due by its terms?

Answer. No, sir. The terms of most of the bonds were that they were payable, perhaps, six months after independence and a treaty of peace, or some language of that kind, and, of course, they never can become due. That event never has happened, and I presume never will.

Question. Have you any reason to believe there are any persons of position in North Carolina who still have it in contemplation to renew the war or resort to other means to get out of the Union and establish a southern confederacy?

Answer. My impression is, there would be no advocates of resistance now or of renewing the war in any shape or form.

Question. You know of no combination for that purpose, open or secret?

Answer. None at all. There may be a few individuals who would be willing to avail themselves of a war with France or something of that kind; but the great mass of the people, in the event of such a war, would stand by the United States; that is my impression.

Question. Are emigrants from the northern States to North Carolina received and treated with kindness?

Answer. They are in some localities; indeed, in many localities, a strong wish is expressed that they should come among us, while in others there is a feeling among a portion of the people against them. I think the general impression is, that that is the best means of advancing the interests of our State, and I take occasion to say that such is my decided opinion.

Question. But is there not existing at present in North Carolina among the masses—I speak of the lower class of course—a feeling of dislike and hostility towards northern men?

Answer. They sometimes speak of Yankees harshly; but I am inclined to think that if any gentleman came there to invest capital in lands, manufactures, or anything of that sort, he would be kindly received if he came there bona fide for that purpose.

Question. Would a northern man stand as good a chance for justice in your State courts as a Carolinian, in a question of private right?

Answer. It is natural to suppose that in these excitements there may possibly be some bias in favor of the Carolinian; but I think, perhaps, the great mass of the people would be willing and desirous to do justice in a case of this kind.

Question. How do the mass of Carolinians feel in respect to the freedmen; especially in regard to their education?

Answer. Well, sir, that feeling has changed a good deal. Last year there was a great deal of feeling against the freedmen, because, in truth, they behaved rather badly after Lee's surrender. Before that they had been very quiet and orderly; but afterwards they abandoned work, most of them, and became wanderers, and dissatisfied. They would not work on the farms even for pretty fair wages; but the present year they have returned to labor, and, as far as I have any knowledge, certainly in my part of the State, they are acting very well. There is a good feeling between the blacks and whites, and I believe the general sentiment is, certainly among the farmers and planters, that it is not only proper in itself, as a matter of justice, but that it is good policy to treat them with fairness and liberality. I can say, so far as those employed by me are concerned, that is my course of treatment towards them. Very few of those I owned have left me, and some I should have been glad to have had gone have remained. For instance, I have no doubt nearly four hundred loads of wood have been used from my farm this winter, and three-fourths of it at least have been used by black people, with many of whom I have had nothing to do, being the families of laborers living on my farm. They used the wood and I charged them nothing at all for it.

Question. Is there not generally among the mass of white people there a disinclination to see schools established among the blacks, and would they not be likely to break up such schools when established, if they could?

Answer. I do not think they would. There is a disinclination for promiscuous schools of whites and blacks; but I do not think they would object to schools for the blacks. Indeed, all reflecting persons must know it is better for the country that they should be educated. I do not think there is any prejudice against their education. There are some schools for blacks, which have been established in my county, and I have never heard of any attempts to break them up. Negro children would not be admitted into white schools.

Question. What is the opinion of the Freedmen's Bureau in your State, as far as your observation extends?

Answer. So far as I have any knowledge of it, I think the gentlemen who have conducted it, as a general rule, have been liberal and just both towards the freedmen and the white people.

Question. Do you think it has been beneficial upon the whole?

Answer. It was, I think, for last year. I think there is scarcely a necessity for it now.

Question. I do not speak of its necessity. What I want to inquire into is, whether upon the whole it has had a beneficial effect upon the blacks and whites?

Answer. There was a state of things last year among the blacks and whites requiring some authority of that kind, resulting from the immediate termination of the war; but it seems to me that state of things has now passed. I think the freedmen would now be protected in their rights without the intervention of the bureau. If I mistake not, our legislature have passed laws for their protection by the civil courts.

Question. Would a black man stand an equal chance for justice in a State court of North Carolina with a white man now before a jury?

Answer. If he was a man of good character, with no particular prejudice against him, I think he would. For instance, there are some negroes who are notoriously dishonest; their existence, in some numbers, may be, to some extent, accounted for by their degraded condition as slaves. I am inclined to think a black man, with a fair character, would receive justice in our courts; indeed, I am sure of it, and for this reason: it is regarded, not simply as a matter of justice, but as a matter of policy among the white people that they should be treated with fairness, in order to produce the amicable relations between the blacks and the whites necessary to carry on the labor of the country.

Question. Are black men permitted to testify in courts of justice in your State?

Answer. I think our legislature, at its late session, authorized it to some extent.

Question. You think there is some limitation to that extent?

Answer. It is limited to some extent. I have not seen the acts of the legislature. They adjourned but a short time since; and, in fact, we have not any mail facilities scarcely in our part of the country.

Question. Is the low white man esteemed as possessing more veracity than the black man of the same grade and condition, in North Carolina?

Answer. As a general rule, they are considered as having a higher claim to credibility.

Question. What has been your experience with the two classes in regard to veracity and truth-telling?

Answer. My impression is, that perhaps the white class would be entitled to a higher grade of character in that respect, because the servitude of the negro and everything has tended to degrade his moral sense. They have not the same pride of character. The poor man has frequently a great deal of pride of character and desire for the good opinion of his compeers. Those recently slaves have not risen exactly to that. It will take some time to go through that process.

Question. As to the capacity of the negro to acquire knowledge and become educated; is he, in your judgment, much or at all inferior to the white man in that respect?

Answer. There is a difference in that respect; the negro in childhood, up to twelve years of age, is very nearly or quite as capable as the white child, but after that the superiority is considered decidedly with the white. The mind of the white man seems to grow and develop itself, while that of the negro from that time does not seem to be capable of so extensive development.

Question. What would the white people of North Carolina say to a proposition to allow the negroes or a part of them the right of suffrage? That would not be a novelty in the history of North Carolina, would it?

Answer. There is a sentiment somewhat against that, although I think there are a good many persons who would have no objections to seeing qualified negro suffrage, but universal suffrage would be regarded as very objectionable and inadmissible.

Question. Does universal suffrage exist among the whites of North Carolina?

Answer. Yes, sir; among those who have obtained the age of twenty-one and who have been residents of the State a certain length of time.

Question. Do you suppose it would be practicable in North Carolina to restrict that universal suffrage among the whites?

Answer. No, sir; there is a general sentiment in favor of it.

Question. You cannot imagine any machinery by which restricted suffrage among the whites could be established?

Answer. No, sir; I think it is a right they would never surrender if they could avoid it. Free negroes at one time voted in North Carolina, but they were very limited in number.

Question. What qualifications for the negro voter were then required in North Carolina?

Answer. Precisely the same as for white men at that time. For the house of commons, as we call it, retaining the old British parliamentary name, they were required to have been residents of the State a certain time and to have paid a per capita tax. For the senate, the voter must be a landholder; they have changed that now; the white man can vote for the senator without being a landholder, and the negro cannot vote at all. The unfortunate agitation between the north and south gave rise to that change, no doubt. I must say the free negroes of that day, though, voted generally for what they called "gentlemen;" they did not vote for any man they did not regard as a gentleman.

Question. Would they now?

Answer. I am inclined to think they would vote the same way; still there are such masses of them that it would be regarded as a rather dangerous experiment.

WASHINGTON, April 4, 1866.

Brevet Lieutenant Colonel W. H. H. Beadle sworn and examined.

By Mr. HOWARD:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. My residence has been so broken up by the war that it is difficult to say where it is.

Question. Where is your home?

Answer. My home is Ann Arbor, Michigan.

Question. Did you serve in the recent war ?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. How long ?

Answer. About four years, possibly a little more altogether.

Question. In what capacity ?

Answer. As an officer of infantry from lieutenant to lieutenant colonel.

Question. Where have you been in service ?

Answer. Chiefly in Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi, and more recently in connexion with the Freedmen's Bureau in Virginia and North Carolina.

Question. Have you been acting in an official capacity in the Freedmen's Bureau ?

Answer. I have.

Question. When did you commence that service and where did you serve ?

Answer. The order assigning me to duty under General Howard, of the Freedmen's Bureau, was dated January 12, 1866, and I was relieved from duty March 26, 1866. My principal service was at Wilmington, North Carolina ; I was superintendent of the southern district of that State ; I also performed some service, but not much, at Richmond, Virginia.

Question. Have you travelled about much in North Carolina and Virginia, so as to acquaint yourself with the feelings of the people there ?

Answer. I have in North Carolina, particularly in the southern district, composed of nine counties, and to some extent over the central and eastern part of the State.

Question. When did you leave Wilmington, North Carolina ?

Answer. On Monday of last week, the 26th of March.

Question. What is the state of public feeling in North Carolina as regards loyalty to the government of the United States ?

Answer. There is a great variety of feeling there, but to state it generally it is bad.

Question. What do you intend to be understood as meaning by the expression "bad ?"

Answer. I mean that there are very few persons there who have been Union men through the war, very few indeed. There are some who, although they have been secessionists, are now willing to accept the situation entirely, but the great majority still talk against the government ; are dissatisfied with the Freedmen's Bureau and the presence of the military ; they feel sore, chagrined, and bitter towards the government of the United States on account of their failure to establish what they call southern independence. One person in particular said to me that when another opportunity offered "all the best men of the south would be found fighting against the government with more vindictiveness than before," on account of the bitterness caused by their failure in the last war and the dissatisfaction with the United States because they had not been treated with more magnanimity. It was one of the editors of a newspaper who talked thus.

Question. Of what paper ?

Answer. The Wilmington Dispatch.

Question. Is that a secession or a Union paper ?

Answer. A secession paper, unless it has changed since I left that place ; though nearly all the newspapers are about the same.

Question. Did you discover that these expressions of dislike towards the government of the United States were frequent among the people ?

Answer. Yes, sir ; when one person made use of such expressions nearly all those around acquiesced in them, as a general thing. There was not one man in a thousand (of the white citizens) who, when the government was attacked and reviled, would express disapproval of it ; who would be indignant and speak for the government, or do anything but smile, it not openly approve it, (the abuse.) I understand the extreme test of loyalty is, that when a man hears his government denounced and cursed he would color up and resent it. There is not one white citizen in a thousand in North Carolina who would do that. You would seldom meet a man there who would resent an insult offered to the government of the United States, or oppose or contradict in any way any denunciation or abuse of it. His honor or feelings would not be touched by any remark against the government. As a rule this would be very general.

Question. Among what classes of persons does this feeling seem to prevail, the higher, middle, or lower classes ?

Answer. It prevails among the higher and middle classes. I have found several young men, who have no families, are free from local interests, &c., who were desirous of emigrating north, and I have aided them, given them passes or recommendations as far as I could. The reasons given by these young men were, they had been compelled to enter the confederate service ; had come out of it poorer than they went in ; that they could not trust their politicians or leaders, and that, in the present state of affairs, there was no chance for a hard working, honest young man to do anything better than barely make a living, on account of the peculiar treatment of the labor question by the land owners.

Question. What particular fault in their labor system do you refer to ?

Answer. The land owners, or wealthier class, have no interest in the permanent good of the laboring class, or do not pretend to have. Public opinion is unfavorable to the laboring classes. The young men I speak of feel this burden all the time, and it troubles them. They see no future good or reasonable chance for it. The opportunities for education are not open to them, and they have an idea that they can find more intelligent communities in the north and do better every way. Political economy, the mutual dependence of labor and capital, are not understood. Capital has heretofore owned the labor, and they cannot now appreciate the principle that the permanent good of the wealthier class, or of the commerce and enterprise of the State, depend upon the permanent good of the laborers and producers. They have heretofore acted on a different principle, and they still do; this is the source of much trouble.

Question. Have you heard anything said among the secessionists in regard to a war between the United States and foreign powers?

Answer. Yes, sir; this assistant editor of the Dispatch, when talking with me, said in case a war should occur between this country and Maximilian or France, all the best men of the south would again be found opposing the United States, or taking part with its enemies; that they would seize the opportunity when offered.

Question. Have you heard such sentiments or anything tantamount to them frequently expressed?

Answer. Not very frequently; I have not much opportunity; my position renders me generally cautious in speaking to me. I know men talked differently to me to what they did outside; I had such things proven to me sometimes.

Question. Have you heard them expressed in any other instance?

Answer. Yes, sir; in three or four instances.

Question. By men of position and influence in the community?

Answer. Yes, sir; by attorneys at law, leading planters, or people of those classes. There is another editor of the same paper (Dispatch) who entertains about the same opinions as the one first mentioned. The marshal of the city of Wilmington, late a major general of the confederate army, and now paroled as such, declared his hatred of the government. He said, "I hate you; I do not love you; I always shall hate you." He went on to inform me how he would like to be treated, how southerners' feelings were to be hurt, and how we had better act not to hurt them, and the like. They sometimes speak of the United States, but more generally of the "Yankees," and often say "you" or "your people," and "your government," "the Yankee government," &c. Whatever they say generally means the government of the United States. I always found that they so placed their feelings, that an officer could not conscientiously perform his duty towards the United States without hurting them, and I always thought they intended to have their feelings hurt.

Question. What was this marshal's name?

Answer. Robert Ransom. He told me that he hated us, and always should hate us; that he had no love for the United States, and never should have, or something to that effect. I believe he was a lieutenant colonel of our regular army before the war.

Question. Have you any reason to suppose that there is any class or combination of persons in North Carolina or Virginia, or elsewhere in the south, who contemplate a renewal of the war, or another attempt to get out of the Union?

Answer. It would be much easier to say what I believe than what I know.

Question. Well, what is your opinion on the subject?

Answer. It is my opinion that there is an organization of some such kind; they consult with one another privately; if you hit one you hit all. There is at least a very close community of sentiment and interest among them; whether it is fully organized I cannot say. Their interests are identical, or they make them so; they talk in the same way; they urge the same reasons, and refer to one another in a fraternal manner. They are given to complimentary notices of men who have been devoted to the cause of the south or are now. This is frequent in their papers and public speeches. This seems to be the test for popularity among the better classes; obituary notices bear the same strain. One would think sometimes the war was still going on, and the deceased was just brought from some field where the south was victorious. This is particularly the case where bodies of deceased officers are disinterred and brought home; it is so in mention of all men. In their social, political and newspaper circles they exhibit very many legal "ear-marks" of an organized brotherhood, though I do not know that it exists.

Question. Suppose the United States should become engaged in a war with England or France, and the war should assume such an aspect as to hold out inducements to the secessionists to attempt again to go out of the Union, what, in your opinion, would be the course their leaders would adopt?

Answer. They would take up arms against the government as quick as they saw the opportunity.

Question. Would they join the enemy?

Answer. Yes, sir. I am perfectly convinced of that.

Question. How do the secessionists there treat the freedmen generally, and how do they feel in regard to their education?

Answer. They treat the education question badly. They do not afford any encouragement whatever to the schools established by the bureau. The papers take occasion to abuse the school mistresses and others in charge of the schools by publishing innuendoes and articles charging the school mistresses with actual crime or complicity in crime, all of which charges are untrue. For instance, the Dispatch charges the mistresses of the schools with exacting money from the freed-children, and telling them if they cannot get the money to bring along silver spoons, and asks if that is the reason such articles are lost by some citizens? The papers ridicule the colored people and the bureau in their police reports. If a boy or a girl is found who has attended school at all and afterwards is charged with a petty offence, the papers cast slurs and innuendoes at the schools and bureau. I arrested, or ordered to report to my office, one of the editors of the Dispatch for a very scurrilous article against the school-teachers, but dismissed the case, considering it my duty to proceed regularly against the establishment and get the paper suppressed. This editor afterwards promised to retire from the paper if I would not proceed, but he has not yet, to my knowledge. They deny the teachers all social privileges, although they are of the best character, and intelligent and accomplished as most of the citizens.

Question. Are the teachers of the colored schools there excluded from society among secessionists?

Answer. Entirely. In one or two instances they have been roughly addressed, spoken to with abusive language for calling upon a colored family and recommending that a little girl be sent to school. A white man spoke very roughly to her for tampering with his servants; ordered her off abusively. This teacher was a lady who acted as a kind of city missionary, looking up needy cases, reporting them to us, getting rations for them, advising parents to send their children to school, &c. She was engaged in this work when so roughly accosted. This was publicly noticed and defended by the papers. It was a while after this that the Dispatch abused the schools as stated. These schools are free. We sometimes take cost price for books and stationery from those amply able to pay, but give all free where children are poor. The teachers and superintendents are paid by northern charity, and the whole plan is very worthy.

Question. I suppose these benevolent gentlemen who abuse the school mistresses do not themselves contribute anything for the support of any schools, white or black?

Answer. No, sir; I conclude not. There are very few schools in the State, and those in Wilmington rather poor. They certainly give nothing but innuendoes and abuse to colored schools. I think these colored schools are generally the best-conducted schools that have ever been in Wilmington. The State University, at Chapel Hill, is doing fairly for men of means, but the State has no common schools and few institutions or encouragements for the laboring classes.

Question. Have you ever visited any of these colored schools?

Answer. Yes, sir. I made it my business to interest myself in them.

Question. What progress in acquiring an education do the colored children make?

Answer. They are generally very successful. I am rather enthusiastic upon that subject. They learn rapidly.

Question. In what branches of learning do they make the most rapid progress?

Answer. All branches of an elementary education which depend particularly upon the memory. Their memory is better developed and more active than any other faculty of the mind. As witnesses the memory of colored persons is often very accurate. I have found witnesses to have wonderful accuracy in relating a common conversation or the verbal terms of a contract.

Question. Do they seem to acquire readily a knowledge of geography?

Answer. Yes, sir; I think they do. I have seen several little girls and boys from seven to twelve years of age stand before outline maps and with a pointer rapidly designate nearly all the States, capitals, rivers, mountain ranges, peaks, bays, rivers, &c., in the world, skipping about irregularly, as called by any one.

Question. Did you find among them much proficiency in history?

Answer. No, sir. That has not been studied much. They learn some Bible history very fairly in Sabbath schools.

Question. How about arithmetic?

Answer. Just fair or only ordinary. Their minds are not analytical, or those qualities have never been developed. They have never been allowed to think much or reason for themselves, so that in analogy or analysis they are slow. Their memory has been developed because other qualities were not, and this faculty had to serve for others on account of the circumstances of their former condition.

Question. What is the general character of the blacks as to veracity?

Answer. In my opinion, it is about as good as the white inhabitants, taken generally. I have known gray-headed white men to perjure themselves before me where the issue was in their interest against a colored man who had always been their slave. His (the colored man's) evidence was completely supported. I have met cases also the other way; so that generally I would take the black man's evidence for what it was worth under the circumstances, and according to the legal rules of evidence, just as quick as I would the testimony of whites generally. The race or color does not determine it at all, but all rests upon each witness's interest and character, and the white man shows his interest in his evidence just as much as the colored. I must say, however, that I think the standard of veracity is generally too low there.

Question. Have you had a professional education as a lawyer?

Answer. To some extent only. I have read elementary works but never practiced.

Question. How do the secessionists feel in regard to the blacks owning and holding land?

Answer. It is in regard to just such subjects that white testimony is unreliable.

Question. Are they willing or unwilling blacks should hold and own land?

Answer. As a general thing they are unwilling, for the reasons I have stated. They do not look on the laboring class or their lute slaves with favor in such matters. The State courts are unfriendly to negroes claiming title to land. If they already have it beyond question and occupy it, there is not so much trouble, though such cases are rare. If a colored man owns property and it is in possession of some white man, the courts will do nothing for him now. In all such cases the attorneys or claimants would come to me and file the regular petition as in chancery, and not to the courts.

Question. What is the difficulty on the part of the courts? Is it an unwillingness on the part of the judges, or on the part of the juries, to deal with the case so as to do justice to the black man because he is black?

Answer. It is on account of their laws, and long practice against them as slaves. The laws of the State are unfriendly to a slave owning anything, and the opinions and decisions of the supreme court have been extremely severe and rigid on such points.

Question. By the laws of North Carolina, would a free black man be allowed to own land?
